improper to ask him such a question as, 'If you did not commit the murder who did?' Chedan v King-Emperor, 7 O C 191. The signature of an accused person to a statement recorded under s 361 should be made in the immediate presence and under the control of the Magistrate himself. Queen Empress v Bhika, Rat Un Cr C 687=Cr Rg 8 of 1891. The signing of a confessional statement by a prisoner in the form of a mark is sufficient under s 361. In re Vaji Chendamma, 2 Weir 197. Where the Magistrate instead of asking separate questions to the accused puts him a long composite question, the examination of the accused is irregular and not in accordance with law. Hasni v Emperor, 103 Ind Cas 847=28 Cr L J 767=A I R 1927 Lah 650. If the prisoner is not prejudiced in any way by the omission, the absence of the questions put to him does not make the confession inadmissible. Similarly the taking down of the record in a language other than that in which it was made does not matter if the accused has not been injured in any way in his defence by this defect. Nauab v Emperor, 28 Cr L J 341=100 Ind Cas 821=A I R 1927 Lah 285. The rules laid down in section 361 should be strictly observed and they are applicable alike to confessions taken before enquiry or trial under s 161 and examinations of accused under section 342. Empress v Gajadhar A W N 1883, 243. It is sufficient if the certificate attesting the statement of an accused person, under section 361 of the Criminal Pro Code is signed by the presiding officer of the Court. The whole of it need not be in the Court's handwriting. Empress v Riaz Ali, A W N 1900, 203. The recording of confessions should be made by Magistrates with their own hands. Criminal Cr Memo No 7 of 1873. But a confession recorded by a clerk, under s 161 of the Code in the presence of a Magistrate, in the form of a narrative and without the questions being recorded, would not be illegal, if the accused was not prejudiced by it. Feloo v Empress, 14 C 539.

Section 533 of the Criminal Procedure Code Section 533 of the Code of Criminal Procedure lays down that "if any Court, before which a confession or other statement of an accused person recorded or purporting to be recorded under section 161 or section 361 is tendered or has been received in evidence finds that any of the provisions of either of such sections have not been complied with by the Magistrate recording the statement, it shall take evidence that such person duly made that statement recorded and, notwithstanding anything contained in the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, s 91, such statement shall be admitted if the error has not injured the accused as to his defence on the merits." Section 533, Cr Pro Code, is intended to apply to all cases in which the directions of the law have not been complied with, without any distinction between omissions to comply with the law and infractions of it. Under that section if the record of a confession is inadmissible owing to failure to comply with the law such as omission to obtain the signature or mark of the person confessing to the document, parol evidence, notwithstanding anything contained in s 91, Evidence Act, may be given of the terms of the confession, and those terms, if and when proved may be admitted and used as evidence in the case, if the defect is such that it has not affected the merits of the defence. Queen Empress v Raghu, 23 B 221. Section 533 is to be interpreted liberally and though a confession recorded by a Magistrate was in the first instance and by itself inadmissible as not being in the form of question and answer, not being recorded in the vernacular of the accused and not bearing the signature or mark of the accused, it will become admissible by the taking of the evidence of the Magistrate that the accused duly made the statement recorded. Empress v Tularam, 8 C P L R Cr 21. A confession made not to a Police officer and not improperly obtained as laid down in section 24 of the Evidence Act is always admissible against an accused. Harbans v King Emperor, 8 O C 395=2 Cr L J 811. Where a Magistrate inadvertently omits to certify the voluntariness of a confession recorded by him under s 161, Cr Pro Code, the defect may be cured by the evidence of the Magistrate. Ram Sanchi v Emperor, 9 Ind Cas 148=12 Cr L J 15, see also Khudiram v Emperor 9 C L J 55. The Sessions Judge, who tried a dacoity case admitted in evidence statements in the nature of confessions recorded in English by a Joint Magistrate under the provisions of s 161 Cr Pro Code. There was no evidence that it was not practicable to record them in the

S 24 language in which they were made, and the Joint Magistrate was not examined as a witness, nor was evidence taken that the accused duly made the statement so recorded. Held that as it could not be presumed without some evidence that the statements had to be recorded in English as they could not be recorded in the language in which they were made there was no justification for their being recorded in English, and no presumption under section 80 of the Evidence Act could be made in respect of the record made in English and as no evidence was taken to prove that the accused had actually made those statements, the Session Judge was wrong in admitting such a record of the statements against the accused. Baua v King Emperor, 10 O C 112=6 Cr L J 94, but see Baua v Queen Empress, S C 277 Oudh.

A defect in the certificate to be appended to the examination of an accused person by a Magistrate cannot be rectified by examining a witness to prove that the confession was in the handwriting of the Magistrate. Section 533 Cr Pro Code, provides that, in such a case, evidence shall be taken that the accused person 'duly made the statement recorded', and the proper course is to examine either the Magistrate himself or some other person who was present when the statement was recorded. Empress v Mussammatt Jugri, S C P L R Cr 6 Q E v Anga 23 M 15=2 Weir 705, Nga Nya v Queen Empress, U B R (1892-1896) Vol I, 205. A Magistrate, who recorded a confession under 164 Cr Pro Code did not question the accused under s 164(3) as to whether he was confessing voluntarily. The confession was subsequently retracted. Held, that the confession was inadmissible in evidence and that the defect could not, under s 533 be cured by the evidence of the Magistrate that the confession was voluntarily made. Ma On Nyun v King Emperor, 1 U B R (1902-1903) Cr Pro Code, 13.

This section has no application to a case where no record whatever has been made of a confession. King Emperor v Gulabi, 11 A L J 286=14 Cr L J 211=19 Ind Cas 307=35 A 260. Though section 164 lays down that the Magistrate shall record any confession unless, upon questioning the person making it, he has reason to believe that it was made voluntarily, still, it is made where laid down that the Magistrate shall record any note showing what questions he has put to the person and how he has satisfied himself that the confession is made voluntarily. But it is advisable that the Magistrate should always record a memorandum showing that he has by questioning the person making it, satisfied himself that the confession is made voluntarily. Khemam v Emperor 6 Lah 78=88 Ind Cas 18=26 Cr L J 1074=26 P L R 346=A I R 1923 Lah 315. Baua v Emperor 7 Lah L J 264=89 Ind Cas 1029=26 P L R 549=26 Cr L J 1458=A I R 1925 Lah 448. Under section 533, Cr Pro Code, 1882 when a confession or other statement of an accused person is duly made in accordance with the provisions of the law, but in the recording of which those provisions have not been fully complied with oral evidence is admissible to prove that the confession or other statement was duly made. Queen Empress v Bhairab 2 C W N 702.

Section 80 of the Evidence Act and confession. So far as section 80 of the Evidence Act is concerned the Court is bound to make the presumption provided in that section in respect of the document purporting to be a confession of the accused. San Bau v Crown, 1 L B R 340 F B. Both the memorandum and the certificate required by s 164 should be attached to the confessions. The effect of these is to afford proof of the accuracy of the record, of the presence of the Magistrate, and of the voluntary nature of the confession. Reg v Shree 1 B 219.

Principle underlying section 24. The value of confessions depends on the supposition that they are deliberate and voluntary, and on the presumption that a rational being will not make admissions prejudicial to his interests and safety unless when urged by the prompting of truth and conscience. Such confessions, so made by a prisoner to any person at any moment of time, and in any place subsequent to the perpetration of the crime and previous to his examination before the Magistrate are at common law received in evidence as among proofs of guilt. Greenl Fr § 215. Taylor § 665, Best Ev § 521, 11-1.

Ev § 102 When a confession is made under influence of a promise of benefit, or a threat of harm, it is untrustworthy because it has been associated with an attraction too strong to reject. In general then, the position of the confessing person which causes our distrust is that of being compelled to choose between two alternatives, one of which involves a confession of guilt irrespective of its truth or falsity—Wigmore § 824. 'The object of the rule relating to the exclusion of confessions is to exclude all confessions which may have been procured by the prisoner being led to suppose that it will be better for him to admit himself to be guilty of an offence which he really never committed' Per Lattledale J in R v Court, 7 C & P 486, R v Holmes, C & K 248. "I think in every case it is for the Judge to decide whether the words were used in such a manner and under such circumstances as to induce the prisoner to make a confession of guilt whether such confessions were true or no."

Scope of section 24 Section 24 of the Evidence Act provides that a confession of an accused person is irrelevant in a criminal proceeding if the making of the confession appears to the Court to have been caused by any inducement, having reference to the charge against the accused person, proceeding from a person in authority. Fatechand v Emperor, 86 Ind Cas 1001=26 Cr L J 937=L R 6 A 89 Cr. In dealing with the question of the admissibility of a confession the Judge is not concerned with the truth or falsity of the confession, that is a matter entirely for the jury. The Judge is only concerned with the question as to whether the confession is admissible in evidence. If the confession is voluntary it is admissible. If prima facie it is false inconsistent, improper or absurd that might suggest that it is not voluntary. Emperor v Panchari Dutt 86 Ind Cas 414=29 C W N 300=52 C 67=26 Cr L J 782=A I R 1925 Cal 597. 'Voluntariness, being the warrant for veracity, was then regarded as the sine qua non of confessions. This was the condition precedent which had to be complied with before confessions could be admitted in evidence. The meaning of this position apparently is that confessions were presumed to be false till the presumption was rebutted by proof of voluntariness' 2 Bom L R J 228. The reason for rejection of confessions are thus stated by Eyre C B. "A confession forced from the mind by the flattery of hope or by the torture of fear, comes in so questionable a shape, when it is to be considered as the evidence of guilt that no credit ought to be given to it and therefore, it is rejected." Harriet shall's Case, 1 Leach C C 263. But in different view is taken in Reg v William 2 Den C C 474. There the counsel for the prisoner urged "It is gathered from this that if any inducement—of the slightest description—whereby any worldly advantage to himself as a consequence of making a statement, be held out to a prisoner, the law presumes the statement to be untrue." Pollock C B interrupted him observing "You are overestimating it. The law does not presume it is untrue, but rather that it is uncertain whether a statement so made is true." Lord Campbell C J added "I doubt whether the rule excluding confessions made in consequence of an inducement held out proceeds upon the presumption that the confession is untrue but rather that it could be dangerous to receive such evidence, and that for the due administration of justice it is better that it should be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury." In delivering the judgment in the same case Pollock C B said "There is no presumption of law one way or other. There is no presumption that it is false, or that the law considers that such a statement cannot be relied upon, but such confessions are rejected because it is supposed that it would be dangerous to leave such evidence to the jury." 2 Bom L R J 229. In R v Mansfield, 14 Cox Cr 639 Williams J said "It is not because the law is afraid of having truth elicited that these confessions are excluded, but the law is jealous of not having the truth." Similarly in Scott's Case 1 D & B 58 Campbell L C J reiterated "It is a trite maxim that the confession of a crime, to be admissible against the party confessing must be voluntary, but this only means that it shall not be induced by improper threats or promises, because under such circumstances the party may have been influenced to say that which is not true, and the supposed confession can not be safely acted upon." "The principle upon which all this class of cases is found is that by inducement being held out to the prisoner, he may be led to suppose that he will be more mercifully record This is no doubt the correct principle in theory, and owing to the comparatively simple and straight forward methods of the English Police would not in England necessarily present any very serious difficulties in practice But in common with such Indian decisions as there are, supporting an exactly contrary principle, this valuable pronouncement is subject to obvious limitations The statute law in India enacts that a confession is irrelevant if it appears to the Judge to have been improperly induced and that he has thereby been brought to confess What may or may not satisfy a Judge on this point is obviously beyond the reach of precedent or rule In each case it is question of fact, and as such has to be answered upon evidence of the same kind as that relating to any other relevant fact in issue In so far as it is question of fact it may appear to fall properly within the sphere of a Jury's duties The word used in the section is 'Court', but since the voluntariness or otherwise of a confession is a condition precedent to its admissibility, and therefore to its coming within the knowledge of the Jury at all, we prefer to think that the determination rests with the Judge alone To say that the Judge can be controlled on such a point by any precedent or rule of law is as plainly absurd as to say that precedents can decide what degree of proof ought to convince a Court of dacoity or murder Looked at from another point of view however namely that of procedure, the Subordinate Courts can be bound by authority Thus the rule in England as now stated fixes burden of proof on the prosecution no unimportant matter In Bombay it has long been generally supposed that what rule of law there is, is directly the reverse of that, and imposes the burden of proof on the prisoner For many years past Bombay Courts have been in the habit of referring to an old decision of a Division Bench delivered by Nanabhai Haridas J (vide Reg v Balwant, 11 B H C 137) as an authority for the proposition that the prisoner alleging undue influence must prove it We venture to think after a careful study of that case and a protracted examination of the whole question that the authority is indifferent and the rule worse Any patient and unprejudiced enquirer will assuredly agree that the judgment in question is not very profoundly reasoned and that whatever finity may have been attached unthinkingly to its conclusion, that conclusion is the result of very superficial and imperfect analysis What the learned Judge said was that a confession was not to be presumed to have been improperly induced, merely because the prisoner alleged that it had been Strictly speaking 'presumption' one way or the other hardly enters into the question The Judge is to be satisfied That is to say, if from the prisoner's plea and the attendant circumstances of the case the confession appears to have been improperly induced, it lies upon the Crown to satisfy the Judge that this was not so before he can admit it And he can hardly be satisfied except upon proof or upon process of reasoned induction But the phrase used does no doubt lend colour to the assertion that what the Judge meant was that on such an allegation being made the onus probandi lay on the prisoner This is a general rule of law may very well be demurred to, and we have seen that the highest judicial functionaries in the world vehemently dissent from it The argument that whatever may be the law in England the Bombay High Court has rightly interpreted the Indian law, hardly deserves consideration The rulings are on a point of principle which is admittedly common to both systems of law and necessarily must be whenever such systems are the out growth of English legal principles The words of the Indian Statute do not in any degree alter or modify that fundamental principle By what methods of procedure it is best safeguarded, and the most vigorous effect can be given to its benevolent energy, is a point upon which the Statute Law is silent, and for light upon which the public naturally turns to the most eminent jurists The public then have now to decide between the value of Mr Justice Nanabhai Haridas's opinion and that of the Lord Chief Justice of England with whom Justices Havelins and Mathews agreed We have said that we thought the Bombay rule bad, and we support that opinion by one powerful consideration In practice the result of applying Mr Justice Nanabhai's rule has undoubtedly been to admit promiscuously confessions which are said to have been extorted Obviously the prisoner has no means of proving that he was tortured The only witnesses in 999 cases out of 1000 are the torturers and they are not likely to incriminate themselves If,

S 24. therefore, on every such occasion the prisoner is put to proof, the invariable reply is that he has none to offer, and the confession goes as a matter of course upon the record' See

But in another article in 2 Bom L R J 216 at p 227 another learned writer said "There is nothing in this section to indicate that a voluntary statement avowedly and manifestly false is inadmissible except perhaps the word 'confession' which at least implies a professedly true account. But be that as it may this section does not make voluntariness the basis of admissibility. It only lays down the rule of admission. For the origin, development or reason of this rule we must search the pages of history. That history is quite clear and throws a flood of light on the true object of the rule, which is entirely intended to augment the assurance of truth and minimize the chances of falsehood in a confession of guilt. Such being the case, a voluntary statement avowedly or manifestly known to be false could not be justifiably admitted on the strength of this section. Its admission would completely frustrate the object of this section." In Sheikh Abdul v Emperor, 85 Ind C 18 830=26 Cr L J 606 in a recent Calcutta case, M Justice Moolerji observed "Under section 293 (1) (2) Cr Pro Code it is the duty of the Judge to decide on the admissibility of the evidence and this duty he has got to discharge irrespective of the question whether objection has or has not been taken to the evidence by the parties themselves. He has therefore, to decide whether the confessions are admissible evidence or not that is to say, he has to consider whether they have been duly recorded and whether they are free from the infirmities mentioned in s 24 of the Indian Evidence Act. In dealing with the question of their admissibility he has obviously to determine whether they are voluntary or not. Under section 299 Cr Pro Code the Jury have to weigh and value the evidence admitted by the Judge, and in order to do so they also must themselves go into the question as to whether they were made voluntarily. To judge of the truth or falsity of a statement one must endeavour to find out whether it was voluntarily made, for a free and voluntary statement is some guarantee of its truth. It was not right therefore to take away entirely from the Jury the consideration of the question as to whether the confessions are voluntary or not, and it was clearly the duty of the learned Judge to place before them the facts and circumstances, pro and con, and ask them to form their own conclusions as to the character of confession."

A plea of guilty, no less than confession, must be regarded with caution. Crown v Zoolfoo 47 P R 1866 Cr. When proof in a case is limited to a confession, it is essential that too much stress should not be laid upon it. Crown v Oomra 31 P R 1867 Cr. A Judge who is to decide whether a confession is admissible in evidence or should be rejected, should exercise all necessary caution and vigilance, before admitting as voluntary, any confession tendered in evidence. But in coming to a decision on this point a Court should govern itself by the law and principles which regulate the procedure and adjudication in a Court of Justice and should not be influenced by conjecture or preconceived prejudice in recording what should be a decision based upon reasoned conclusion from the evidence adduced. Nga Shue v Queen Empress L B R (1893-1900) 145.

A confession by an accused person is not made irrelevant if otherwise relevant, merely because the accused person has been sworn or affirmed. Reginald v Empress, 3 P R 1880 Cr. An oral confession by an accused person, not being open to exception under s 24, 25 or 26 of the Evidence Act is as an admission by an accused person, a relevant fact and may be proved at his trial under section 21 and therefore such a confession made to a Magistrate is relevant and may be proved by the evidence of the Magistrate. Feroz v Emperor 11 L R Cr 1918=45 Ind Cas 843=19 Cr L J 651, but see Emperor v Maruti 11 Bom L R 1065. Section 27 of the Evidence Act qualifies not only sections 21 and 26 but also section 24 all three of which lay down general rules excluding confessions and the same broad grounds underlie all the three. Amerndia v Emperor 45 C 557=22 C W N 213=27 C L J 148=44 Ind Cas 371=19 Cr L J 305 but see Emperor v Nga Aung 35 Ind C 18 962=17 Cr L J 102=U B R (1916) Vol. II 114, Tara Singh v Emperor 29 Ind Cas. 81=11 P R 1915 Cr =16 Cr L J 545.

Evidence is inadmissible to prove a confession made while an accused person is in Police custody, except in so far as any fact is discovered in consequence of the information so received from him Fazlullah v Emperor, 22 Ind Cas 150=8 P W R 1914 Cr=33 P L R 1914=15 Cr L J 6

A confession made voluntarily in the sense that it was made spontaneously and without any inducement is admissible in evidence under s 24 of the Evidence Act. Khetal v Emperor, 45 A 300=21 A L J 143=73 Ind Cas 62=24 Cr L J 326

If a man is told by a person in authority that if he gives a true account of the matter he will be pardoned, that is a continuing offer, the thread of which continues unbroken until it is accepted by the confession which completes the bargain, unless there is some circumstance which breaks it so as to show that the inducement no longer operates, and the person confessing has no longer any hope of gaining anything from the authorities by making confession Fateh Chand v Emperor, 26 Cr L J 937=86 Ind Cas 1001=A. I R 1925 All 606

Where the Magistrate who recorded the confession took all possible precautions to satisfy himself that the confession was made voluntarily and that the accused was under no inducement or threat at the time he made the confession and he was informed that if he confessed he would not get a pardon Held that the confession was admissible in evidence Mahapat v Emperor, 103 Ind Cas 800=23 Cr L J 772=8 A I C R 416

The mere fact of a person being in custody cannot be a good basis for a presumption that any confession he may make is caused by an inducement, threat or promise having reference to the charge against him proceeding from some Police officer and sufficient to make him believe that he would be benefited in the trial by making it Dadi Lodhi v Emperor, 95 Ind Cas 59=27 Cr L J 731=A. I R 1926 Nag 363

If pressure exercised by a Police officer is sufficient to give the accused grounds which would appear to him reasonable for supposing that by making it he would gain any advantage or avoid any evil of a temporary nature, the confession would not only be weak in nature but wholly irrelevant under s 24 Evidence Act Dip Singh v Emperor 27 Cr L J 158=91 Ind Cas 894=A I R 1926 All 246

Confession was made by the accused against himself to a witness. The Judge did not disbelieve it but rejected it because he thought that it was made by the accused under the belief that it would be to his advantage Public Prosecutor v Chandaya, A I R 1929 Mnd 92

Whether any threat or inducement was offered or not in a particular case is a question of fact and has to be decided with reference to the circumstances of that case and it is not safe to make any generalisations merely on the ground that a certain set of words used in a particular case has been held to be in the nature of an inducement Kunja Subudhi v Emperor, A I R 1929 Pat 275 Where there is veiled threat as well as inducement, a confession so obtained is invalid Kunja v Emperor A I R 1929 Pat 275

Made A confession made to one person by the accused is irrelevant even where the inducement, threat or promise is held out by a different person if the latter be a person in authority Reg v Nauon, 9 B H C R 416 But undoubtedly the fact that the person who obtained confession by the use of a promise or a threat did not possess the power and authority to carry either into effect if known to the prisoner at the time of making the confession would nullify the effect intended to be produced upon his mind and the confession would be regarded as his free act Commonwealth v Tucker, 10 Gray (Mass) 173 190 The result of the cases seems to be that a confession is not inadmissible although made after an exhortation or admonition or other similar influence, proceeding at a prior time from some one who has nothing to do with the apprehension prosecution or examination of the prisoner for a promise made by a person who interferes without any authority of this kind is not to be presumed to have such an effect on the mind of the prisoner as to induce him to confess that he is guilty of a crime of which he is innocent' 3 Russ Cr p 393

Confessions made by signs or gestures Under this head we may group direct admissions of guilt in the form of affirmative gestures, nods or signs

S. 24. made in response to leading questions or to questions which assume the guilt of the person addressed. An affirmative nod in response to a direct accusation of crime is no less a confession than an oral statement. If the accusation is coupled with a threat or a promise evidence of the nod or gesture should be rejected as an attempt to accomplish by indirection what cannot be done directly. Acts speak louder than words. Express gestures often manifest more clearly the emotion of the mind than the most forcible and vehement language. A direct confession by an act is therefore inadmissible whenever the spoken or written word would be excluded. Underhill C. R. § 141

Accused person. The words 'accused person' in sections 24 and 25 include any person who subsequently becomes accused, provided that at the time of making the statement criminal proceedings were in progress. Smith v. Emperor, 43 Ind. C. 605 = 19 Cr. L. J. 189. Section 24 of the Evidence Act would apply even if the person who is said to have made the confession was not an accused person at the time when he made the confession. It is sufficient if the person ultimately comes to be an accused person with reference to the charge in respect of which he is said to have made the confession. Per Shah J. in Emperor v. Gunga, 22 Bom. L. R. 1247 = 59 Ind. C. 324. Formal accusation or custody is unnecessary. In the matter of Huan Mya alias Abdool Wahid, T. C. L. R. 21. The test which has to be applied in deciding whether this section applies, is the position of the person at the time when it is proposed to prove the admission not his position at the time when he is alleged to have made it. A confession therefore, made to a Police officer by a person when he is not accused of any offence is inadmissible in evidence against him when he is accused of an offence. Sah Pua Atung v. Emperor, 13 C. L. J. 465 = 15 Ind. C. 305 = 5 Bur. L. T. 92. The incriminating statements of a third person that he committed the crime for which the accused is on trial are hearsay. Such persons must be produced as witnesses. Rhea v. State, 10 Yerg. (Tenn). Accordingly evidence on a trial for homicide that a person who was present when the deceased was killed, then stated that he and not the accused had shot the deceased, is properly excluded unless the person whose statement is offered shall be produced as a witness. Selby v. Commonwealth (Ky) 80 S. W. 221. The prisoner may, of course, disprove his guilt by proving the guilt of some other person. But he cannot do that by introducing the extra-judicial confession or declaration of that person that he intended to commit, or that he had committed the crime. The extra-judicial declaration is never conclusive upon the declarant. He may, if he be subsequently indicted because of this so-called confession, demonstrate its falsity and absolve himself. To receive such statements is exculpatory proof, would be to open wide the door for the practice of fraud whereby the acquittal of the real criminal would be assured. Underhill C. R. § 145.

If it appears "The words lend some colour to the argument that the confession ought to be made to appear to the Judge to have been improperly induced—in other words that the onus probandi is in the first instance on the prisoner. I do not need to that argument. A confession may appear to the Judge to have been the result of inducement on the face of it and apart from any proof at all. In every case I contend, where a prisoner says he has been forced to confess, the Judge is put upon judicial enquiry, and as I ended before I end now that enquiry should precede the admission of the confession and any examination into its truth. Lex, 2 Bom. L. R. (Journal) 163. 'A confession to be admitted at all in evidence must be proved to have been made voluntarily and not to have been caused by any of the means mentioned in section 24 of the Indian Evidence Act read with sections 28 and 29 of the same Act. When admitted it is to be dealt with like any other piece of evidence, and acted on only if it is believed to be true.' Per Parsons J. in Queen Empress v. Baiya Dayadin, cited in 5 Bom. L. R. (Journal) 163. But Fullon J. in Queen Empress v. Basuanta, 25 B. L. R. = 71 Bom. L. R. 761 (765) dissenting from the above case said "The use of the word 'appears' indicates, it may be argued, a lesser degree of probability than would be necessary if proof has been required. A Court might perhaps in a particular case fairly hesitate to say that it was proved that the confession had been unlawfully obtained and yet might be in a position to say that such appearance to it to have been the case" It is not possible for a Court to say that the making of a confession appears to have been caused by any inducement, threat or promise except upon evidence before it. The inference may be suggested by the confession itself or by the evidence of the prosecution or by evidence adduced by the accused person or by the surrounding circumstances which the Court is always bound to take into consideration but the conclusion cannot be reached on surmise or conjecture. Whether or not a confession is admissible in evidence is a matter which is to be decided after a full consideration of the evidence and the particular circumstances of each case. Budhoo v Emperor, A I R 1925 Lah 676=29 Cr L J 385=108 Ind Cas 387. If in the circumstances of a case it appears to the Court that there is reason to suspect that a confession was obtained by inducement so as to bring it under the provisions of section 24 of the Evidence Act, the prosecution to make the confession admissible in evidence against the accused must show that it was freely made. Ashutosh v Emperor, 68 Ind Cas 413=26 C W N 64=23 Cr L J 573. It is not possible for a Court to say that the making of the confession 'appears' to it to have been caused by any inducement, threat, or promise, except upon evidence which is before the Court. The inference may be suggested by the confession itself, or by the evidence of the prosecution, or by the evidence adduced by the accused person, or by surrounding circumstances which the Court is always bound to take into consideration, but the conclusion cannot be reached on surmise or conjecture. Emperor v Dewan Kahan, 4 Pat L F 186=72 Ind Cas 961=24 Cr L J 497=A I R 1923 P 13. When the admissibility of a confession depends upon a conclusion as to the truth about conflicting evidence antecedent to the making of the confession and tending to show that it is liable to rejection under section 24, the trial Judge must make up his mind upon this issue and decide the question of admissibility before relying upon the contents of the confession. Fatil Chand v Emperor, L R 6 A 89 C=26 Cr L J 937=86 Ind Cas 1091=A I R 1925 All 606.

In Emperor v Panchani Dutt 29 C W N 300=52 C 67=86 Ind Cas 414=26 Cr L J 782=A I R 1925 Cal 587, Mr Justice Mookerjee said "There are words and expressions in this section to which one must pointedly direct his attention in order to construe the section. There occurs the word 'appears', the 'inducement threat or promise having reference to the charge against the accused person' must proceed from a person in authority, but nothing is said as to the person to whom it is to be directed, it is enough if such inducement, threat or promise would in the opinion of the Court be sufficient to give the accused person grounds which would appear to the accused person (and not the Court) reasonable for supposing that by making the confessions he would gain an advantage or avoid an evil of the nature contemplated in the section. It will be seen therefore that the mentality of the accused has to be judged rather than that of the person in authority. That being so not merely natural words, but words accompanied by acts or conduct as well on the part of the person in authority, which may be construed by the accused person situated as he then is, as amounting to an inducement, threat or promise will have to be taken into account. A perfectly innocent expression, coupled with acts and conduct on the part of the person in authority together with the surrounding circumstances may amount to inducement, threat or promise. In scrutinising a case from the point of view of section 24 of the Evidence Act the Court will have to perform a three fold function. It will have as a Court, to determine the sufficiency of the inducement threat or promise as affording certain grounds, it will have again to clothe itself with the mentality of the accused to see whether the grounds would appear to the accused reasonable for a supposition that is mentioned in the section. Lastly it will have to judge as a Court if the confession appears to have been caused in consequence of the inducement, threat or promise. The use of these vague expressions has been deliberately made with the object of securing absolute fairness in the matter of admitting confessions in judicial proceedings. It is indeed very difficult to lay down a hard and fast rule as to the sufficiency of the circumstances which would make the confession irrelevant under the provisions of this section. Reported decisions afford us little help in this direction. A study of the cases, bearing upon the question, which are too

S-24. numerous to mention, would show that anything ranging between the barest suspicion on the one hand and absolute certainty on the other has been held to be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the section. In this connection reference may be made to Reg v Balwant, 11 B H C R 137, Queen Empress v Deo Ana 15 B 452 Emperor v Mulham Kumar, 1 C L R 275 (281), Queen Empress v Ghanya, 19 B 728 (731), Emperor v Bhagi, 8 Bom L R 93 Ghatu Pramanik v King Emperor, 28 C 613 at 617 and Ashutosh Dutt v King Emperor, 26 C W N 54. The true view seems to have been taken in the case of Queen Empress v Basanta, 25 B 168, where it was said that the section does not require positive proof (as defined in section 3 of the Act) of improper inducement to justify the rejection of the confession, the word 'appears' indicating a lesser degree of probability than would be necessary if 'proof' had been required. There is some diversity of judicial opinion on the question regarding the quantum of proof as to the voluntary character of a confession viz., whether the prosecution will have to prove affirmatively that it was voluntarily made or they should do so only in the event of a doubt arising in the mind of the trial Judge (see for instance the observations of Parke B in R v Warringham, 2 Den O C 44 and of Cave J in R v Thompson, (1893) 2 Q B p 13 at p 17). It is unnecessary to go into this matter, with regard to which there was for some time a diversity of judicial opinion in this country as well, for having regard to the words of section 24 of the Indian Evidence Act and also to the presumption attaching to certain recorded confessions, and arising under section 80 of the Act the true and generally recognized view is that a confession duly recorded by a Magistrate with the proper certificate appended to it will be admitted in evidence subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in section 24, that under the latter section a well grounded conjecture, reasonably based upon circumstances disclosed in the evidence, is sufficient to exclude the confession because it would be idle to expect the accused to prove the inducement, threat or promise, for in most cases such proof cannot be available. To reject a confession it is not necessary that there should be positive proof to establish that the confession had been obtained by use of threat, persuasion, etc. Anything from the barest suspicion as to positive evidence would be sufficient for a confession being discarded. Raghu v Emperor, 23 A L J 821-89 Ind Cas 903 = L R 6 All Cr 161 = 26 Cr L J 1431 = A I R 1925 All 627 P C.

Burden of proof. The cases are not harmonious upon the question whether the prosecution has the burden of proof to show the free and voluntary character of the confession. Many of the cases sustain the affirmative of this proposition and require the prosecutor to show before the confession is received in evidence, by some evidence that it was freely and voluntarily made. People v Soto, 49 Cal 67 (Am), other authorities sustain at least in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the very reasonable theory that a confession-like most of the acts and utterances which are the result of human agency, is presumed to have been voluntary until the contrary is shown. Rufer v State, 25 Ohio St 461, State v Patterson 73 Mo 695. This view casts the burden of proving that the confession was involuntary upon the accused. In any case it is his right to show by primary evidence that the confession was not voluntary and it is the duty of the Court, in determining the competency of the confession, not only to consider the evidence for the prosecution showing that the confession was voluntary, but the evidence elicited by the accused to prove the contrary in his favour as well. Ex v Fiddment 35 Iowa 541. When a confession is offered by the prosecution in a criminal case it is the right of the counsel of the prisoner before it is admitted to cross-examine the witness who purposes to testify to it as to circumstances surrounding the making of it, and the defence may also call, at the same time independent witnesses and examine them going thoroughly into the whole matter as to how the confession came to be made the parties present, the physical condition and state of mind of the prisoner at the time it was made and then the Court with all these facts before it, is to pass upon its admission. State v Hill, 60 N J L 626 = 47 Atl 814. In Willis v State 43 Neb 102 = 61 N W 2d on page 255 the Court said "In the trial of a criminal case, where the state calls a witness for the purpose of proving a confession made by the prisoner before the trial, it is allowed to defend such information it is the privilege of defendant's counsel to the better practice, to cross-examine the witness as to the circumstances under which the confession proposed to be detailed was given. Counsel cannot wait until the witness has answered and then more to strike the statement from the record if the answer is responsive to the enquiry." So a refusal before the confession is admitted to allow counsel for the prisoner to cross-examine the witness as to the voluntary character of the confession, or to allow the accused to testify, and to explain his mental condition when it was made or to show by the evidence of others that it was improperly obtained is reversible error. Underhill Cr. Ev § 127

Section criticised. "The maxim of the English Courts is that law cannot measure the force of the influence used, or decide upon its effect upon the mind of the prisoner. 2 Stark. Ev 36. But the Indian Act places the responsibility of gauging the force on Indian Judges who have acted upon it. In Reg. v. Natorji Dada bhai 9 B II C R 367, 'Sergeant J' said 'Section 24 leaves it entirely to the Court to form its own opinion as to whether the inducement threat or promise was sufficient to lead the prisoner to suppose that he would derive some benefit, or avoid some evil of a temporal nature by confessing.' We have thus as many stands as there are Judges—Quot judices tot sententiae,—an obviously objectionable practice. But the greatest culprit in the section is the word 'appears'. Thereby the very spirit of English law is abandoned, and it has consequently led to the admission of evidence which would be rejected in England without a moment's hesitation." 2 Bomb. L. R. J 227

Was the inducement sufficient by possibility to elicit an untrue confession of guilt. While no one seems to have questioned the fundamental principle of exclusion of confessions, there has been a decided difference of practice in the kind of test used in applying the principle. It has been seen that the reason for distrusting a confession arises when the person is placed in such a situation that an untrue confession of guilt (more correctly, a confession of guilt irrespective of its truth or falsity) has become the more desirable of two alternatives between which the person was obliged to choose. Thus the essential features of the situation are, first, the fact that the alternative is presented between present silence (or assertion of innocence) and some other prospect held out by and associated indispensably with the confession of guilt, and secondly, the relative advantage of this confession, with its consequences certain or contingent, over silence with its consequences certain or contingent. The exact situation is perhaps apt to be obscured by the ordinary phrase designating "a promise of benefit or a threat of harm" as the circumstances availing to exclude. The truth is that this duplicate form of statement is not essential, it indicates merely superficial features and the situation is always reducible to the single form above stated. Thus, where a promise (for example of pardon) is the inducement for a confession, its effect is to make the certain freedom which will accompany false confession more attractive at the moment than the mere possibilities of freedom, coupled with temporary restraint, which attends silence. Again, where a mob's threat of hanging has induced a confession, the alternative of present certain and future possible safety proves naturally more attractive than present certain death. Thus in both cases—a promise and a threat—the confession is untrustworthy because it has been associated with an attraction too strong to resist. In general, then, the position of the confessing person which causes distrust is that of being compelled to choose between two alternatives, one of which involves a confession of guilt irrespective of its truth or falsity. Each instance presented may be thus stated. What were the prospects attending confession (irrespective of its truth) to be weighed by him against the prospects of non-confession? The test of exclusion thus would be Human nature being what it is, were the prospects attending confession (involving the equalization or averaging of the benefit of realizing the promise or the benefit of escaping from the threat, against the drawbacks, moral and legal, of furnishing damaging evidence) as weighed at the time against the prospects attending non-confession (involving a similar averaging) such as to have created in any considerable degree a risk that a false confession would be made. Putting it more briefly and roughly was the inducement such that there was any fair risk of a false confession? Wigmore § 824

Person in authority—It is an expression well known to English law on question of this nature and although all rules of evidence which were in force at the passing of the Act are repealed, the English decisions on the subject can scarcely be regarded as authorities they may still serve as valuable things. R v Nairn 9 B II C R 358 (189) An inducement or threat, in order to vitiate a confession, must come from a person in authority, and must have some relation to the crime charged. Since the inadmissibility of a confession depends on the relative strength of the inducement to confess falsely, as measured against the prospects attached to non-confession, it is obvious that the various situations can be better grouped according to the nature of the inducement. But the strength of the inducement depends more or less upon the power of the person offering it the rule of law must first specify the kinds of persons from whose mouths the inducements may be regarded as having any value. Wigmore § 821 Unless the person attempting to obtain a confession has the power (apparently to the confessor) to carry out the threat or promise, there is no reason for treating the inducement as likely to produce an untrue confession. It is in such a case not due to the inducement but to the confessor's own discretion, for he has no real alternative to choose between. Wigmore § 828 So by a "person in authority" is meant some one who has the right or power to fulfil the promise or to carry out the threat. The Court cannot undertake to examine into all the collateral circumstances surrounding a confession. A person may be persuaded by friend, by a religious advisor or by an attorney to make a statement of the facts which may amount to a confession and such statement, if not privileged by reason of the relation between the accused and the party to whom it is made may be used. For example X, who is charged with the murder of A is induced by the chaplain of the jail to confess his sins. He accordingly confesses the crime with which he is charged. It has been held that such a confession is voluntary. Reg v Gilham, 1 Moody, Crown Cr. 186, but see R v Radford, tried at Exeter Summer Assizes, 1823 where a clergyman had prevailed on the prisoner to confess a murder by dwelling on the heinousness of the crime, and the denunciations of scriptures against it, without giving him any caution that it could be used against him, and Best C I refused to allow the clergyman to state the confession on the ground that it was improper in the clergyman to violate the confidence reposed in him by the prisoner and expressed a strong opinion to that effect. R v Sparles cited Perke, 78 Williams v Williams, (1798) 1 Hing (cons.) 514.

On principle, such a promise should be of no consequence unless the promisor was one having (apparently) the power to arrest or prosecute. Wigmore § 829 In England the older and more usual view was that inducement to exclude must come from a person who has legal interest or authority in the arrest and prosecution. R v Rou, R & R 153 R v Gibbons, 1 C & P 91 R v Taylor, 8 C & P 734 In 1839 Levin in his note to his 2 Lew Cr C 17, said "The cases seem to establish the principle that where a confession is obtained through the medium of a suggestion made by a person from whom the prisoner can have nothing to hope or to fear it ought to be received." But in R v Dunn R v Stlaughter, 4 C & P 543, Bosanquet J said "Any person telling a prisoner that it will be better for him to confess will always exclude any confession made to him." See also R v Spencer 7 C & P 116. Finally in 1852, the earlier view was confirmed, and the existence of a legal interest in the prosecution was taken as the test—not the mere existence of actual control or influence growing out of social or commercial relations of the persons. Wigmore § 829 In connection with an inducement held out by master and mistress, Parke B in R v Moore 2 Den Cr C 520 said

Perhaps it would have been better to have held (when it was determined that the Judge was to decide whether the confession was voluntary) that in all cases he was to decide that point upon his own view of all the circumstances, including the nature of the threat or inducement and the character of the person holding it out, together not necessarily excluding the confession on account of the character of the person holding out the inducement or threat. But a rule has been laid down in different precedents by which we are bound, and that is, if the threat or inducement is held out, actually or constructively, by a person in authority it cannot be received, however slight the threat or inducement. And the prosecutor, Magistrate, or constable, is such a person, and so the master or mistress may be. If not held out by one in authority, they are clearly inadmissible. But it is only where the offence concerns the master or mistress that their holding out the threat or the promise renders the confession inadmissible. In the present case, the offence of the prisoner, in killing her child or concealing its dead body, was in no way an offence against the mistress of the house, she was not the prosecutrix then, and there was no probability of herself or the husband being the prosecutor of an indictment for that offence. In England a confession to a constable's wife was excluded R v Hardwick, 1 C & P 98 note. But a confession made to a by-stander was admitted R v Gibbons, 1 C & P 97, see also R v Taylor 8 C & P 733. A confession made to the mother of the prosecutor's wife, in the latter's presence was excluded R v Simpson, 1 Moody Cr C 410. So also when it was made to the prosecutor's wife who helped to manage the business. In R v Taylor, 8 C & P 302 the wife of the prosecutor and mistress of the accused was held to be a person in authority over the prisoner. So also is an attorney endeavouring to find evidence for a prosecution R v Croydon 2 Cox Cr C 67. A confession made to a medical man in the presence of prosecutrix and the accused's husband could not be admitted R v Garner 1 Den Cr C 731. A confession made to a fellow prisoner is not excluded R v Shaw, 6 C & P 372 but it is so excluded when it is made in the presence of the arresting constable R v Millon, 3 Cox. Cr C 707.

"So the result of the cases seems to be that a confession is not inadmissible although made after an exhortation or admonition or other similar influence, proceeding at a prior time from some one who has nothing to do with the apprehension, prosecution or examination of the prisoner, for a promise made by a person who interferes without any authority of this kind is not to be presumed to have such an effect on the mind of the prisoner as to induce him to confess that he is guilty of a crime of which he is innocent." Russ Cr 2164.

In a case of murder a surgeon stated that he held out no threat or promise to induce the prisoner to confess, but a woman who was present said that she had told the prisoner she had better tell all, and then the prisoner made a certain confession to the surgeon. Part J after consulting Hulloel B admitted the confession, holding that if the promise had been held out by a person having any office or authority, as the prosecutor, constable, etc. the case would be different. Hignore § 829, Russ Cr 2164, R v Taylor, 8 C & P 734. The prisoner was indicted for placing a piece of iron on a railway, and a platelayer in the service of the company but who was not employed by any of his superiors to see the prisoner, had told him that it would be a good deal better for him if he owned it. The prisoner knew that the platelayer worked on the line. Cresswell J said "I am disposed to think the statement of the prisoner is receivable the witness not being a person having any authority to make any promise, still he was in a position that might reasonably lead the prisoner to believe he had, and thereupon the counsel for the prosecution declined to ask as to the statement of the prisoner." R v Fieun 6 Cox 530, Russ Cr 2165. Phipson defines a person in authority to be some one who is engaged in the arrest, detention, examination or prosecution or some one acting in the presence and without the dissent of such a person. Phip Li 250, J v Moore, supra. R v Luchurst 1853 Roscoe Cr Li 44. "In R v Kingston, 4 C & P 337 Part J after conferring with Littledale J held that an inducement held out by a surgeon called in professionally was sufficient to exclude a confession—apparently the only decision on the point. In R v Garner, 1848, the inducement was held out by the surgeon and the confession was made to him but the master and mistress were present. In R v Sleeman, it was held that the daughter of the master of the house who had the maid servant in her custody for a temporary purpose was not a person in authority. A paid female searcher was held to be a person in authority, and when dependent on being searched said "If I tell the truth shall I be hung?" and she replied No, nonsense. Who told you so? Confession when caused by inducement, threat or promise The terms of the inducement constraintly involve both threat and promise, a threat of prosecution if disclosure is not made a promise of forgiveness if it is (Hills Et 2nd Ed 302) But it is difficult to lay down any hard and fast rule as to what constitutes inducement The question is one for the discretion of the Judge, and its decision will vary in each particular case Nort Et 161 The inducement need not be expressed but may be implied (R v Gilles 11 Cox 69), it need not be made to the accused directly if it is intended to come and does come to his knowledge R v Thompson, (1893) 2 Q B nt p 17, Pouell Et 106 'Before a confession, either judicial or extra judicial, can be received as such, it must first be shown that it was in every respect freely and voluntarily made This means that the confession must not be obtained by any sort of threat or violence nor by any promise, either direct or implied, however slight the hope or fear produced thereby, nor the exertion of any influence And while circumstances are usually invoked to determine whether the confession is voluntary, yet as a safe general rule it may be said that the statement will be presumed to be voluntary, unless it appears that it was inspired by a threat or a menace or procured by promises or inducements or the expectation of some hope or benefit Underhill Cr Et § 126 'The term a promise or threat', as well as the term 'voluntary', are also misleading in another way says Prof Wigmore "for they obscure the fact that (even when threats are used) the situation is always one of choice between two alternatives—either one disagreeable to be sure but still subject to a choice As between the risk and a false confession the latter would usually be considered the less disagreeable but it is none the less voluntarily chosen The term 'voluntary', then, as describing the absence of the vicious element which excludes a confession, is, in ultimate exactness unsound All conscious verbal utterances are and must be voluntary and that which may impel us to distrust one is not the circumstance that it is involuntary, but the circumstance that the choice of false confession is a natural one under the conditions The choice of false confession is associated with a prospect (namely, of escape from present alarm) so tempting that it is not human nature to resist it' Wigmore § 824

The material inquiry therefore, is, whether the confession has been obtained by the influence of hope or fear, applied by a third person to the prisoner's mind. But this, after all, is merely one of several tests or rules, which have been employed as representing a general principle underlying these differently phrased tests. The foundation of all rules upon this subject rests upon an anxiety to exclude confessions that are not voluntary because such are probably untrue. Withers v J in State v Jaigneur, 5 Rich L 400. "The ground," said Chief Justice Shaw in Com v Morey, 1 Gray 162, "on which confessions made by a party accused, under promises of favour or threats of injury, are excluded as incompetent is not because any wrong is done to the accused in using them, but because he may be induced by pressure of hope or fear, to admit facts unfavourable to him, without regard to their truth, in order to obtain the promised relief or avoid the threatened danger, and therefore admissions so obtained have no just and legitimate tendency to prove the facts admitted." This being the general underlying principle—the risk of a false confession of guilt, under the inducement of powerful considerations,—various tests or rules of thumb have obtained more or less currency in the application of the principle to the different kinds of influences that have operated to induce the confession. The only sound and satisfactory test, judged by the above principle, is one which is unfortunately found only in frequent use. "The only proper question is whether the inducement held out to the prisoner was calculated to make his confession an untrue one." R v Thomas, 7 C & P 346, R v Holmes, 1 C & K 248, R v Horabrook 1 Cox Cr 51, R v Garner, 1 Den Cr C 331, R v Reason, 12 Cox Cr 229. The controlling inquiry is whether there had been any threat of such a nature that from fear of it the prisoner was likely to have told an untruth. If so, the confessions should not be admitted. Its exclusion rests on the connection with the inducement, they stand to each other in the relation of cause and effect. If it is apparent that no such connection exists, there is no reason for the exclusion of the evidence. Williams v State, 63 Ark 511. Greenl Ev § 219 (a).

It is much more common to state the test without any reference to the probability of the inducement causing an untrue confession of guilt, i.e. to state that a confession is inadmissible if made under the influence of a promise or threat or (taking the subjective point of view to express a similar notion) if it is made through fear (of harm threatened) or through hope (of benefit promised), and this has been distinctly taken by many Courts to include any sort of threat or promise whatever. R v Moore, 2 Den Cr C 325, State v Long Haywood 451, Bonner v State, 55 Ala 245, Greenl Ev § 219 (a). Another test, quite as early, historically, and quite as common as the preceding one is whether the confession was 'voluntary'. But this phrase, as it has already been shown is so indefinite that it is of little service in itself, and is usually found in combination with the preceding one, called in as a subordinate test. Thomson's Cr 17, State v Jones 54 Mo 479, Greenl Ev § 219 (a).

A confession induced by a false allegation is irrelevant even if it is true. Queen Empress v Chantaman, Rat Un Cr C 153. When the statements made by the accused amount to saying that the other accused were really guilty, and any share they had in the offence was owing to compulsion they are not confession which can be used against the other accused. Queen v Aiso, 7 W R 8.

Confession was made by the accused against himself to a witness. The Judge did not disbelieve it but rejected it because he thought that it was made by the accused under the belief that it would be to his advantage. Itkl that this was not a confession made by promise of reward or by fear and therefore is not invalid. Public Prosecutor v Chandaya A I R (1929) Mad 92.

The question whether or not a statement is to be regarded as admissible as being a confession or not usually arises in the case of a statement made by a Police officer or in the case of a statement made to a man while in custody of the police. Imbar Ali v Emperor A I R 1929 Cal 539.

If or a threat by the Magistrate to come under this section it must be such as to give the accused grounds for supposing that, by making the confession, he would gain an advantage. In this case, before the accused confessed, the Magistrate said to him "It is no use your trying to get out of it. You were seen with the pair of shoes." Held that though the language used might be considered to overcome the mind of an uneducated and inexperienced boy yet, it was not sufficient to overcome the mind of a man of the age, experience, education, and position of the accused, so as to induce him to make a confession, and that it therefore did not invalidate the confession Mukherji v Queen Empress, U B R (1897-1901) Vol I, 147

A punchayat is not a Police officer, but only a person in authority within the meaning of section 24 of the Evidence Act. Therefore a confession made by an accused before a Panchayat is admissible in evidence, if the Panchayat does not make use of any inducement to admit his guilt Emperor v Jasha Beua, 11 C W N 904=6 Cr L J 151. But where an inducement to confess a crime proceeds from a member of the Panch the confession made in virtue of such inducement is not bad under s 24 of the Evidence Act, the member of the Panch not being a person in authority Emperor v Philip Juez Fernandez, 4 Bom L R 785

Admissions made by the accused to the zaildar were not held admissible in evidence in as much as it appeared that the zaildar had told the accused, before the statements were made, that they would get some benefit from Government if they spoke the truth Mutsaddi v Crown, 221 P L R 1911=12 Ind Cas 642=12 Cr L J 554

The suggestion that accused persons should for the ends of justice, be encouraged to confess by the knowledge that if they do so they will receive lenient punishment is one which is likely to convey an entirely wrong impression and to be extremely mischievous Nga Kyaw v King Emperor, U B R (1916) 2nd Cr p 113=17 Cr L J 402=35 Ind Cas 962

Even in cases where certain words used by the Police officer to the accused amounted to a threat that fact would not render inadmissible in evidence the information given by the accused which led to the recovery of articles which are the subject matter of the offence Emperor v Tilak, 17 Cr L J 33=32 Ind Cas 321

Section 24 of the Evidence Act precludes the admission of a confession made by an accused to a Headman as a result of the latter telling him to speak the truth because if the other side called witnesses the case against him would not come out Zeta v Emperor, 18 Cr L J 106=37 Ind Cas 314=10 Bur L T 270

Where the Magistrate in whose presence the confession was made was called as a witness and sworn that the statements made before him were made freely, that the accused willingly, signed the statements when drawn up, that at the time the confession was made no police man was present that the hand cuffs upon the accused were removed and that he told the accused that he was a Magistrate and that only the truth should be stated, held that the confession made by the appellant was not otherwise than voluntary and truthful Daulat Ram v Emperor, 2 Lah L J 653. But a confession made by an accused person under fear which was encouraged by a Police officer in a subtle way in the hours that elapsed before the accused reached the Magistrate is inadmissible in evidence Emperor v Anant, 32 C L J 201

A person while undergoing a term of imprisonment made a statement before a Magistrate implicating the petitioner in the offence for which he had been convicted. But when he was examined as a witness he denied implication of the petitioner in the matter. The statement made to the Magistrate was

Circumstances under which confession becomes involuntary It is very difficult, if not impossible, to lay down any general rule by which the amount or degree of duress or improper influence which will destroy the voluntary character of a confession can be regulated or measured In Hopt v People, 110 U S 58, the Court observed "The admissibility of such evidence so largely depends upon the special circumstances connected with the confession that it is difficult, if not impossible, to formulate a rule that will comprehend all the cases, as the question is necessarily addressed in the first instance to the Judge and since his discretion must be controlled by all attendant circumstances, the Courts have wisely forborne to mark with absolute precision the limits of admission and exclusion" It is very difficult to ascertain what language used to the prisoner would, under the particular circumstances of each case, constitute such a threat or promise The sex, age, disposition, education, experience, character, intelligence and previous training of the prisoner are elements to be considered in determining whether the confession was or was not free and voluntary Williams v State, 10 Ala 33 For it is well known that a determined, courageous and experienced man is not so susceptible to threats or to promise of immunity as a feeble woman or a person of weak intellect or will power Biscoe v State, 67 Md 6, 7, Underhill Cr Er § 128

Inducement at an end "If the impression produced by the promise or threat is clearly shown to have been removed, e.g. by lapse of time or by intervening caution given by some person of superior (but not of equal or inferior) authority to the person holding out the inducement a confession subsequently made will be strictly received Phipps 252 R v Clewett, 4 C & P 224 R v Howes, 6 C & P 404, R v Richards, 5 C & P 318, section 2, infra

Having reference to the charge against the accused The charge here means a criminal charge, or a charge of an offence in a criminal proceeding The words "having reference to the charge against the accused" read with the words "in a criminal proceeding" antecedent, and the words "in reference to the proceedings against him" following imply that the inducement threat or promise must be with reference to the charge of an offence in the Criminal Courts of the country and the language is wide enough to admit of the construction that the charge need not have been framed nor any criminal proceedings begun at the time of the confession In other words the object of the person using the "illegitimate pressure" must be to obtain a confession of having committed an offence which at the time or which will be the subject of a charge and proceedings in the Criminal Courts, with the intent that the confession may be used in the subsequent criminal proceedings In this view it is difficult to understand, Queen v Hicks, 10 B L R App 1 5 M L J Art p 26 The inducement must have reference to any charge against the accused person R v Mohan Lal 4 A 45 R v Garner, 2 C & K 926 A promise or threat to render a confession irrelevant must relate to the charge—it must reasonably imply what the prisoner's position with reference to it will be made better or worse according as he confesses or not Phipps Er 4th Ed 244 Will. Er 2nd Ed 210 302 An inducement to confess regarding one crime will not invalidate a confession as to another and different one. R v Garner 3 Russ Cr 6th Ed 489 (n). But this rule is not applicable where the two offences are so blended together as to form in fact but one transaction R v Hearn, 1 C & M 109, *Tayl. Sufficient in the opinion of the Court The rule laid down in this section appears to be worded in accordance with the wordings of Parke B in R v Hannah More, 2 Den Cr C 522 where he said “Perhaps it would have been better to have held that in all cases he was to decide that point upon his own view of all the circumstances including the nature of the threat or inducement, and the character of the person holding it out together not necessarily excluding the confession on account of the character of the person holding out the inducement or threat” So also section 24, whilst requiring the inducement to be offered by a person in authority, leaves it entirely to the Court to form its own opinion as to whether the inducement, threat or promise was sufficient to lead the prisoner to suppose he would derive some benefit or avoid some evil of a temporal nature by confessing Per Sargent C J in Reg v Nairn 9 B H C R 358 (367), see also Per Earle J in R v Garner, 2 C & K 920

Sufficient to give accused grounds avoid any evil—The Courts have construed these words liberally in favour of prisoners Considering the ignorance of the people of this country and their dread of persons in authority the course adopted by the Court is a very salutary one The question what would amount to inducement, threat or promise sufficient to give an accused grounds, which would appear to him reasonable that he would by confessing gain some advantage or avoid some evil of a temporal nature in reference to the proceedings against him will no doubt be answered with reference to the English decisions owing to absence in the Act itself of any indication of what the Legislature has deemed sufficient Reg v Nairn, 9 B H C R 358, 5 M L J J 28

Of a temporal nature The word “temporal” is opposed to spiritual or religious A confession induced by holding out a hope of forgiveness from God would therefore be admissible in evidence In Empress v Mohan Lal 4 A 46, the threat employed was ex-communication from caste for life This was an evil probably temporal 5 M L J J 29

Influence of a religious or of a moral nature In R v Radford, 1 Mood Cr C 192, a clergyman had dwelt on the heinousness of the crime charged and the denunciations of the scripture against it, and a confession was obtained thereby But Best C J disallowed the confession on the ground that “it would be dangerous, after the confidence thus created, which would throw the prisoner off his guard, and the impression thus produced” to receive the confession But “it seems difficult to imagine that a man under spiritual convictions and the influence of religious impressions would therefore confess himself guilty of a crime of which he was not guilty, or that a man under a strong sense of his spiritual relation with God could hope to please God by a falsehood that a confidence created between him and his pastor or the being thrown off his guard by his confidence, should induce him not to confess (that it might naturally do if he were guilty) but induce him to confess falsely Such spiritual convictions or spiritual exhortations, seen from the nature of religion the most likely of all motive to produce truth They are therefore of a class entirely different from those that exclude confessions A confession is excluded because the motive which induces it is calculated to produce untruth, because it is likely to lead to falsehood If temporal hope exists, they may lead to falsehood Spiritual hope can lead to nothing but truth Joy Confessions 51, R v Gilham 1 Mood Cr C 186 R v Gibney Jebb Cr C 15 R v Wild 1 Mood Cr C 452 R v Sleeman, 6 Cox Cr 245. Threats made but not influencing the accused — Where threats are made to the accused but the accused made the statement deliberately, & uninfluenced by the threats this section does not apply Emperor v Andarao, 49 B. 642 27 Bom L R 1034 = 89 Ind Cas 1016 = 26 Cr L J 1178

Advice that it would be better to tell the truth “On principle” Prof Wigmore ‘the advice by any person whatever that it would be better to tell the truth cannot possibly vitiate the confession, since by hypothesis the worst that it can evoke is the truth, and there is thus no risk of accepting a false confession. The confessor is not obliged to choose between silence and false confession having powerful advantages, the advantages are attached to the utterance of the truth, and however tempting we may suppose them to be, there is nothing in the nature of the temptation to make the statement untrustworthy for if it has availed at all it has availed to bring out truth’ Wigmore § 317. But that theory does not obtain in England. A confession obtained after the advice that it would be better to tell the truth is excluded in England R v Fench 4 C & P 539, R v Hearn, C & M 109, R v Langher, 2 C & K 220, R v Garner, 1 Den Dr C 329, R v Baldry, 2 Den Cr C 42, R v Warrinham 15 Jur 318 R v Gellis 11 Cox Cr C 69, R v Bate 11 Cox Cr 686, R v Dogharty, 13 Cox Cr 23 R v Jennell, 7 Q B D 147 R v Fench, 5 Car 539 Queen v Usher 8 W R Cr 13, R v Thompson, (1893) 2 Q B 16, 18 But in R v Court 7 C & P 486 Littledale J observes “It can hardly be said that telling a man to be sure to tell the truth is advising him to confess what he is really not guilty of. A mere exhortation to the accused to speak the truth could not be construed into an inducement, threat or promise and, least of all, into an inducement to make a false confession, and is not enough to exclude evidence of a confession, not otherwise improperly induced—Gulab v Empress, 9 P R. 1894 Cr. But the suggestion that it would be better to confess made by a superior officer renders the confession inadmissible under section 24 of the Act Nga Phe v King Emperor, 2 L B R 316, but see Emperor v Akhleswar, 5 Cr R 32 = 4 P 646 = 89 Ind Cas 961, where it was held that moral exhortation by direct superior of the accused was not objectionable.

In R v Jarvis L R 1 C C R 96 Kelly C B said “You had better” seems to have required a sort of technical meaning that they hold out inducement or threat within the rule that excludes confessions. “Some cases have gone the length of saying that a statement is inadmissible if it is obtained by telling the prisoner he had better tell the truth. For my part I cannot see any objection to telling every person that he had better tell the truth, but this is very different from telling a man he had better confess, when you do not know whether he is guilty or innocent.” Per Peacock J in In Nabodeep Chandra, 1 B L P Cr 15

Threat of corporal violence. A threat of corporal violence is the clearest case of an inducement, that excludes the confession. To escape the disagreeable consequences of silence—whip, gallows or rack—the threatened person naturally prefers to utter what his tormentor desires to hear, —a confession. He tries to chance to enable him to repudiate his untrue avowal and vindicate his innocence, or perhaps, under the violent pain of the rack, he thinks of nothing but the present relief from agony which his confession will gain him. Wigmore § 833. A confession is not admissible which has been made immediately after the prisoner with others had been threatened with a loaded rifle. It was immaterial that the threat was not made to extort a confession, but to suppress an attempt at mutiny. Queen v Hicks 10 B L R Ap 1. It is a mistake to suppose that a confession cannot be irrelevant under section 24 unless it can be alleged that there was torture leaving marks of personal violence. Under the section, the confession becomes irrelevant if the making of it appears to have been caused by any inducement, threat or promise. Queen-Empress v Narayan, 25 B 543 = 3 Bom L R 122

In R v Gillis, 11 Cox Cr 69, O'Hogan J said "I think the question must be put thus: Was the prisoner induced by a person in authority to make the information criminating himself by the hope of obtaining the immunity of an approver? I think he was. He became a Crown witness in a reasonable expectation that he would escape punishment as a return for his accepted services in bringing offenders to justice." Where a promise of safety was made by a Police officer, to whom the accused confessed, which confession was repeated before the committing Magistrate and the accused also made a confession, although different in some respects, before a Sessions Judge, held that the confession before the Magistrate was irrelevant. Queen v Hussamat, 5 N W P 86.

Inducements involving a higher punishment, mild treatment in prison, or a reward of money. "It is scarcely conceivable," says Prof Wigmore "except in a case of extraordinary circumstances producing the blackest and most hopeless case against the accused) that an innocent man would confess falsely upon the inducement of a mere diminution of punishment. But a few Courts have reached that result, and it in all probability everywhere be followed." Wigmore § 835.

The suggestion that accused persons for the ends of justice be encouraged to confess by the knowledge that if they do so they will receive lenient punishment is one which is likely to convey an entirely wrong impression and to be extremely mischievous. Aga Khan v King Emperor, U B R (1916) 2nd Cr p 113 = 17 Cr L J 402 = 35 Ind Cas 962, see also Sorenson v U S, 143 Fed 520, People v Johnson, 41 Cal 153. Smith v State 125 Ga 252. But difference in treatment while in confinement cannot be an effective inducement to make a false confession. R v Green, 6 C & P 635, Com v Dillon, 4 Dall 116. Although it is difficult to imagine that liberty or life would be voluntarily bartered by an innocent person in lieu of money reward, yet this result has sometimes been reached. Idle R v Horner, 1 Cox Cr 364, R v Blackburn, 6 Cox Cr 337. "It is of course true," says Prof Wigmore "that the lesser offences are often committed by persons lacking food and shelter in order to be housed and fed for a time in the jail, and doubtless instances of the false confession of such offences for such a purpose have occurred. But that is no reason for assuming that ordinarily, or in even an appreciable proportion of cases, there is such force in the offer of a loaf of bread or of a sum of money as to cause us to distrust and to reject absolutely a confession so induced. Where the circumstances of a case show that a false confession was probably thus induced, let it be excluded. But to erect a fixed and invariable rule on the basis of so unusual a contingency is to eliminate rationality from the law of Evidence." Wigmore § 835.

Promise of cessation of prosecution, release from arrest, etc. A promise in any way implying a cessation of prosecution or a release from arrest has usually been held to exclude the confession thus induced. Case, case 1 Leach Cr L 3rd ed 328 (notes). In that case the prosecutor said to the accused "If you will tell me where my goods are, I will be favourable to you." Gould J in disallowing the admission observed "The slightest hopes of mercy are sufficient to induce a confession." In R v Jones, R & R 152 the prosecutor said "If the prisoner only gave him his money he might go to the devil if he pleased." An admission thus obtained was held inadmissible. See also R v Simpson, 1 Moody Cr C 410. In R v Cooper 5 C & P 535 the admission was disallowed as it was obtained by the promise of a Magistrate that he would do all he could. Similarly in R v Patridge the confession was also disallowed because there the prosecutor said "if you will not tell me of course I can do nothing for you." In R v Upchurch, 1 Moody Cr C 465, the inducement was to this effect "if you are guilty do confess it will perhaps save your neck." But ten Judges decided the confession to be inadmissible. So also an implied promise of forgiveness by the prosecutor makes the confession inadmissible. R v Mansfield, 14 Cox Cr 639. see also Broughton v Case, 6 Cr App 3, Stanton v Case 6 Cr

S 24 App 198 Similarly a threat to arrest has been held sufficient threat to exclude confession R v Pratt 1 C & P 570, Thomson's Case 1 Leach Cr L 3rd ed. 325, R v Richards, 5 C & P 318, R v Luchurst, 6 Cox Cr 243

Assurance that 'what you say will be used for you' or "used against you" The advice of one in authority, promising that "what you say will be used for you" was regarded in many cases as excluding a confession. As regards confessions thus obtained Coleridge J said "I cannot conceive a more direct inducement to a man to make a confession than telling him that what he says may be used in his favour at the trial" R v Dreie, 8 C & P 140. The learned Judge reiterated his opinion in R v Hornbrook, 1 Cox Cr 5, where he observed "(The principle is) has anything been said to the party to induce him to state that which is not true, under a hope that he shall thereby benefit himself? Now in Dreie's case the man is told that what he says will be used for him, is thus not raising a hope that if he told his story, whether true or false, it might benefit him." See also R v Morton 2 Moo & Rob 514 R v Arnold, 4 C & P 622. But the earlier rulings were repudiated in R v Baldry 2 Den Cr C 430 by Lord Campbell C J, Pollock, C B, Parke B Parke and Williams JJ. But in R v Moore 2 Den Cr C 522, Parke B for the eight Judges maintained that "however slight the threat or inducement" it could exclude a confession, Wigmore § 837.

Assurance that "you had better confess" The phrases "it would be worse for him if he did not confess or better for him if he did" (1st Pl Cr 2, 634 R v Kingston, 4 C & P 387, R v Wakeley, 6 C & P 175) "it will be better for you to tell and worse for you if you do not" (R v Simpson 1 Moo ly Cr C 410) "you had better split and not suffer for all of them" (R v Thomas, 6 C & P 333, "you had better not add he to the crime of theft" (R v Shepherd, 7 C & P 579), "If any other person had to do in the case, it is better you should tell" (R v Moody, 2 Cr & D 317) "you may as well tell me" (R v Croydon, 2 Cox Cr 67) "because it would save him the shame of a search warrant" (R v Collier 3 Cox Cr 57) "it would be best for him if he would tell how it was transacted" (R v Warringham 2 Den Cr C 447, "if you do not tell, it would be worse for you" (R v Cherverton, 2 F & F 833, R v Coley, 10 Cox Cr 536) and "it will be right thing for M to make a clean breast of it" (R v Thompson (1893) 2 Q. B. 12, 18] were held to be vitiating inducement. "In a given case," says Prof Wigmore "the exclusion may occasionally not be improper under all the circumstances but that such a phrase or its equivalent, should in itself and in common sense operate to vitiate the confession is wholly bad on principle and in common sense" Wigmore § 838.

Proceedings Proceedings mean criminal proceedings. 5 M L J art 9 1 L B R 133 (135). The phrase in reference to the proceedings against him must be read as qualifying the words "advantage and evil." Ibid, Reg v Navory, 9 B H C R 358. The advantage held out or the evil threatened, must be with reference to the proceedings against the prisoner as for instance that by confessing he will not be sent to jail (Reg v Navory 9 B H C R 358) that nothing will happen to him (Queen v Luchoo 5 N W P 86) that he will get off (Empress v Rama, 3 B 12), that he will be pardoned (Empress v Ashgar Ali, 3 B 260) that he will receive a more lenient sentence, that he will in consequence of confessing become crown evidence and the like—5 M L J Art p 29.

Retracted confession—Corroboration of To use a confession as evidence against the accused the Court must be satisfied (1) that it is voluntary, and (2) that it is substantially true. Moreover, it is a general rule of practice not to rely upon retracted confessions unless they are corroborated on material points by credible independent evidence. Crown v Motan 2 S L R Cr 34=10 Cr L J 200 Muhammad v Crown 5 P L R 1915=3 P W R 1915 Cr=16 Cr L J 157=17 Ind Cas 221 Harprasad v Emperor 36 Ind Cas 133=17 Cr L J 453, Sher Khan v Crown, 2 P W R 1917 Cr=75 P L R 1917 Cr. It is a recognised rule of the Law of evidence, that a retracted confession may be used against the person making it but not against other accused jointly with him. Chet Singh v Crown 28 P W R 1907=7 Cr L J 227 Yasin v Emperor 2 C 683. A Judge should in the first instance see whether a retracted confession is voluntary or has been improperly induced. The mere fact that a prisoner puts in a plea of not guilty and denies having made the confession or explains having made it by allegation of police torture, is enough in itself to put a Judge upon enquiry. And he, then, has to decide before admitting the confession at all, or allowing it to be looked at, whether it has been improperly induced. That is a question for the Court, i. e., the Judge to answer in limine. If upon weighing all the circumstances the prisoner's denial and probabilities it appears to the Judge that the confession has been improperly induced no matter how true it may be he is bound to exclude it, it then becomes evidence and liable to be appreciated and weighed with the rest of the evidence in the usual way. Emperor v. Bhagi Iedu 8 Bom. L. R. 697=1 Cr. L. J. 332, King Emperor v. Durga 3 Bom. L. R. 441. Mythi v. Emperor, A. I. R. 1927 Lah. 682=101 Ind. Cas. 247. Bihari v. Emperor, 60 Ind. Cas. 769. Queen Empress v. Anna A. W. N. 1893, 69, Empress v. Mandan A. W. N. 1887, 59 (F. B.), Empress v. Ramanand, A. W. N. 1887 221. A confession duly recorded and certified under s. 164 of the Cr. Pro. Code, is admissible in evidence against a person making it unless shut out by the provisions of s. 24 of the Evidence Act. In India the law relating to the admissibility of a confession is contained in section 24 of the Evidence Act. The question which a Court has to decide when determining on the admissibility of a confession is whether it appears to the Court to have been induced by the means mentioned in that section. The mere subsequent retraction of a confession which has been duly recorded and certified by a Magistrate is not enough in all cases to make it appear to have been unduly induced. Queen Empress v. Basunt, 25 B. 168=2 Bom. L. R. 761.

In the absence of any corroboration by credible and independent evidence it is unsafe in the majority of cases to found a conviction on a retracted confession. A retracted deposition does not of itself afford a sufficient corroboration of a retracted confession. Empress v. Chintia, 13 C. P. L. R. 107, Queen Empress v. Dharmappa, 12 M. 123=2 Weir 376, Empress v. Tila Ram, A. W. N. 1886, 22. Queen Empress v. Rang 10 M. 295=2 Weir 361. Queen Empress v. Ram 19 M. 182=2 Weir 715.

Where the statement of a person in the capacity of an approver had been made under a condition not fulfilled, i. e., that he should be examined at the trial if the prosecution was not prepared to treat him as a witness, preferring to deal with him as a co-accused, his retracted confession would be irrelevant under s. 24 notwithstanding the special provisions of cl. 2 of s. 339 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Mahammad v. Empress, 1 P. R. 1899 Cr., Crown v. Radha Kishen, 9 P. R. 1869 Cr., Iasin v. King Emperor, 28 C. 689=5 C. W. N. 670.

Where a confession was made before a Magistrate under circumstances not liable to suspicion and to all appearances, fulfils the requirements of the law, the fact that it is retracted in the Sessions Court does not negative the presumption of the genuineness of the confession. Queen Empress v. Banda, A. W. N. 1890 173.

A confession before the Magistrate, though afterwards retracted in the Sessions Court, is evidence against the party making it. Queen v. Jema, 8 W. R. Cr. 40, Chit Sun v. Crown, 1 L. B. R. 238. R. v. Raman, 17 W. R. Cr. 49. R. v. Gharya, 19 B. 728, R. v. Gambia, 23 B. 216, R. v. Makulal 20 A. 133, R. v. Kelie, 29 A. 434. R. v. Raman, 21 M. 83. So it cannot be laid down as an absolute rule of law that a confession made and subsequently retracted by a prisoner cannot be accepted as evidence of his guilt, without independent corroborative evidence. The weight to be given to a retracted confession must depend upon the circumstances under which the confession was originally given, and the circumstances under which it was retracted including the reason given by the prisoner for his retraction. Sayad Hussain v. Emperor 16 P. R. 1903 Cr.=153 P. L. R. 1903, Emperor v. Bureswar Dey, 26 C. W. N. 1010, Palan Prya v. Queen Empress, L. B. R. (1872 1892) 423.

A confession though made voluntarily by an accused person before a Magistrate, if subsequently retracted, is not sufficient by itself to justify a Sessions Court in acting upon it. *Queen Empress v. The net result of the authorities on the value of confession seems to be this (i) That it is not illegal to base a conviction upon the uncorroborated confession of an accused person provided the Court is satisfied that the confession was voluntary and is true in fact, (ii) that from the point of view of legality pure and simple the fact that a confession has been retracted is immaterial, (iii) that the use to be made by the Court of a confession, whether retracted or not is a matter rather of prudence than of law, the business of the Court being to make up its mind in accordance with the dictates of common sense, whether it is safe to believe the confession or not (iv) that experience and common sense show that in the absence of corroboration in material particulars it is not safe to convict on a confession, unless from the peculiar circumstances in which it was made and judging from the reasons alleged or apparent of the retraction there remains a high degree of certainty that the confession not withstanding it having been rescinded from is genuine, (v) that when it is a question of using a confession against an accused of the person confessing and the Court would not be prepared to accept the confession per se as sufficient, the corroboration ought to be of the kind that not only confirms the general story of the crime but also, unmistakably, connects the said concerned with the crime Jagan v Emperor 264 P L R 1914=15 Cr L J 626=30 P R 1914 Cr=2; Indu Bai 634=5 P W R 1914 Cr, see also Pat Than v Queen Empress, L B R (1893-1900) 612 Chitambar v Crown 1 L B R 238 It can not be laid down as an absolute rule of law that a confession made and subsequently retracted by a prisoner cannot be accepted as evidence of his guilt without independent corroborative evidence. The weight to be given to such a confession must depend upon the circumstances under which the confession was originally given and under which it was retracted including the reasons given by the prisoner for his retraction. A confession, in itself reasonable and probable must if repeated more than once and retracted only at a late stage in the proceedings has greater weight attached to it than a confession made only once and retracted after a short interval. The question which should be put to the Jury regarding such confessions is not whether they are corroborated by independent evidence, but whether having regard to the circumstances connected with them, it was more probable that the original confessions or the statements retracting them were true. An omission on the part of the Judge to put this question to the Jury amounts to a misdirection. Queen Empress v Raman 21 M 83=2 Weir 233 Queen Empress v Bhagi Rat Un Cr C 242, Queen Empress v Gharyal 19 B 728 If a Judge believes that a confession made by a prisoner although subsequently withdrawn, contains a true account of that prisoner's crime, the Judge is bound to act, so far as the prisoner is concerned, on that confession, which he believes to be true. When a confession is not supported by the evidence of witnesses, a Judge must examine carefully to see whether it gives detail which indicates that it is a natural narrative of what took place in the presence of the man making it and is not at variance with any evidence in the case which is believed and is not merely a parrot like repetition of a story put into the man's mouth. Queen Empress v Mailu Lal 20 A 133=A W N 1897 224 Queen Empress v Mahabir 18 A 78=A W N 1895 227, Bipat v Queen Empress Supp 1 O C 13 R v Jadavdass 4 C W N 129=27 C 295

Where a confession is retracted by the accused on the ground that it was induced by torture and especially when the confession, after admission, is to be taken into consideration against the co-accused under s 30, Evidence Act and the accused has marks of violence on his body, it may be the proper course for the Judge to take evidence about the circumstances before admitting the confession in evidence Queen Empress v Ballappa, Rat Un Cr C 730 = Cr Rg 58 of 1894

If the accused was examined in a language which the Magistrate understood and was able to write, then the record of the examination, if made in another language, is inadmissible and no evidence can be admitted to prove what statement was made by the accused. The practice of the High Court of Bombay has been to deal with confessions in connection with all the facts of the particular case, and while not ignoring the difficulties that surround retracted confessions it has not avoided these difficulties by applying any stringent rule. A confession made before the Magistrate, though afterwards retracted, is evidence against the party making it and the statement of an accused made after accepting a pardon is not inadmissible in evidence by reason of the person making it having retracted it before the committing Magistrate Sahib v Empress, P L R 1900, 19 Cr

There is nothing in section 30 of the Evidence Act which would exclude as against persons being jointly tried for the same offence, a confession made by one of the accused duly proved simply because at the trial, the confession is withdrawn or denied Aung Them v Crown, 1 L B R 133

Certain accused persons made confessions which led to the arrest of certain other persons. The confessions were subsequently retracted, but were corroborated by the evidence of the approver. Held also that production by an accused person while in the hands of the Police, of a thing unconnected with the commission of the evidence is not admissible in evidence against him Mt Chandan v Crown, 3 P W R 1907 Cr

Evidence brought in under s 288 cannot be accepted as proper corroboration of a confession made to a Magistrate and retracted at the sessions trial, especially when that confession was not fairly obtained and was not voluntary Queen Empress v Jadub, 27 C 295 = 4 C W N 129. But a retracted confession where no confession was recorded under section 164 Cr Pro Code, can be relied on when it was corroborated in material particulars by the evidence of an accomplice

S. 24 King Emperor v. Mohiuddin, 25 M 113=2 Weir 800. A confession which was made under the influence of an offer of pardon and was recorded under section 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code cannot be relied on if retracted afterwards. Aga Khan v. Queen Empress, L B R (1893-1900) 8.

An accused's confession subsequently retracted and not tallying with the other evidence in the case, cannot be pressed as strong evidence against him. Emperor v. Pitak, 2 Ind Cas 321=2 O L J 168=17 Cr L J 33. In the absence of corroboration in material particulars it is not safe to convict on a retracted confession, unless from the peculiar circumstances in which it was made and judging from the reasons, alleged or apparent, of the retraction, there remains a high degree of certainty that the confession, notwithstanding its having been retracted from its genuineness. Akshu v. Emperor, 31 Ind Cas 831=16 Cr L J 815. But it cannot be laid down as an absolute rule of law that a confession made and subsequently retracted by a prisoner cannot be accepted as evidence of the plaintiff without independent corroborative evidence. The weight to be given to such a confession must depend on the circumstances under which the confession was originally given and the circumstances under which it was retracted, including the reasons given by the prisoner for its retraction. It is unsafe for a Court to rely on and not on a confession which has been retracted unless after consideration of the whole of the evidence in the case, the Court, in a position to come to the unhesitating conclusion that the confession is true, that is to say usually, unless the confession is corroborated by credible independent evidence. A retracted confession should carry practically no weight as against a person other than its maker. Emperor v. Bheswar, 71 Ind Cas 497=23 C W N 141=24 Cr L J 145=A I R 1923 Cal 217, *Bassueldi v. The duty of a Judge presiding over the trial by Jury is to prevent the production of inadmissible evidence, whether it is or is not objected to by the parties. In considering whether certain confessions are admissible or not he is not confined to the grounds of confessions as contained in the retraction or to the objections as to the admissibility by the accused, but he should look into all the circumstances in order to judge whether the confession is admissible or not. A Judge is not concerned with the truth or falsity of a confession. That is a matter entirely for the jury. He is concerned only with the question of admissibility. They will be admitted only if they are voluntary. If the Judge is satisfied as to the truth of a confession but doubts its voluntary character he is bound to exclude it under the law, though such rejection amounts to excluding truth from the Court. Emperor v. Panchhari Dutta, 29 C W N 300=52 C 67=88 Ind Cas 414=26 Cr L J 782=A I R 1923 Cal 587.

It cannot be laid down as an absolute rule of law that a confession made and subsequently retracted by an accused cannot be accepted as evidence of guilt without independent corroborative evidence. In every case the credibility of a confession is a matter to be decided by the Court in the circumstances of each particular case. Manna Lal v. Emperor, A I R 1925 Oudh 1. In deciding whether a retracted confession is to be admitted in evidence it is necessary to examine not only the statement of the prisoner as to how he came to make it but all the circumstances of the case. There is no rule of law which compels a Court to raise an inference of improper inducement from the mere fact that a confession is retracted. Partab Singh v. Emperor, 6 Lah 415=7 Lah L J 423=A I R 1925 Lah 605. Mohor Singh v. Emperor, 96 Ind Cas 647=27 Cr L J 982. Confession made by an adult man who understood what he was doing though retracted is sufficient for the conviction of the person making it, even although certain parts of it are not found to be true provided that there was a detailed confession and it was made voluntarily and in spite of the fact that he explained the consequences of making it. *Nauwab v. When accused is made an approver Necessarily in every case where an accused is made an approver it must be ascertained whether he is willing to tell the truth or not. No analogy exists between the case of a confession obtained from an accused person by any inducement and the case of an approver. If it were so, practically all approvers' evidence would be inadmissible Ismail v Emperor, 88 Ind Cas 283=26 Cr L J 1115

Reason of the Rule This law is applicable only in India. The following extract from the First Report of the Indian Law Commissioners shows the reasons which prompted the Legislature in enacting ss. 25 and 26. The Police in the province of Bengal were armed with very extensive powers. They are prohibited from enquiring into cases of a petty nature, but complaints in cases of the most serious offences are usually laid before the police dawga who is authorized to examine the complainant to see process of arrest to summon witnesses to examine the accused and forward the case to the Magistrate or to submit a report of his proceedings according as the evidence may, in his judgment, warrant the one or the other course. The evidence taken by the Parliamentary Committee on Indian affairs during the Sessions of 1852 and 1853 and other papers which have been brought to our notice abundantly shows that the powers of the police are often abused for purposes of extortion and oppression and we have considered whether the powers now exercised by the police might not be greatly abridged. We have arrived at the conclusion that considering the extensive jurisdiction of the Magistrate, the facilities which exist for the escape of parties concerned in serious crime, and the necessity for the immediate adoption in many cases of the most prompt and energetic measures it is requisite to arm the police with some such powers as they now possess and we have accordingly adopted many of the provisions of the Bengal Code on this head. In one material point we propose a change in the duties of the police. By the existing law the dawga or other police officer presiding at an enquiry into a crime committed within his division is required, upon the apprehension of the accused, to question him fully regarding the whole of the circumstances of the case and the persons concerned in the commission of the crime and, if any property may have been stolen or plundered the person in possession of such property or the place where it has been deposited (vide s. 19 of Regulation XX 1817). In the event of

S. 25. the accused making a free and voluntary confession, it is to be immediately written down. Then follow other provisions for preventing any species of compulsion or maltreatment with a view to extort a confession or procure information. But we are informed and this information is corroborated by the evidence we have examined, that in spite of this qualification as to the character of the confession, confessions are frequently extorted or fabricated. A police officer on receiving intimation of the occurrence of a dacoity or other offence of a serious character, failing to discover the perpetrators of the offence often endeavours to secure himself against any charge of supineness or neglect by getting up a case against parties whose circumstances and character are such as are likely to obtain credit for an accusation of the kind against them. This is not unfrequently done by extorting or fabricating false confessions, and when this step is once taken there is of course, impunity for the real offenders, and a great encouragement to crime. The daroga is henceforth committed to the direction he has given to the case, and it is his object to prevent a discovery of the truth and the apprehension of the guilty parties, who so far as the police is concerned, are now perfectly safe. We are now persuaded that any provisions to correct the exercise of this power by the police will be futile and we accordingly propose to remedy the evil, as far as possible by the adoption of a rule prohibiting any examination whatever of any accused party by the police, the result of which is to constitute a written document. This of course, will not prevent a police officer from receiving any information which any one may voluntarily offer to him but the police will not be permitted to put upon record any statement made by a party accused of an offence.

As regards sections 25, 26 and 27 Mahmood J observed in Queen Empress v. Dabu Lal, 6 A 309 at p 521. "I have stated these facts as introductory of the observations which I am about to make, that the rules contained in 25, 26 and 27 of the Evidence Act were not originally treated in British India as strictly speaking rules of evidence, but rather as rules governing the action of police officers and as matters of criminal procedure. I may take it that no such rules existed either in the Muhammadan Law or in the English rule of evidence, the only two systems to which the Courts resorted for guidance on questions of evidence in criminal matters." Then after making mention of previous legislation on the subject he added: "These legislative provisions leave no doubt in my mind that the Legislature had in view the malpractices of police officers in extorting confessions from accused persons in order to be given credit by juries in convictions and that these malpractices went to the length of positive torture, nor do I doubt that the Legislature, in laying down such stringent rules regarding the evidence of police officers as untrustworthy and the object of the rules was to put a stop to the extortion for confession by taking away from the police officer the advantage of proving such extorted confessions during the trial of accused persons." Section 25 of the Evidence Act is enacted to guard prisoners accused of offences against unfair practices on the part of the police. Solam v. Empress, 43 Ind Cr 111 = 19 Cr L J 79 see also per Garth C J in Queen v. Hurrah, 1 C 217. In re Huan Mya, 1 C L R 21. R v. Pancham, 4 A 198 (201). The reason why the law in ss 25 and 26 excludes a confession made by an accused, whilst in the custody of a police officer unless it be made in the immediate presence of a Magistrate is that there is room for apprehension that a police officer who is armed with large powers over accused persons, may unwittingly excite terror in their minds and extort false and involuntary confessions. It is his duty to investigate criminal cases and to detect offenders and bring them to justice may make him feel tempted to obtain confessions from accused persons by threat, promise, or other improper influence. Queen Empress v. Dipu, 1 C W N 71.

Origin of the section. As far back as the year 1817 the Legislature, repealing the older rules upon the subject, passed Regulation XX of that year which inter alia had for its object the consolidation of the rules for the guidance of police officers. Clause (1) of s 19 of the Regulation laid down that "whenever a person may be apprehended and brought before a darogah, or other police officer under the provisions of this Regulation, the examination of the prisoner shall be taken, without oath in the presence of three or more credible witnesses who are to attest the examination, and the police officer presiding at the inquiry shall question the prisoner fully regarding the whole of the circumstances of the case, the persons concerned in the commission of the crime, and, if any property may have been stolen or plundered, the persons in possession of such property, or the place where it has been deposited. In the event of the prisoners making free and voluntary confession, it shall be immediately written down, if practicable, in the language best understood by the person confessing, and in the presence of three or more credible witnesses, who can sign their names, and are not officers of the police or connected with the thana establishment. If no persons can be found who may be able to read or write, the more respectable persons in the village shall be required to bear witness, and to affix their marks in the attestation of the writing. The party confessing as well as the witnesses, shall be allowed to read the same when finished, or if unable to read, the police officer recording the confession shall invariably read it over in the presence of the party and witnesses, before it is signed and attested, and shall state at the foot of the paper the day of the week, date, hour, and place at which it may be taken, the original confession bearing the signatures of the party and witnesses, shall invariably be transmitted to the Magistrate and not a copy, and the police officer presiding at the inquiry, as well as the person by whom the confession may be taken down in writing, shall subscribe their signatures to the papers in attestation of its authenticity. Again clause (2) of the same section provided that 'no compulsion shall be used either towards parties or witnesses for the purpose of claiming any information whatsoever, and police officers are strictly enjoined not on any occasion or under any pretext whatever to encourage a prisoner to apprehend upon a criminal charge to confess the same or to excite the hopes or fears of a prisoner by holding forth a prospect of pardon or using threats or otherwise persuading or intimidating the prisoner with the view of inducing him to confess any species of maltreatment inflicted on a prisoner or witness by a police officer, landlord or farmer or by any other persons whatever, whether with a view to extort a confession or to procure information, will subject the offender to exemplary punishment, on conviction before the Magistrate or Court of Circuit.' After laying down these stringent rules, clause (3) of the section goes on to say "whenever a confession may be taken at night, or at any other place than the police thana the special reasons for its having been so taken shall be stated in the dargah's report. These legislative provisions were made with a view to prevent malpractices of police officers in extorting confessions from accused persons in order to gain credit by securing convictions. The provisions of Regulation XX of 1817 remained undisturbed in the statute-book up to a recent time when they were expressly repealed by Act XVII of 1862. The Criminal Procedure Code of 1861 (Act XXV of 1861) although it did not expressly repeal s. 19 of Regulations XX of 1817, reproduced the rules contained in the first two clauses of that section but modified and reversed them in some important and essential details so as to render them even more stringent—a circumstance which shows that the checks placed by the Regulation on the malpractices of police officers had proved inadequate (Ide § 98, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150 of Act XXV of 1861). Ss. 146 and 147 were purely administrative prohibitions to police officers against employing any inducement, threat or promise for obtaining any disclosure or confession and against reducing to writing any statements or confessions made by accused persons. The next three sections (148, 149 and 150) contained even more important rules, which perhaps did not properly belong to the province of Criminal Procedure, but to that of Evidence. Section 148 laid down that no confession or admission of guilt made to a Police officer shall be used as evidence against a person accused of any offence. Section 149 going even further in the same direction laid down that 'no confession or admission of guilt made by any person whilst he is in the custody of a police officer, unless it be made in the immediate presence of a Magistrate, shall be used as evidence against such person. Section 150 runs as follows "When any fact is discovered by a police officer as discovered by him in consequence of information received from a person accused of any offence, so much of such information whether it amounts to a confession or admission of guilt or not as relates distinctly to the fact discovered by it may be received in evidence. Sections 148, 149 and 150 contained more important rules which perhaps did not

S 25. properly belong to the province of Criminal Procedure, but to that of Evidence. Those were rules relating to admissibility of evidence whatever the policy may have been on which they were based, and it is intelligible that the Legislature considered it only fit and proper that they should find a place in the Consolidated Code of Evidence which it was then framing. Accordingly, we find that s 149 and 150 of Act XXV of 1861, were excluded from the region of Criminal Procedure they found no place in the new Code Act X of 1872, but appeared in their proper place as s 25, 26 and 27 of the Evidence Act under the category of Admissions. They have been imported bodily in the same order as they existed in the Code of 1861 they are identical with the rules which they lay down though the language has been improved by some verbal alterations which require no special mention except the omission of the word "or from the class of a person accused of any offence or in the custody of a police officer." In the place of the omitted word or a comma has been substituted rendering the words "in the custody of a police officer" a parenthetical clause forming the qualification of the person whose confession would fall under the section. The removal of the disjunctive word is remarkable and, if it has any effect it is that of limiting the scope of the proviso. Queen Empress v. Babu Lal, 6 A 509 (528) F B.

Scope of the section. In section 25 the criterion for excluding the confession is the answer to the question—To whom was the confession made? The answer is that it was made to a police officer the law says that such confessions shall be absolutely excluded from evidence, because the person to whom it was made is not to be relied on for proving such a confession, and he is moreover suspected of employing coercion to obtain confessions. Per Mithun in Queen Empress v. Babu Lal, 6 A 509 at p 532, Nanoo v. Emperor, 12 Bom L R 1196. In Queen v. Haribol Chunder Ghosh, 1 C 217, the confession, was made in the first instance, to two policemen, and taken down in writing, and the prisoner was then brought before the Deputy Commissioner of Police Mr Lambert, in the Police Office in Calcutta, when he again affirmed the truth of his former statement to Mr Lambert and Mr Jackson, in his capacity of a Magistrate received and attested the statement. Mr Jackson contended that the reception in evidence of the statement admitted was excluded by s 25 of the Evidence Act, it being a confession made to a Police Officer. The fact that the police officer was in this case also a Magistrate does not alter the effect of the section, it does not make him less a police officer. He cannot separate his functions as police officer and Magistrate and therefore is not such a Magistrate as is contemplated by s 26. In delivering the judgment Garth C J said "It is urged by Mr Jackson for the prisoner, that the terms of s 25 are imperative that a confession made to a Police Officer, under any circumstances, is not admissible in evidence against him, and that the object of the section is not intended to qualify the 25th, but means that no confession made by a prisoner in custody, to any person other than a Police Officer shall be admissible, unless made in the presence of a Magistrate. I am of opinion that is the true meaning of the 25th section. Its humane object is to prevent confessions obtained from accused persons through any undue influence, being received as evidence against them. It is an enactment to which the Court should give the fullest effect, and I see no sufficient reason for reading the 26th section so as to qualify the plain meaning of the 25th. *Adu v. I R 1923 Lab 315 Section 27 of the Evidence Act qualifies not only sections 26 and 25 but also section 24. Therefore, when a confession as a whole is excluded, whether by reason of the section 26 or of section 25 or of section 24, so much of the information given by the person making the confession when he was not accused and in custody, as distinctly relates to a relevant fact thereby discovered becomes admissible. Amiruddin v Emperor, 44 Ind C 18 321=22 C W N 213=27 C L J 148=19 Cr L J 307, see also In the Matter of Hiran Miya, 1 C L R 21, Emperor v Hira 21 Bom L R 724 A confession made by an accused person on his trial for illicit possession of opium to a Superintendent of Excise, is admissible in evidence provided no inducement, threat or promise was held out or made to the accused in order to procure the confession. Rohim Ali v Emperor, 45 Ind C 18 284=22 C W N 451=19 Cr L J 524 A confession made to a Police officer is inadmissible in evidence according to sections 25 and 26 of the Evidence Act. Public Prosecutor v Veera Raghava, 15 Ind Cas 800=13 Cr L J 528=11 M L T 407, Legal Remembrancer v Chema 25 C 413=2 C W N 237 A was convicted on the evidence of two Excise Sub-Inspectors, who stated that he offered them Rs 10 per ball of opium as a bribe to let him land unmolested a large quantity of illicit opium from the steamer Kalloria. These Excise officers had been also enrolled as Police officers. Held, that the alleged offer by the accused amounted to an admission that he had a large quantity of contraband opium in his possession and being an admission of an offence under the Opium Act, amounted to a confession and was thus inadmissible under s 25 of Evidence Act. The test which has to be applied in deciding whether s 25 of the Evidence Act applies is the position of the person at the time when it is proposed to prove the admission not his position at the time when he is alleged to have made it. A confession, therefore, made to a Police officer by a person when he is not accused of any offence is inadmissible in evidence against him when he is accused of an offence. A confession made by an accused person to a Police officer might be admissible in favour of a co-accused but not against him. San Paw v Emperor, 15 Ind Cas 305 As section 26 of the Evidence Act applies only to proof of a confession as against the maker, so it should be held that section 25 has similar scope and both these sections were intended to prevent the use, as evidence against the maker of confessions made actually or in effect to Police officers. Section 25 of the Evidence Act, was not concerned with the statements of witnesses. Suami Pillai v Emperor, 1912 M W N 549=12 M L T 1=13 Cr L J 302=14 Ind Cas 890=35 M 397 But when an accused is examined as a witness by a Police officer his statement is inadmissible under this section. Empress v Jadabdas, 4 C W N 129 In that case the Court observed at page 143 "It has been already mentioned that the statement obtained by the Police from the mother of Jadab Das is said to have incriminated Rai Charan the Inspector examined him as a witness reducing his statement to writing and that he then arrested Rai Charan. The impropriety of such proceedings is aggravated by the course taken by the Sessions Judge. He examined the Sub-Inspector in regard to that statement and he thus admitted it as evidence in the trial. The statement cannot be regarded otherwise than as a confession made by Rai Charan to the Sub-Inspector. If it be so regarded it was clearly inadmissible under section 25 of the Evidence Act. If on the other hand it was to be used as evidence against the other prisoners, it was manifestly inadmissible." Section 25 only provides that no confession made to a Police officer shall be proved as against a person accused of any offence. It does not preclude the counsel for one accused person, on his client's behalf, from asking questions to prove a confession made to the police by another accused person tried jointly with him such a confession is not to be treated or received as evidence against the person making it. The Judge should instruct the jury accordingly. Imperatrix v Pitamber, 2 B 61

Confession—Definition of A confession is an admission made at any time by a person charged with a crime, stating or suggesting the inference that he committed the crime. Not only statements which amount to a direct acknowledgment of guilt are confessions, but also inculpatory statements which although they fall short of being actual admission of guilt, yet suggest an inference of guilt and from which an inference of guilt follows. The factor determining whether a statement amounts to a confession or not is, not the motive of the party making it but the fact that it leads to an inference of guilt. M. E. Thar King Emperor, 5 L B R 131=4 Ind Cas 1028=11 Cr L J 153. Confession in this section as in section 24, means a confession made by an accused person which it is proposed to prove against him to establish an offence. Queen Empress v. Tribhoban, 9 B 131.

Police officer, meaning of "In construing the 25th section of the Evidence Act of 1872, I consider that the term 'police officer' should be read not in any strict technical sense but according to its more comprehensive and popular meaning." Per Garth C J in Queen v. Turberville 1 C 207 (21c). A Deputy Commissioner of Police in Calcutta is a Police officer. Ibid. Primarily the term 'Police officer' in this section means the same as it does in the Police Act but it can be extended beyond the definition in section 1 of the Police Act to cover only those persons who like Police officers coming within that definition, are so much more interested in obtaining convictions than any member of the community that they might possibly resort to improper means for doing so. That class does not include police patel in Berar. Emperor v. Akia, 23 N L R 23=101 Ind Cas 599=A I R 1927 Nag 222, M. Mechu v. Emperor, 82 Ind Cas 32=76 Cr L J 1098=A I R 1925 Nag 340. There is some conflict of opinion between Bombay High Court and other High Courts as regards whether an excise officer is a police officer or not. An excise peon having the power to detain, search, seize and arrest any person whom he believes to be guilty of any offence under the Opium Act or Bombay Abkari Act has powers which are very similar to those exercised by a Police officer. Any admission made to him is therefore inadmissible under the provisions of s 25. Emperor v Dinkar, A I R 1929 Bom 70=31 Bom L R 49, Nanoo v Emperor, A I R 1927 Bom 4 (F B)=28 Bom L R 1196=51 B 78=99 Ind Cas 330 (overruling Raphael Pereira v Emperor, 28 Bom L R 674=97 Ind Cas 665=27 Cr L J 1145=A I R 1926 Bom 517). 26. No confession made by any person whilst he is in the custody of a police-officer, unless it be made in the immediate presence of a Magistrate, shall be proved as against such person

* Explanation—In this section “Magistrate” does not include the head of a village discharging magisterial functions in the Presidency of Fort St George or in Burma or elsewhere, unless such headman is a Magistrate exercising the powers of a Magistrate under the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882 †

Origin of the section This section is based on section 149 of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1861 (Act XXV of 1861) which runs as follows: “No confession or admission of guilt made by any person while he is in custody of a police officer, unless it be made in the immediate presence of a Magistrate shall be used as evidence against such person.” The explanation was added by Act III of 1891, s 3. The rules contained in this section were originally treated in British India as, strictly speaking, not rules of evidence but rather as rules governing the action of police officers, and as matters of criminal procedure. Queen v Babu Lal, 6 A 509 (F B.), see also Muthu v King Emperor, 35 M 397

Reason of the rule “The object of section 26 of the Evidence Act appears to us to be to prevent the abuse of their powers by the police, and hence confessions made by accused persons while in custody cannot be proved against them unless made in the presence of a Magistrate.” Per Burch J in Queen v Mon Mohun 24 W R 33 “Its human object is to prevent confessions obtained from accused persons through any undue influence being received as evidence against them.” Per Garth C J in Queen v Hurribole Chunder, 1 C 207 (215) The reason of the rule seems to be that the custody of a police officer provides easy opportunities of coercion for extorting confessions. Queen Empress v Bobu Lal, 6 A 509 (532)

Scope of the section This section deals with confessions made in the presence of a police officer who has the custody of an accused person, that is, of a police officer who is concerned more or less in the investigation of the case, and those confessions are absolutely excluded, whether made to a police officer or to any other person, unless made in the immediate presence of a Magistrate. The proper construction of sections 25 and 26 is one which excludes confessions to a police officer under any circumstances or in any case, while the person making it is in a position to be influenced by a police officer—unless the free and voluntary nature of the confession is shown by it being made in the immediate presence of a Magistrate, in which case the confessing person has an opportunity of making a statement uncontrolled by any fear of the police. Per Ainslie J in In the matter of Hiran Moh 1 C L R 21 Section 26 is not to be read as qualifying the plain meaning of s 25. Queen v Hurribole, 1 C 207, Queen v Duman 12 W R Cr 82. Section 26 cannot be treated as an exception or proviso to s 25, there being no words to justify such an interpretation. The criterion adopted in s 26 for excluding confession is the answer to the question—under what circumstances was the confession made? If the answer is that it was made whilst the person was in the custody of a

In a case in which three persons B, M and T were charged with the murder of one H the following statement made by T to a Police Superintendent on the day next to the day of the occurrence, while M was arrested but neither of the other two accused was suspected of having had any hand in the murder and was not then under arrest was sought to be given in evidence for the prosecution. The statement was as follows: "The deceased H had killed the previous day was taken with cholera, was purged three times after which the dispute arose regarding the Bengalee bill H had abused M's wife, on which M had given H a push in the throat when H fell backwards and became in-ensable, they tried to get a box and to put the corpse into the box, as the body was too big they had to tie the body to make it fit into the box, they then put the lid after placing a sheet on the body, they lowered the box with a gunny and then tied it up with a rope, they left the box till evening, at 6 P.M. M got a coolie and had the box removed." The statement was held inadmissible. Queen Empress v Meher Ali 15 C 589. Incriminating admissions of an accused under the admitted circumstances that he took the whole of the investigation staff of the police officers round the scene of offence and admitted before him his own guilt are inadmissible in evidence under section 26. Shamlal v Emperor, A I R 1929 Nag 350. A statement made in the presence of a sub-inspector and a constable who had the accused under arrest at the time and not recorded before a Magistrate under s 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code is not admissible in evidence. Nathu v Emperor, A I R 1929 All 835.

Police custody—meaning of. When an accused person is brought to a Magistrate for recording a confession, while the police officer, in whose custody he had been, remained outside ready to capture him if he ran away, the accused should be treated as still being under police custody. Queen Empress v Lakshmya, Rat Un Cr C 855. Where a woman charged with the murder of her husband was taken into the custody of the police, a friend of hers accompanied her, and the police man in charge of the woman left her with her friend for the purpose of procuring fresh horse any confession made to the friend accompanying her while the policeman was away, would not be admissible in evidence as the prisoner should be regarded to have been in the custody of the police notwithstanding the temporary absence of the police man. Empress v Lester, 20 B 155 see also Rechoda v Atchoda 3 M H C 31. Two accused persons admitted the offence imputed to them to the persons who assisted the police in the investigation. The first accused accompanied the police and others to his house where certain of the stolen property was discovered. The second accused was not taken there till after discovery. Held that the confession of the second accused was not sustainable as an admission of the accused made while in police custody, was inadmissible under s 26. Queen Empress v Singh 12 P R 1900 Cr = P L R 1900, 56 Cr As soon as an accused or suspected person comes into the hands of a Police officer, he is, in the absence of clear and unmistakable evidence to the contrary no longer at liberty and is therefore in custody within the meaning of ss 26 and 27 of the Evidence Act. Maung Lay v Emperor, 25 Cr L J 381 = 77 Ind Cas 429 = A I R 1914 R 115.

173 The meaning of the words "in the custody of a Police officer" in this section, cannot be extended by implication to cases beyond what is absolutely necessary, that is, where the person is really under arrest or in strict supervision and is merely allowed to go for a few moments to converse with the person to whom the confession is made. But where the accused is not arrested or under supervision, and is merely being invited to explain certain circumstances, it would be going further than the section warrants to exclude the statement that he makes, on the ground that he is to be deemed in Police custody. Emperor v Mahomed Bur, 85 Ind Crs 833. The accused while in Police custody, made a confession on being questioned by the Court Inspector who forthwith produced him before a Magistrate. The latter proceeded to record a confession in the presence of the Court Inspector and after recording it reminded the accused to Police custody. Held that it would be most unsafe to hold that the confession was made voluntarily and that, therefore, it could not be taken into consideration as against the accused. Neki v Emperor, 76 Ind Cas 180=25 Cr L J 116. When an accused person has been in custody of the Police and has made a confession, it is important that the Magistrate before recording such confession under section 164 of Criminal Procedure Code should ascertain how long the accused has been in custody. If there is no record of that fact it is the duty of the Sessions Judge, before holding the confession relevant under section 24 of the Evidence Act (I of 1872) to send for the Magistrate and satisfy himself on the point. Queen Empress v Narayan, 25 B 513. The custody of the keeper of a jail in a Native State, who is not a Police officer, does not become that of a Police officer, merely because his subordinates, the warders of the jail, are members of the police force of that State. In the absence of any suggestion of a close custody inside the jail, such as may possibly occur when an accused person is watched and guarded by a Police officer investigating an offence section 26 of the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872) does not exclude such a jailor from giving evidence of what the accused told him while in jail. Queen Empress v Iqbal Din, 20 B 795.

27 Provided that, when any fact is deposed to as discovered

How much of information received from a person accused of any offence, in the custody of a police-officer, so much of such information, whether it amounts to a confession or not, as relates distinctly to the fact thereby discovered, may be proved

Principle Sections 25 and 26 exclude confession to a police officer under any circumstances, or to any one else while the person making it is in a position to be influenced by a police officer In the matter of Hiran Miya, 1 C L R 21 The broad ground for not admitting confessions made to a police officer is to avoid the danger of admitting false confessions, but the necessity for the exclusion disappears in a case provided for by s 27, when the truth of the confession is guaranteed by the discovery of facts in consequence of the information given Per Oldfield J in R v Babu Lal 6 A 509 (F B) The reason rejecting extorted confessions is the apprehension that the prisoner may have been induced to say what is false, but the fact discovered shows that so much of the confession as immediately relates to it is true R v Butcher, 1 Leach 265 notes (2) to R v Warwick shall, 1 Leach 263=2 East P C 658, Russ Cr 2197 This section was intended not to let in confession generally, but only such particular part of it as set the person to whom it was made in motion and led to his ascertaining the fact or facts of which he gives evidence Per Straight C J in Queen Empress v Babu Lal, 6 A 509 (F B) at p 546 Certain statements made under certain circumstances are rendered inadmissible because the Legislature has in such cases, considered them unworthy of credit, but the taint is removed by the finding upon search, of articles connected with the crime or other facts 3 Mad L Jow Aricle at p 80 "The prisoner's statement as to his knowledge of the place where the property or other articles were to be found, being thus confirmed by the fact, is shown to be true and not to have been fabricated in consequence of any inducement It is this guarantee afforded by the discovery of the property for the correctness of the accused's statement which is the ground for the admission of the exception to the general rule The fact discovered shows that so much of the confession as immediately relates to it is true Queen Empress v Babu Lal 6 A 509 (513 517)

It has already been noticed that the fundamental theory upon which confession becomes inadmissible is that when made under certain conditions they are untrustworthy as to testimonial utterance A very slight probability of untruth to be sure, is sufficient to exclude (a probability much less than that which supports other testimonial exclusions) and the tests worked out are often more or less artificial, but the principle underlies the whole body of rules If now a circumstance appears which indicates that the law's fear of untrustworthiness is unfounded and counteracts the significance of the improper inducement by demonstrating that after all it exercised no sinister influence the confession be accepted. This is the theory of confirmation by subsequent facts, which has been in vogue ever since there has been any doctrine about excluding confessions. That theory is that where in consequence of a confession otherwise inadmissible search is made and facts are discovered which confirm it in material points, the possible influence which through caution had been attributed to the improper inducement is seen to have been nil, and the confession may be accepted without hesitation." Higmore § 856

"But it should seem, that so much of the confession as relates strictly to the fact discovered by it may be given in evidence, for the reason of rejecting extorted confessions is the apprehension that the prisoner may have been thereby induced to say what is false, but the fact discovered shows that so much of the confession as immediately relates to it is true." Mr Leach's Crown Law 3d Ed I, 301 note. In R v Garbett, 2 C & K 490, Martin for the prosecution said "Even in those cases (of improper confessions) the confession of a theft is received if the property be found in consequence." In the same case Denman L C J states the reason for such admission thus "Because it leads to the inference that the party was not accusing himself falsely." "so much of the confession as relates strictly to the fact may be received in evidence, and this is on the principle that so much of the confession is established to be true, and the foundation of the whole doctrine is that the jury ought to hear whatever is true, and are entitled to look for truth through any and every medium that may be calculated to reveal it." Per Withers J in State v Fairnew, 5 Rich L 401

Origin of the rule The section 150 of Act XXV of 1861 (The Criminal Procedure Code) ran as follows "When any fact is deposed to by a police officer as discovered by him in consequence of information received from a person accused of any offence, so much of such information whether it amounts to a confession or admission of guilt or not, as relates distinctly to the fact discovered by it may be received in evidence." That section was thus altered by Act VIII of 1869 "Provided that when any fact is deposed to in evidence as discovered in consequence of information received from a person accused of any offence in the custody of a police officer, so much of such information, whether it amounts to a confession or admission of guilt or not as relates distinctly to the fact thereby discovered, may be received in evidence." section 150 of Act XXV of 1861 was re-embodied in section 27 of the Indian Evidence Act. Queen Empress v Babu Lal, 6 A 509

Scope of the section In Empress v Awarpal, A. W. N 1882 P. 2 Yahmood J held that s 27 cannot be regarded as governing the general rule laid down in s 25, but only that contained in s 26. In Queen Empress v Babu Lal, 6 A 509 (F. B.) the question arose whether section 27 was rightly interpreted in Empress v Awarpal, A. W. N 1882 225. In delivering his judgment Yahmood J said "The question raised by this reference is one of interpretation of the Statute and it may be briefly stated to be whether the proviso contained in section 27 of the Evidence Act governs only the last preceding section or s 25. In order to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion upon this point it seems to me advisable to trace the history of the rules contained in s 25, 26, and 27 of the Evidence Act, so as to ascertain how these provisions find a place in the history of evidence for India. I have stated these facts as introductory observations which I am about to make that the rules contained in s 25, 26, and 27 of the Evidence Act were not originally treated in British India as speaking rules of evidence, but rather as governing the action of police officers and as matters of criminal procedure. Then stating that s 150 of Act XXV of 1861 was repealed and re-enacted by Act VIII of 1869, he went on "What was the exact change of language introduced by the new section? What was its effect? These are questions which must be decided with reference to the point now before us. It seems clear to me that the change of language limited the operation of s 150 of Act XXV of 1861 to the point now before us." It seems clear to me that the change of language limited the operation of s 150 of Act XXV of 1861 to the point now before us.

taking away from it the force of a separate and independent proposition of law, and by reducing it to mere proviso. But a proviso to what proposition of law? Surely not to all the propositions contained in the four preceding sections. The change of language consisted in the introduction of the words 'provided that' as the opening words of the section. The new section by its change of language allowed the imperative rule laid down in s 148 to stand supreme, by rendering the language of s 150 a mere proviso to the rule contained in the immediately preceding section 149, which is expressly limited to confessions made by a person whilst he is in the custody of a police officer. The sections 25, 26 and 27 are identical in the rules which they lay down though the language has been improved by some verbal alterations which require no special mention except the omission of the word 'or' from the clause 'a person accused of any offence or in the custody of a police officer'. In the place of the omitted word 'or' a comma has been substituted, rendering the words 'in the custody of a police officer,' a parenthetical clause forming the qualification of the person whose confession would fall under the section. The removal of the disjunctive word is remarkable and if it has any effect, it is that of limiting the scope of the proviso. But the majority of the Full Bench held that section 27 is a proviso not only to section 26 but also to section 25, and therefore so much of the information given by the accused to the police officer whether amounting to a confession or not, as related distinctly to the fact thereby discovered might be proved. Queen Empress v Babu Lal 6 A 509 (F B) see also Queen v Pagora, 19 W R 51. Reg v Jora Hasji, 11 B H C R 242, Empress v Rama Birappa, 3 B 12, Empress v Panchanan, 1 A 198, Adu v Queen, 11 C 635. Queen v Kamala 10 B 595. Queen v Nana, 14 B 260, Surendra v Emperor 16 A L J 478. Amruddin v A E 24 22 C W N 213. In Queen v Mussamut Luchoo, 5 N W P 86, it was held that section 27 does not qualify section 24. But in Empress v Ram Birappa, 3 B 12, it was assumed that section 27 did limit the operation of section 24 although no express mention of it is made therein, see also Empress v Panchanan, 4 A 198. "The reasons given for and against the view that section 27 controls section 25 also apply with equal force to the question whether that section like wise controls section 24. Although at first sight it may appear somewhat anomalous that an accused person should be prejudiced by a statement made by him even against his own will, for it infringes one of the fundamental principles of law that an act done by a person against his own will is not his act, there is on the other hand the consideration that by whatever means obtained the statement receives a guarantee of its authenticity by the corroboration which the discovery lends to it. The considerations for or against the admissibility of such a statement may be said to be equally balanced." Per Hindu J in Amruddin v The King Emperor, 22 C W N 213 (223, 224)=44 Ind Cas 321=45 C 457. see also King Emperor v Nagachi Pomin, 2 L B R 163. R v Mirr, 31 A. 392, R v Dhurm Dutt 8 W R Cr 13, Bishnoo Manjee v Queen 9 W R Cr 16, 17. The operation of this section is restricted to information from an accused person in custody of the police and does not apply to information from accused persons not in custody of the police. Only so much of the information, whether it amounts to a confession or not, as relates distinctly to the fact thereby discovered may be proved. Per Oldfield J in Queen Empress v Babu Lal 6 A 509 (F B) at p 513, 514. This section refers to information whether received by a police officer or by other person. Ibid. It is manifest that the prohibition laid down in these two sections (25 and 26) must be strictly applied and any relaxation of it in accordance with the proviso of s 27 should be sparingly admitted and only to the extent of so much of the accused's statement as distinctly and distinctly relates to the fact alleged to have been discovered in consequence of it. Per Straight C J in Queen Empress v Babu Lal 6 A 509 (F B) at p 541. But Mahmood J said in the same case. "I hold that the rule laid down by the Legislature in s 21 (read with s 28) of the Evidence Act is a rule absolutely independent of the question of discovery or no discovery to which s 27 relates, that the state of things in India has induced the Legislature to frame in section 25 an equally absolute rule in regard to confessions made to police officers which are presumed to have been made under conditions prohibited by s 24 that the Legislature going further in the same direction, has prohibited the admission

S 27 of even such confessions as are made to third persons by the accused whilst in the custody of a police officer, that not the first two rules, but only the last rule so enunciated is made subject to the saving clause contained in section 26 rendering confession admissible, if they are not made to the police officer but to a third person, 'in the immediate presence of a Magistrate,' which affords a guarantee that the confession was not extorted, that the proviso contained in section 27 is not intended to qualify the absolute rules contained in s 24 and 25 but only the rule contained in the immediately preceding s 26 which relates to confession made, not to the police officer, but to third persons, whilst the persons making the confession is in the custody of the police. In short, I hold that the law of India as to confessions improperly obtained is the same as the rule laid down by Lord Eldon in Harvey's Case, 2 East P C 608 and that confessions to a police officer are conclusively presumed to have been improperly obtained, so as to be subject to the same rule, unaffected by the question of discovery." The test of the admissibility under s 27 of the Evidence Act of information received from an accused person in the custody of a police officer, whether amounting to a confession or not is — "was the fact discovered by reason of the information and how much of the information was the immediate cause of the fact discovered and as such a relevant fact?" Queen Empress v Corwar Sahib, 12 M 153. Under section 27 of the Indian Evidence Act not every statement made by a person accused of any offence while in custody of a police officer, connected with the production or finding of property, is admissible. Those statements only which lead immediately to the discovery of property, and in so far as they do lead to such discovery are properly admissible. Whatever be the nature of the fact discovered, that fact must, in all cases, be itself relevant to the case and the connection between it and the statement made must have been such that statement constituted the information through which the discovery was made in order to render the statement admissible. Other statements connected with the one thus made evidence and thus immediately, but not necessarily directly, connected with the fact discovered, are not admissible. That a witness says that a plan was prepared in his presence is not sufficient reason for admitting the plan in evidence, unless the witness also says that to his own knowledge the plan is correct. Reg v Jora Hasu 11 B H C R 242.

No part of a criminating statement whether amounting to a confession or not, written by an accused person himself while in police custody is admissible either against him or against the person jointly tried with him, unless it has led to the discovery of any fact within the terms of s 27, Evidence Act. Crown v Shuldham, 44 P W R 1914 Cr (F B).

Section 27 of the Evidence Act, is a proviso to the preceding sections which deal with what may or may not be proved as against the person making a confession. Aman Ali v King Emperor 13 O C 309=8 Ind Cas 379=11 Cr L J 631. Section 24 of the Act contains an absolute rule which is not affected by the proviso made for a different purpose in section 27. King Emperor v Aga P 2 L B R 168, Nga Sanya v King Emperor, U B R 1909, 1st Cr Evidence 3=11 Cr L J 41=4 Ind Cas 759, Empress v Kuarpala, A W N 18=225.

This section does not permit statements made by an accused person while in police custody to be proved, when he gave no clue which led to the discovery of the stolen property. Queen Empress v Jai Singh P L R 1900 Cr 56=1 P R 1900 Cr. Where the police were enabled to go to a place where stolen property was discovered on account of certain information given by the accused held that so much of the information as related to the facts discovered could be proved notwithstanding that the information was given while the accused was in police custody. Ganga v Empress 30 P R 1895 Cr.

Bald evidence introduced through the mouth of a prosecution witness to prove the confession of an accused under cover of section 27 ought to receive very little credence by the Court more especially when the accused stands charged with grave offence as an attempt to murder and particularly when more direct evidence to prove the same points are available to the prosecution and which they do not take care to produce before the Court. Shantilal v Emperor, A I R 19 Nag 350.

The broad ground for not admitting confessions made under inducement or to a police officer is the danger of admitting false confessions but the necessity for the exclusion disappears in a case provided by s 27 when the truth of the confession is guaranteed by the discovery of facts in consequence of the information given. Buladi v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 476, see also Gairunda Emperor, L R 4 A 210 Cr

When an accused person has pointed out the whereabouts of the body of a man who has undoubtedly been murdered and has made a confession which not only is uncontradicted by any of the facts proved in the case but indeed receives corroboration in respect of many points, then the confession should be held to be true as implicating the person making it unless he can make up a story to the contrary. It is not necessary that the confession of an accused should receive direct corroboration as to the fact that the accused was concerned in the offence. It is sufficient that there is such corroboration of the confession as to indicate that the accused had such knowledge of the circumstances of the offence as would suggest his taking part in it. Hinga v Emperor, 23 Cr L J 481=68 Ind Cas 17=9 O L J 190=4 U P L R O C 50

When a confession as a whole is excluded whether by reason of s 26 or 25 or 24, so much of the information given by the accused when in custody as distinctly relates to a relevant fact thereby discovered becomes admissible. When the accused himself produced the articles said to be discovered, so much of the information as to the police in motion and led to the discovery is admissible. Amiruddin v Emperor, 45 C 557=22 C W N 213=27 C L J 148=44 Ind Cas 321. Section 27 of the Evidence Act, qualifies not only ss 25 and 26 but also s 24, all three of which lay down general rules excluding confessions and the same broad grounds underlie all the three. Ibid, see also Queen Emperor v Aana 14 B 260 (F B), Harbans v King Emperor 8 O C 395=2 Cr L J 811, Imperator v Dabud, 4 S L R 209=9 Ind Cas 718=12 Cr L J 110. Nga Ban v Queen Empress, U B R (1892-1896) Vol. I 83. Section 27 of the Evidence Act is an exception to the preceding sections, and its object is to provide for the admission of evidence which but for the existence of that section could not be admitted. So much of the information, even if it amounted to a confession, made to a police officer, may be proved as related to the discovery of the stolen articles. The conduct or acts of the accused are not dealt with by section 27 and are relevant under section 8. Mussamat Misra v King Emperor, 6 A L J 839 (F B)=31 A 592=10 Cr L J 212=3 Ind Cas 26, 975 (F B)

The exception contained in section 27 of the Evidence Act to the general rule must be very strictly confined within its legitimate limits. Tara Singh v Crown, 11 P R 1915 Cr

As a general rule, a confession made to a police officer is not admissible in evidence. But section 27 of the Evidence Act makes admissible so much of the accused's statements to the Police as led to the discovery of the stolen property. Legal Remembrances v Chuna Nashya, 25 C 413=2 C W N 267. Where the statement of an accused person is a necessary preliminary to the fact discovered, it is admissible under section 27 of the Evidence Act, the question whether the statement is sufficient to enable the police to make the discovery by themselves or is only of such a nature as to require the further assistance of the accused to enable them to discover the fact, being immaterial. Ibid per Bannerjee J

In order to render a confession not made in the presence of a Magistrate admissible in evidence the fact discovered by it must be one which, of its own force independently of the confession, would be admissible in evidence. In re Choda Achanna, 2 Weir 735=3 M H C 318

Any fact The fact discovered by a statement must be a material thing and not a mental state induced in another person by that statement. Emperor v Chaitu 16 C P L R 122, Sukhan v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 314 (F B). The words "any fact" are qualified by the word "discovered" as used in the section. Moreover the facts discovered must be relevant to the case. Reg v Jora Haspi 11 B H C R 242. "No judicial officer should allow one word more to be deposed to by a police officer, dealing with a statement made to him by the accused in consequence of which he has discovered a fact, than is absolutely necessary to show how the fact that was discovered is connected with the accused so as

S 27. in itself to be relevant evidence against him' Per Straight C J in Queen Empress v. Babu Lal, 6 A 509 (516), see also Adu Shindar v. Queen Empress 11 C 635. The test of admissibility, under s 27 of information received from an accused person in the custody of a police officer is, "Was the fact discovered by reason of the information, and how much of the information was the immediate cause of the fact discovered, and as such a relevant fact?" Mad L Jour p 80 (Article)

Deposed to. It is necessary, in order to bring a case of discovery within section 27, that the fact discovered should be deposed to by the person to whom the statement was made. Mad L Jour p 80 (Article)

Discovered. The word 'discovery' is in ordinary parlance capable of two meanings firstly the purely mental act of learning something which was not known before to a person, and secondly the physical act of finding upon search something, the existence or the exact locality of which was unknown till then. It is in the latter, and not in the former, sense that the word is employed in the Evidence Act and this will be made evident upon considering the principle underlying this section. Mad L Jour pp 80-81. From this definition of 'discovery' it follows that simple statements, or statements made while pointing out the scene where the crime was committed or while producing articles, and showing the connection of the place or thing with the offence are not renderable admissible under section 27, but only statements preceding the finding, upon search or inquiry, of articles or other facts connected with, or referable to the crime. Ibid see also R v Jora Hashi, 11 B H C R 242 R v Rama, 3 B 12 & Nana, 14 B 260. 'The test is was the fact discovered by reason of the information, and how much of the information was the immediate cause of the fact discovered, and as such a relevant fact?' Queen Empress v. Commr Sahib 12 M 153. Incriminating admissions of an accused before the police officer cannot be said to lead to the discovery of several places pointed out by the accused where they are already known and cannot be said to have been 'discovered' in consequence of the said admissions within meaning of s 27. Shamshi v. Emperor, A I R 1929 Nag 350. Adu v. R 11 C 635. Pirav v. E, 11 P B 1900 Cr. But this section applies when the discovery is made by a police officer even when the facts are already known to persons other than police officer. Legal Remembrancer v. Lalit 49 C 167=25 C W N 788. The word 'discovered' is very important. The test is that the fact discovered must be discovered in the sense that the proof of the existence of the fact no longer rests on the credibility of the accused's statement but rests on the credibility of the witnesses who depose to the existence of the fact. The rest of the information is not admissible. But if the accused wishes to challenge the veracity of the statement that it was on his information that the thing was discovered he may ask the deponent to depose to the exact words used by him. Then under section 39 so much of the statement made by him can be given in evidence as the Court considers necessary in that particular case to the full understanding of the nature and effect of the statement. But so far as the admissibility of the words deposed to is concerned, they are still governed by the provisions of s 27 which must be construed as favourably to the accused as possible for it is a section which makes an exception against the accused contrary to the general sections namely 25 and 26 which are in his favour. Karam Das v. Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 338.

Information whether includes Mere Statements. The statement of a person that he killed a person is a fact according to s 3 of the Evidence Act [not illus (c)]. Such a statement made to a police officer by the accused in custody may lead to a mental discovery. But discovery under this section does not include mental discovery. Hence such a confession cannot be deposed to by a police officer under this section. Mad L Jour Art 81. So where an accused made a statement to a Magistrate, detailing at length the occurrence of the crime and there was no discovery of article after the statement the description of it in manner in which the murder was committed was held inadmissible. Emperor v. Rama Dasappa 1 B 12. Mad L Jour Art 82. 'Throughout all the authorities dealing with section 27 the word 'statement' is used interchangeably with the word

'information'." Per Shadi Lal G J in Sulhan v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 344 (F B) at p 353. But Dalip Singh J in Karam Din v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 338 said "In connexion with this it is necessary to bear in mind that the word 'information' cannot be used as synonymous with the word 'statement'. There is no reason why the word 'information' should have been used instead of the word 'statement' in the section if by 'information' statement, alone was intended. The word 'information' is distinct from the word 'statement' connotes two things, namely a statement or other means employed for imparting knowledge possessed by one person to another, and the knowledge so derived by the other person. It is unnecessary to enter into the question whether all means of imparting knowledge by one person to another person are or are not covered by the word 'statement' but it is necessary to emphasize the second portion, namely that 'information' also includes knowledge derived by the person informed from the informant."

Statements made while pointing out the scene of the crime. A confession of murder made to a Police constable, is not at all confirmed by the prisoner's saying "that is the place where I killed the deceased." Reg v Jora Hasji, 11 B H C R 242, Empress v Rama Bura, 3 B 12.

Statements accompanying production of articles. If the prisoner himself produces or delivers articles said to have been connected with the crime and makes declarations contemporaneously as regard them, the act of production or delivery itself may be proved as 'conduct' under section 8, but the accompanying statements cannot be deposed to under section 27, as there is no discovery in such a case. 5 Mad L Journal p 89, Empress v Rama Bura, 3 B 12 (17). In the last mentioned case the prisoner Rama, besides the formal recorded confession, made confessions to the Police officers before and during his pointing out particular places and particular articles said to have been connected with the murder. Held that the confession was inadmissible, see also Reg v Jora Hasji 11 B H C R 242. Similarly in Empress v Pancham 4 A 198 (200) Straight C J said "Now the fact thus deposed to of Pancham, giving up a knife to the daroga in presence of the witness as the weapon with which the murder was committed is of course inadmissible as evidence against him as proving a confession or admission of his guilt. But there are other things in this deposition which appear to me to be not only not excluded as evidence but which come fairly within the meaning of s 27." See also Adu Shikdar v Queen Empress, 11 C 635.

Statements preceding finding upon search or inquiry. The discovery must be made in consequence of the statement. Such discovery proves that the statement is true and is not fabricated. Reg v Jora Hasji 11 B H C R 242. Empress v Rama Bura, 3 B 12. Queen Empress v Nana, 14 B 260.

In consequence of information. "Whatever be the nature of the fact discovered, that fact must in all cases, be itself relevant to the case and the connection between it and the statement made must have been such that the statement constituted the information through which the discovery was made, in order to render the statement admissible." Reg v Jora Hasji 11 B H C R 242. In Queen Empress v Nana 14 B 260 the accused was charged under section 411 of the Indian Penal Code, with dishonestly receiving stolen property. In the course of the police investigation the accused was asked by the police where the property was. He replied that he had kept it and would show. He said he had buried the property in the fields. He then took the police to the spot where the property was concealed, and with his own hands disinterred the earthen pot in which the property was kept. He made a second statement when pointing out the spot to the effect that he had hurried the property there. It was contended that the statements were inadmissible having been made when the accused was in custody of the police. Sargent G J in delivering his judgment said "As regards section 27, it has been contended that it is not applicable, as the property it is said was not discovered in consequence of the information given by the accused to the police but by the act of the accused himself on the spot and the case of Queen Empress v Kamala 10 B 595 following the expression of opinion by Straight J in Empress of India v Pancham 4 A. 193 (206) was cited as an authority for that view. It is clear however, that it was upon the information which the statement gave to the police that they examined the accused to the spot where the earthen pot was discovered by the accused containing the property, and it is equally clear that, if it had not been for this information, the property would not have been discovered, and it is, therefore, in accordance with the ordinary use of such terms to say that the discovery of the property in this case was the consequence of the information. It is the police in motion, the immediate consequence being that the police asked the accused to show them the spot and accompanied him there, but such a proceeding on the part of the police was with the view to the discovery of the property and was the natural consequence of the information they had received from him, and connected it with the final result viz. the discovery of the property as a causa causans. In the same case Jardine J said: 'After further consideration I come to the opinion that, in regard to the extent of the words thereby discovered, we may derive some assistance from the test applied by the Court in dealing with proximate and remote cause of damage, namely whether what followed was the natural and reasonable result of the defendant's act. It being of great importance that the law should, in a matter of such common occurrence, be distinctly settled, I am glad that my doubts have been removed, and the Court is not divided in opinion. But to avoid our judgment being applied to circumstances beyond its meaning and beyond the policy of the law to statements that cannot be regarded as proximate causes, I would refer to Lord Blackburn's decisions, where he discusses Lord Bacon's Maxim, 'It were infinite for the law to judge the causes of causes' and the difficulty of drawing the line (Sneyby v Lancashire and Railway Co, L R 9 Q B at p 257, Dudgton v Pembroke L R 9 Q B at p 595, Hobbs v London and South Western Railway Co L R 10 Q B at p 121). In the present case I am of opinion that the latter acts of Nana are closely connected with his earlier statement as effect and cause and naturally arose therefrom in the usual course of things and are not remote and indirect consequences. 'Section 27 was not intended to let in a confession generally, but only such particular parts of it as set the person to whom it was made in motion, and led to his giving the fact or facts of which he gives evidence. Queen Empress v Babu Lal, 6 A 509 (546), see also Queen v Paqaree 19 W R 51, where it was held that where the article was discovered by the act of the party, even there it was deemed to be discovered in consequence of the information. But in Empress v Rama Bappa, 3 B 12 West J took a contrary view. In Empress v Pauncham 4 A 198, also Straight J expressly laid down a distinction between a discovery by the act of the party and one from his information. See also Queen Empress v Babu Lal 6 A 509, Queen Empress v Kamaha 10 B 597.

The view as expressed in R v Nana, 14 B 260, has also been adopted by the Calcutta High Court. Legal Remembrancer v Chema Nishyut 25 C 413, R v Paqaree Saha 19 W R Cr 57.

The fact deposed to as discovered in consequence of information received or confession made to the police by an accused person must be a fact relevant to the case in which the evidence is sought to be given if it is sought to be admitted as evidence under section 27. Golul Channai v Emperor 105 Ind Cr 683=95 Cr L J 971=6 Pat 611. If arms are recovered in consequence of information supplied by the accused, the statement made by them are admissible under section 27 of the Indian Evidence Act. Mu Ahmed v Emperor 1923 Ind Cr 434.

From a person. Where a fact is discovered in consequence of information received from one of several persons charged with an offence and when others give like information the fact should not be treated as discovered from the information of them all. It should be deposed that a particular fact has been discovered from the information of A B and this will let in so much of the information as relates distinctly to the information therein discovered. Queen v Ram Churn 21 W R Cr 36. In R v Babu Lal 6 A 509 (549, 550) Strickland J observed: 'I have more than once pointed out that it is not a proper course where two persons are being tried to allow a witness to state "they said this, or they said that, or the prisoner then said." It is certainly not at all likely that both the persons should speak at once and it is the right of each of them to have the witness required to depose as nearly as possible to the exact words he has heard.

dually used. And I may add, where a statement is being detailed by a constable as having been made by an accused, in consequence of which he discovered a certain fact, or certain facts, the strictest precision should be enjoined on the witness, so that there may be no room for mistake or misunderstanding. In dealing with statements of this kind which are alleged to have led to the discovery it is of the essence of things that what each prisoner said should be precisely and separately stated. If the witness was not clear upon this point, and the witness refused to be more explicit, the Judge should have paid no attention to it." See also Rama Singh v Crown, 50 P R 1915=7 Cr L J 12. Where all the accused persons jointly pointed out the place where blood stains were found and subsequently the place where the dead body of a person was discovered buried, such evidence is not admissible at all against any of the accused unless it can be shown who made the discovery first. Taguva v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 665, Adam Khan v Emperor 101 Ind Cas 488=28 P L R 187=28 Cr L J 456.

"In my opinion section 27 of the Evidence Act ought to be strictly construed. In a case where one accused has agreed to point out a place, where a fact would be discovered in pursuance of his statement to point out that place section 27 does not cover similar statements of the other accused in police custody." Per Pradeaux J in Kudaon v Emperor, 21 N L R 86=A I R 1925 Nag 407, Budha v Emperor 9 P L R 1922=(1922) Lah 315=64 Ind Cas 502=23 Cr L J 22, Rama Singh v Crown, 7 P R 1916 C=35 P W R 1916 Cr=17 C L J 273=34 Ind Cas 993.

If two persons give information which leads to the discovery of a fact, so much of the statement of each person which relates distinctly to the fact discovered may be proved. The exclusion of confessional statements under section 26 is based on the presumption arising from the custody of the police that they are untrustworthy. As soon as a circumstance is proved which rebuts that presumption, e.g. the presence of a Magistrate or confirmation by subsequent discovery, the confession becomes admissible either in toto if there is a guarantee of a Magistrate's presence, or to the extent to which it is confirmed. If therefore two persons give information which leads to discovery, the statement of both have been confirmed and are admissible. Statements of co accused subsequent to the discovery are irrelevant. Crown v Sulleman, 10 S L R 7=17 Cr L J 506=36 Ind Cas 474.

Where a material fact for instance, the manner in which a theft was committed, has already been discovered by some other means an accused's subsequent statement relating to the same fact while in police custody, is not admissible under s. 27 of Act I of 1872. Manna v Emperor, 9 Ind Cas 232=12 Cr L J 35=3 P W R 1911.

Where the Police succeeded in discovering property in consequence of information received from an accused, it is not competent to the Police to replace the property in the place where it was discovered, and to ask the other accused to produce the property because there is no further discovery under s. 27, Evidence Act, as against the other accused. Queen Empress v Bashyn, 2 Bom L R 1089.

Accused person in custody. The words used in section 150 of Act VIII of 1869 (which is re-enacted as section 27 of the Evidence Act 1872) are "a person accused of any offence or in the custody of a police officer." The only alteration in section 27 is the omission of the word "or before in custody," but this only shows that the operation of the provision is restricted to information from an accused person in custody of the police, and does not apply to information from accused persons not in custody of the police. Per Oldfield J in Queen Empress v Babin Lal 6 A 509 (513). The meaning of the word in the Evidence Act appears to be that, in order to bring a case of discovery within the scope of s. 27, it is necessary that the party making the statement should be both accused and in custody at such time; hence this section will be inapplicable also where the person at the time of making the statement was (a) neither accused nor in custody (b) in custody but not accused besides under the circumstances mentioned by Oldfield J of being (c) accused but not in custody. 5 Mad L J Article p 128. As soon as an accused person comes into the hands of a police officer he is in the absence of clear and unimpeachable evidence to the contrary, no longer at liberty

S 27. and is therefore in custody within the meaning of ss 26 and 27 Maung Lal v Emperor, 25 Cr L J 381-77 Ind Cas 429 "Applying these words of limitation in section 27 to ss 24, 25, 26, the result will be as follows —

(1) A confession obtained by inducement, threat, or promise under the circumstances of s 24, will not be affected by the operation of s 27, when the person confessing is at the time (a) neither accused nor in custody, (b) in custody but not accused, (c) accused but not in custody, notwithstanding any fact of discovery in consequence thereof

(2) A confession made to a police officer by a person who at the time (a) neither accused nor in custody, (b) in custody but not accused, (c) accused but not in custody, is wholly excluded notwithstanding any fact of discovery in consequence thereof. A confession made to a police officer by a person who is not in custody of the police, would not be inadmissible in evidence because it could not fall under the purview of section 27, which is restricted to a person in the custody of a police officer (Queen Empress v Babu Lal, 6 A JOR 304, F<sup>1</sup> Mahmood J and see per Oldfield J p 513 supra)

(3) A confession made to any person, other than a police officer by a person who was at the time in his custody but not accused, is inadmissible even though it may lead to discovery, unless indeed it was made in the immediate presence of a Magistrate' 5 Mad L J Article pp 128, 129

A husband assaulted his wife and his wife died as a result of it. The husband immediately went to the police station and reported that he went to the west facing room and there finding his wife sitting, wounded her and she became senseless. On receipt of the information the police went to the house and found the corpse. Held that the statement to the police was not admissible under section 27 of the Evidence Act as the husband was not at the time of making the statement, a person accused of an offence not having been charged with any offence then. Deonandan v Emperor, 6 Pat L T 533=111 Ind Cr 113=9 Cr L J 790=A I R 1928 Pat 491

Petitioner was neither accused nor in custody when he gave information which led to the discovery of a rifle. One of the prosecution witnesses deposed that the petitioner said where the rifle had been buried, the other deposed that he said "I buried it". Held that in the absence of any other evidence of possession by the petitioner, it cannot be presumed that because he knew where the rifle was he had concealed himself. Khuda Bakhsh v Emperor 1923 L J 238 Section 27 of the Evidence Act does not make a confession which would otherwise be inadmissible, admissible to prove the fact discovered in consequence of information contained in it unless the person who confesses is a person accused of an offence and also in custody of the police. King Emperor v Nga Lung 5 U B R (1916) 2nd Qr p 114=17 Cr L J 402=35 Ind Cas 962

So much of the information as relates distinctly to facts thereby discovered. Two views appear to have been taken as to the extent of the information admissible in evidence under this section. The first view is in favour of putting a wider construction on the words "as relates distinctly," so as to admit not only so much of the information as leads directly and immediately to the discovery of the fact but also the portion of the information which leads immediately by way of explanation. The other view construes the words "as relates distinctly to" to mean "as leads directly and immediately to or is the proximate cause of" 5 Mad L Journal Art pp 129 130. In Queen v Purni Singh 19 W R Cr 51, the accused stated to the Sub-Inspector "that he had seized Khatu Bibi (the deceased) by the neck and pushed her forcibly down that she fell against a plantain tree and broke her neck, that he also took her with his hand that the woman then and there died and that he then attempted to remove the body, took from it a necklace and a pair of bangles which he concealed in the neighbouring jungle. In consequence of the information the accused was taken to the jungle pointed out by him and he there produced from a concealed place the necklace and bangles before spoken of, saying that they were the ornaments he had removed from the body of Khatu Bibi". Held that under section 27 of the Evidence Act that part of the accused's confession which described his assault on the deceased and her consequent death and the way in which he became possessed of the jewels related distinctly to the fact of the discovery of the ornament, and might be proved against the accused. So it is clear from this case, that the Court in this case followed the first view. But West J in Reg v Jora Hasji, 11 B H C R 12 took a different view. He supported the second view mentioned above as will be apparent from the following passage of his judgment namely "It is not all statements connected with the production or finding of the property which are admissible, those only which led immediately to the discovery of property, and so far as they do lead to such discovery, are properly admissible. Whatever be the nature of the fact discovered, that fact must, in all cases, be itself relevant to the case and the connection between it and the statement made must be such that the statement constituted the information through which the discovery was made in order to render the statement admissible. Other statements connected with the one thus made evidence, and so mediately but not necessarily or directly connected with the fact discovered are not to be admitted, as this would rather be an invasion than a fulfilment of the law, which is designed to guard prisoners accused of offences against unfair practices on the part of the police. For instance a man says 'you will find a stick at such and such a place. I killed Rama with it. A policeman in such a case, may be allowed to say he went to the place indicated and found the stick but any statement as to the confession of murder would be inadmissible. If, instead of 'you will find' the prisoner has said 'I placed a sword or knife in such a spot' when it was found, that too, though it involves an admission of a particular act on the prisoner's part is admissible, because it is the information which has directly led to the discovery and is thus directly and independently of any other statement connected with it. But if, besides this the prisoner has said what induced him to put the knife or sword where it has been found, that part of his statement is it has not furthered much less caused, the discovery is not admissible'. This case apparently supports the second view mentioned above. See also Empress v Rama Birappa, 3 B 12.

"It is true that Brodlhurst J in referring to this question in Queen Empress v Babu Lal, 6 A 509 says that no difference is noticeable in the rulings of Queen v Pagaree Saha 19 W R 51 Reg v Jora Hasji 11 B H C R 242, Empress v Pancham 4 A 198 as to the extent to which statements or confessions of accused persons can be proved by a police officer under section 27, but it is respectfully submitted that the case of Queen v Pagaree Saha 19 W R 51 is not reconcilable with the principle laid down in Reg v Jora Hasji 11 B H C R 242, Empress v Rama Birappa, 3 B 12 Queen Empress v Babu Lal 1 L R 6 A 509, Adu Shikdar v Queen Empress, 11 C 635 Queen Empress v Commer Sahib 12 M 153 Queen Empress v Nana 14 B 260 and is indeed virtually over ruled by Adu Shikdar v Queen Empress 11 C 635. The statements of the accused as to the assault would be clearly excluded according to the test laid down in the subsequent rulings as not leading directly to nor being the proximate cause of discovery. The only portion admissible, according to these cases, is that which refers to his taking the ornaments and concealing it in the jungle. J Mad Lan Jour Article p 130.

In R v Nana 14 B 260 263 it was said that there was little or no difference of views of the several High Courts. But nevertheless the section has been the subject of considerable discussion at the Bar at the hands of very learned counsels and at the Bench at those of very eminent Judges of the High Courts in India. A I R 1929 Journal 101.

In Sukhan v Emperor A I R 1929 Lah 344 (F B) the question of the admissibility of an incriminating statement made by an accused while he is in the custody of a police officer was considered. The prisoner in that case was tried for the murder of a boy who was wearing certain ornaments at the time of his disappearance but the ornaments were not found on his corpse when it was recovered from a well. At the trial the Sub-Inspector of Police deposed to the fact that in consequence of information received from the prisoner he had recovered from one Allah Din silver karas (bangles) which were proved to be the karas which the boy was wearing when he was last seen. The witness was then asked to disclose the information communicated to him by the accused which caused the discovery of the fact deposed to by him and he stated that the prisoner had during the investigation made the following statement "I had

S. 27. removed the karas, had pushed the boy into the well and had pledged the karas with Allah Din" The trial Judge admitted the whole of the confession but Jeh Chand and Aya Haidat J J, who heard the appeal preferred by the prisoner referred to the Full Bench, the question of the extent to which the aforesaid confession can be proved against the accused

Shadi Lal C J in delivering the decision of the majority of the Full Bench said "Now, the first thing which the Court trying the criminal case must do is to discover a confession of this description does is to allow the police officer to prove the fact discovered by him in consequence of the information imparted to him by the accused. It is obvious that the fact itself must be relevant to the issue arising in the case, otherwise no evidence can be admitted in proof thereof. It is to be observed that section 27 has nothing to do with the question as to whether the fact is or is not relevant, and that question must be determined with reference to the other provisions of the Evidence Act. When the prosecutor has after satisfying the Court about its relevancy, deposed to the fact discovered by him he has laid the foundation for proving the information received by him from the accused. It is at this stage that s 27 comes into operation, but, before solving the problem as to how much of the information should be received in evidence the Court must ascertain the exact fact discovered by the police officer. If the fact is correctly and precisely defined it would help the Court in determining the extent of the information rendered admissible by the aforesaid section.

The expression 'fact' as defined by s 3 of the Evidence Act includes not only the physical fact which can be perceived by the senses, but also the psychological fact or mental condition of which any person is conscious. It is in the former sense that the word is used in section 27. The phrase 'fact discovered' used by the legislation refers to a material, and not a mental fact. The fact discovered may be the stolen property, the instrument of the crime, the corpse of the person murdered or any other material thing or it may be a material thing in relation to the place or the locality where it is found. Taking the present case as an illustration, the fact discovered is not the karas simpliciter but the karas being found in the possession of Allah Din. It is necessary to draw this distinction because the amount of the information admissible is limited by the precise fact discovered thereby. In other words, the information to be admitted must relate distinctly not to the karas, but to the karas in relation to their possession by Allah Din.

"Having ascertained the fact discovered we proceed to determine how much of the information supplied by the accused may be proved. The language of s 27 when analyzed, shows that the legislature has prescribed the following limitations in order to define the scope of the information provable against the accused: (1) the information must be such as has caused the discovery of the fact. This condition follows from the phrase 'discovered in consequence of the information' and also from the expression 'thereby discovered', used by the legislature with reference to the fact. In other words, the fact must be the consequence and the information the cause of its discovery. The information and the fact should be connected with each other as cause and effect. If any portion of the information does not satisfy this test it should be excluded. (2) The information must 'relate distinctly' to the fact discovered. The word 'relate' means 'to have reference to' or 'to connect' and the word 'distinctly' means 'clearly and unmistakably decidedly or undubitably'. To put it in a different language, the information must be clearly connected with the fact. As I have pointed out, the wording of the section shows that the requirements of both the conditions specified above must be satisfied before an incriminating statement can be received in evidence. These conditions when combined lead us to the conclusion that only that portion of the information is provable which is the immediate or proximate cause of the discovery of the fact. Anything which is not connected with the fact as its cause or is connected with it not as its immediate or direct cause but as its remote cause does not come within the ambit of the section and should be excluded.

In determining the question referred to us we cannot derive much assistance from the English Law. The judgments of the English Courts are not easy to reconcile but the rule followed in the later authorities appears to be that so much of the inadmissible confession as relates strictly to the fact discovered in consequence thereof may be given in evidence, but independent statements though made at the same time, must be rejected. Nor do the judgments of the High Courts in India to which our attention has been invited by the learned counsel on both sides, disclose a complete unanimity as to the extent of the information admissible in evidence under section 27. The consensus of judicial opinion is, however, in favour of the view that the section allows only so much of the information as leads directly and immediately to the discovery of a fact, but that the portion of the information which, merely explains the material thing discovered cannot be proved. This rule is not only warranted by the language of the section which embodying as it does, an exception to the general rule against the admissibility of confessions must receive a strict construction but also conforms to the principle upon which the exception is founded. The real difficulty arises in applying the test to the facts of a particular case. To illustrate this difficulty I may mention a case in which the admissible portion of a confession is so mixed up with the inadmissible one that the two cannot be separated without modifying the language in which the confession was made by the accused. It is cases of this description which have led to a divergence of judicial opinion, and it has been laid down in some judgments that the whole of the statement can be given in evidence, and that it is not competent to the Court to split up the language used by the accused in conveying the information to strike out some words which are objectionable and to admit only those which relate strictly to the discovery. There is considerable force in this argument but I do not see why the protection thrown round an accused person by ss 24, 25 and 26, Evidence Act, would be dependent upon the ingenuity of the police officer or the folly of the prisoner in composing the sentence which conveys the information. Suppose a prisoner on being asked about the weapon of offence says "I buried a hatchet in my field. I killed A with it. Now, it is indisputable that the recovery of a hatchet from the field renders only the first part of the statement admissible, and that the second part cannot be given in evidence. But, if the police officer converts the two sentences into one and represents the accused as saying 'the hatchet, with which I killed A, I buried in my field', then according to those judgments the whole of the above statement would be admissible. The admissibility or otherwise of the information must depend upon its intrinsic character, and not upon the manner in which the sentence conveying the information is framed by the police officer or the prisoner. It would be unreasonable to suggest that a statement which could not be received under s 27, if it were placed before the Court in a separate sentence should be let in as soon as it is amalgamated with the admissible statement. In determining the extent of the statement, which should be provable on the ground of its being the proximate cause of the discovery, the Courts must have regard not to the composition of the sentences in which the statement is concluded but to its substance.

"The information received from an accused person is usually proved by quoting the words used by him, and this is certainly desirable in order to ensure accuracy. But it is not always possible to observe this salutary rule. If the witness, to whom the statement was made, has not reduced it to writing and does not remember the exact words used by the accused, he can depose to it only in his own language. And there is no valid reason why he should not be required to do the same if the admissible portion is so mixed up with the inadmissible one as to render it necessary to give the former in the words of the deponent. Regina v Gould 9 C & P 364, see also Santa v Emperor 19 Ind. The difficulty of splitting up the words used by the accused in imparting the information leading to a discovery was relied on in the judgment of Soyan-muthu v Emperor 30 M 274=A I R 1926 Mad 638 which was followed in Harnam Singh v Emperor, A I R 1928 Lah 308=9 Lah 626. In the last mentioned case Jai Lal J said "The whole of the information including the confessional portion thereof given by the prisoner which relates to the fact include not only the concrete thing discovered by the investigating officer, but also its description as given by the accused including its connection with the crime which is under investigation. While only so much of the information can be proved as has led to the discovery of the fact, there is no legal justification for splitting or cutting down the statement and thus to defeat the very object which section 27 was enacted and therefore, the information must be proved in the precise terms in which it was given." See also Lalji Dosadh v Emperor, A I R 1928 Pat 162=6 Pat 747. So in the Full Bench case of Sulhan v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 344, Shadi Lal J in delivering the judgment of the majority of the Full Bench continued "In the present case I have no hesitation in holding that the confessional statement that the accused pushed the boy into the well is wholly inadmissible, as it relates to a separate matter and had no connection with the possession of the ornaments by Allah Din which was the only fact discovered. Nor do I think that the statement that the prisoner had removed the karas from the boy can be regarded as immediate cause of the discovery. A man may remove the ornaments from the boy, but he may not give them to Allah Din. The removal is not the proximate cause of the ornaments being found in the possession of Allah Din. Some other act must take place after the karas have been removed from the boy and before they came into the custody of Allah Din. That intervening act is the pledging of the ornaments by the prisoner with the latter and it is only this statement in consequence of which the discovery was made." But in the same case Fforde and Jailal J J (dissentient) said "The information 'I had removed the karas and had pledged the karas with Allah Din' may be proved." See also Queen Empress v Vaidya 14 B 260 Shriabhai v Emperor, A I R 1926 Bom 513=50 B 683.

In Sogamuthu v Emperor, 50 M 274=A I R 1926 Mad 638, Spencer J expressed his view of the section in these terms "I adhere to the view which I expressed in In re Nainamalai Konan (A I R 1921 Mad 679) that the statement of the accused that he had in his possession certain stolen property is admissible in evidence even though he himself produced the property." Manju v Emperor (1914) 26 M L J 352=24 Ind Cas 845=15 Cr L J 533.

In Lalji Dosadh v Emperor, A I R 1928 Pat 162=6 Pat 747, Mulla J observed "The learned rakib objects to the admissibility of that part of the statement which refers to the weapon as the one used for attacking the deceased. But in my opinion section 27, Evidence Act, is quite clear upon this point. It is contended on the authority of some cases that the prosecution is only entitled to prove that the accused in answer to a certain question gave information which led to the discovery of the weapon, but common sense requires that the discovery should be connected with and be relevant to the investigation. The omission to connect the weapon with the offence would render the provisions of section 27, Evidence Act wholly nugatory. The whole confession of a prisoner in police custody cannot of course go in but where the confession includes a statement that a weapon was used for committing the offences charged that part of the confession can certainly go in if it leads to the discovery of the weapon. The most recent case on this point is, In re Sogamuthu Padayaru 50 M 270=A I R 1926 Mad 638, see also Shriabhai v Emperor, A I R 1926 Bom, 513=50 B 683.

So far as the High Court of Lahore is concerned that matter has been settled by the recent Full Bench decision in Sulhan v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 344 (F B) which overruled the interpretation of the section as given in Harnam Singh v Emperor, A I R 1928 Lah 308=9 Lab 626. The exposition of the law in the latter case was also not accepted as correct by another Bench of the same High Court in Karam Din v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 333.

But the High Courts of Madras, Bombay and Patna have given a wider interpretation of the terms of the section and that view accords with the view expressed by Fforde and Jailal J J in the minority judgment of Sulhan v Emperor A I R 1929 Lah 344 (F B) as well as in Harnam Singh v Emperor A I R 1928 Lah 308=9 Lab 626. So it is clear that the Full Bench case in Sulhan v Emperor supra following the analogous rule of English Common Law has placed a new interpretation on the wordings of the section while the Madras, Bombay and Patna High Courts as well as Fforde and Jailal J J interpreted the section taking into consideration only the language of the section and very probably being influenced by the consideration as observed by Fford J in Hornam Singh v Emperor supra, that "as section 27, Evidence Act has been drafted, as have been almost all the provisions of the Act upon the English principles of law laid down in decided cases, these principles are very useful guides to the interpretation of the Evidence Act. But in considering the effect of section 27, it must be borne in mind that whereas in England a confession made to a police officer by a person in custody is admissible in evidence, provided the prosecution first shows that it has not been obtained by any improper means such as coercion threat or wrongful possession, section 26 Evidence Act prohibits such confession being received in evidence at all unless it comes within the four corners of s 27." There is no recent English authority on the subject probably due to the fact that in England this question now very rarely arises. In America the tendency of the Courts appears to be to admit the whole confessional statement once it has been proved that some relevant fact has been brought to light in consequence thereof.

The law on the subject is thus stated by Prof Wigmore. It will be observed that, in Mr Lerch's phrase, "so much of the confession as relates strictly to the fact discovered by it" is to be received. In other words, the confirmation admits the part confirmed and that only. Now this falls something short of the logic of the case, for a confirmation on material points produces ample persuasion of the trustworthiness of the whole. It can hardly be supposed that at certain parts the possible fiction stopped and the truth began and that by a marvellous coincidence the truthful parts are exactly those which a subsequent search (more or less controlled by chance) happened to confirm. Such a differentiation is purely artificial, and corresponds to no actual mental processes, either of the confessor or of the hearer. If we are to cease distrusting any part we should cease distrusting all." Wigmore § 837.

If the exclusion of the confession rests altogether upon the probability that the confession is untrue, as we have seen, then if the prosecution produce evidence tending to show and sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that it is true it ought to be received, for in such cases the reason of the exclusion is done away with. All the Courts recognize the propriety of this reasoning, but illogically decline to pursue it to its logical results. If one, accused of larceny being put to torture, confesses the crime and produces the goods from his own possession or discloses the place of their concealment, and they are afterwards found in the place indicated you may it is agreed give in evidence the fact of the finding of the goods conformably to information given by the prisoner but you may not in the same case according to the received opinion give in evidence the prisoner's statement that he deposited the goods in the place where they were found, or that he stole them. But, I assert, in the case supposed, the finding of the goods at the place indicated not only tends to corroborate the declaration of the prisoner that they will be found there, but also his declaration that he stole them and concealed them at the place, if he make this statement. In other words the received doctrine involves this absurdity, that while in passing upon the primary question whether the evidence shall be received, the Court notwithstanding the corroborating circumstances shall find the confession probably untrue and therefore exclude it the jury, considering the same evidence (that the place of concealment was disclosed by him) may find the very fact confessed to be absolutely true." Per Wells J in Berry v U S 2 Colo 211.

A statement leading to discovery of certain articles is, however, admissible under section 27. Emperor v Panyab A I R 1929 Sind 245.

The words used by the legislature in s 27 make it absolutely clear that only so much of such information whether it amounts to a confession or not, as relates distinctly to the fact which is deposited as discovered in consequence of the information received may be proved. Mahibux v Emperor A I R. 1929 Sind 175. Incriminating statements by way of confession, made by an accused person while in police custody, when producing or pointing out articles connected with the commission of a crime, are inadmissible under section 27 of the Evidence Act. The statement of an accused that he buried the weapon of the offence in a certain place is relevant but not that part of the statement that it was the weapon with which he had committed the crime. So also the statement that he would point out a certain spot and the evidence that at the spot indicated blood stains would be found would be admissible, but not that part of the statement that it was at this spot that he committed the crime. Where the accused produces the articles himself though the fact that he actually produced it at a particular place may be proved the accompanying statement to the effect that he buried it there is inadmissible in evidence Santa Singh v Crown, 1 P W R 191, Cr = 19 Ind Cis 190 = 14 Cr L J 190 = 171 P L R 1913. Whether amounts to a confession or not. "The words in section 27 of the Evidence Act 'whether it amounts to a confession or not' are to be read as qualifying the word 'information' in the immediately preceding context, not the words 'so much' and the effect is that although ordinarily a confession of an accused while in custody would be wholly excluded yet, if in the course of such a confession information leading to the discovery of a relevant fact has been given so much of the information is distinctly led to this result may be deposed to though as a whole the statement would constitute a confession in which the preceding sections are intended to exclude. Per West J in Inge v Jora Haspi, 11 B II C R 520. In construing section 27 the word 'confession' does not necessarily mean a complete confession of guilt but means and include any incriminating statement. Karam Din v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 338

Distinctly Under section 27, the information to be proved must relate distinctly to the fact thereby discovered. The word 'distinctly' in section 27 is used in some sense, other than the word 'directly'. It means to exclude certain things and to limit and confine the information which may be proved within definite limits and not necessarily to include everything which may relate to that information. Kiram Din v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 338

Section 162 of Criminal Pro Code and section 27 Section 27 is confined in its operation to an incriminating statement by an accused person while in police custody while section 162 contains a general provision embracing all statements made by persons examined in the course of an investigation. Gola v Emperor, A I R 1929 Nag 17=24 N L R 158, Ganpat v Emperor, 6 N L R 180=1 Ind Crs 1181=12 Cr L J 60. It is no doubt true that prior to his arrest and detention in police custody, an accused person will answer the description of a class of persons referred to in section 160 Cr Pro Code and will consequently be liable to be examined by the investigating officer under section 161, Cr Pro Code. But section 27 of the Evidence Act relates to a statement made by an accused person while in police custody and not to a statement made by him prior to his arrest and detention in such custody. Ibid. So the provisions of section 27 of the Evidence Act are quite independent of those of section 162 Criminal Procedure Code and the amended section 162 does not repeal or in any way affect section 27. Ibid. It has been held in Emperor v Maung, A I R 1926 Rang 116 by a Full Bench of the Rangoon High Court (Hald J dissenting) that section 27 Evidence Act, is neither repealed nor affected by the amended section 162 Criminal Procedure Code, because a person accused of an offence is not any person being within the limits of the station of the police officer making the investigation under Ch 41 or any adjoining station "who from the information given or otherwise appears to be acquainted with the circumstances of the case," and that consequently information received from a person accused of an offence 'in the custody of a police officer' is not a statement within the meaning of s 162 cl (1) of the Criminal Pro Code. The dissenting Judge admitted that the interpretation of the majority of Judges was in accordance with what was in fact the intention of the legislature. He seems to have attached more weight to the ordinary meaning of the words used in section 162 than to the context in which the section appears and the bearing it has on the interpretation of the section. A Bench of the Calcutta High Court has affirmed in Azimuddy v Emperor, A I R 1927 Cal 17=54 C 237=44 C L J 253 that s 162, Cr Pro Code applies to witnesses and not to accused persons under trial, and that it does not repeal s 27 Evidence Act or render inadmissible statements relevant under the latter section, which is observed by a Bench of the Patna High Court in Jagu a Dhanuk v Emperor, A I R 1926 Pat 232=5 Pat 63 that the main object of the amendment of s 162 Criminal Pro Code is to prevent the use of the statement of prosecutive witnesses as corroborative under s 157, Evidence Act and that the section does not override the general provisions of the law with regard to the admissibility of the statements made by accused persons as laid down in s 27, Evidence Act. Similarly a Bench of the Lahore High Court has ruled in Rannun v Emperor, A I R 1926 Lah 88=7 Lah 84, that section 162, Criminal Pro Code applies to statements of persons examined as witnesses in the course of a police investigation, and not to the statement of an accused person, and that it does not override or modify the provisions of section 27, Evidence Act. In the course of the judgment Sir Shadidul C J referred to the observations appearing at p 149 in Interpretation of Statutes which runs as follows "It is in the highest degree improbable that the legislature would overthrow fundamental principles, infringe rights or depart from the general system of law, without expressing its intention with irresistible clearness and to give any such effect to general words simply because they have that meaning when used either in their wide or in their usual or natural sense would be to give them a meaning other than that which was actually intended. Generally words and phrases therefore however wide and comprehensive they may be in their literal sense must usually be construed as being limited to the natural objects of the Act and not altering the law beyond what the same view has been taken by the Madras High Court in In re Gounder, A I R 1925 Mad 74=56 Ind Cas 681 and in In re Gounder.

Venkata Subbiah, 86 Ind Cas 208, while it has been affirmed by the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Sind in Umri Dwar Munshi v Emperor A I R 1925 Sind 237, that the words 'statement of any person' in s 162 Cr Pro Code refer to the statement of any witness in the course of a police investigation, and not to the statement of an accused person in respect of whom such investigation was held. See also Emperor v Aga Tha Din, 4 Rang. 72, Guadita v Emperor, 104 Ind Cas 441, Badrin v Emperor 92 Ind Cas 874, Bahadur v Emperor, 7 Lah 261. There is one case of the Rangoon High Court Baua Ronther v Emperor A I R 1925 Rang. 101=84 Ind Cas 545 decided by a single Judge affirming the opposite view. The effect of that decision is however nullified by the decision in the recent Full Bench case Emperor v Mang Tha Din A I R 1926 Rang. 116=4 Rang. 72 (F B), in which the former case was referred to. There are also some observations made by the Judges constituting the Bench who decided the case Venkata Subbiah v Emperor A I R 1925 Mad 579=48 Mad 610, favouring the view that section 162 Cr Pro Code applies to statements of witnesses as well as to those of accused persons. It would however appear from the remarks of Madhavan Nair J., at p 611, that he adhered to the view that s 27 Evidence Act was not affected by the provisions of section 162 Criminal Procedure Code, and that the legislature did not contemplate to repeal the former when it amended the latter section.

In Nagpur the opinion is divided. Both the Judges who decided Sheobalal Prosad v Emperor, A I R 1928 N. 103=11 N L J 7=108 Ind Cas 442, are in favour of the view that section 27, Evidence Act is unaffected by the amendment of section 162 Cr Pro Code while on the other hand, the opposite view is maintained by the two Judges who decided the case Dadi Lallu v Emperor A I R 1926 Nag. 369. See also Bhappa v Emperor, 100 Ind Cas 823, but see Gola v Emperor, 24 N L R 159. As for the unreported case of Kama v Emperor (Cr App No 6) B of 1926, decided on the 14th October by the Nagpur Judicial Commissioner's Court) there was a difference of opinion between the two Judges who decided it.

Confession made after removal of impression caused by inducement threat or promise, relevant

28 If such a confession as is referred to in section 24 is made after the impression caused by any such inducement, threat or promise has, in the opinion of the Court, been fully removed, it is relevant

Principle The exclusion of a confession necessarily assumes (1) that the inducement if it operated at all was likely to produce a false confession and (2) that it did in fact operate upon the mind of the person. The question arising under the first of these elements—the nature of the inducement, having been examined it remains to notice those arising under the second—the existence and operation of the inducement. Where an inducement sufficient to exclude any confession obtained by it, has been offered the question often arises whether a confession subsequent in time to the inducement was in fact influenced by it. It must be remembered that no attempt was ever made to investigate the actual motives of the person confessing or the put played by the inducement among other motives. The whole theory of inducement rests on the probable effect not the actual effect upon the person. If while that inducement held out a confession is made, no enquiry is ever made into the exact share of influence which the inducement had in evoking confession. Nevertheless, though there is no enquiry into the actuality of the operation of the inducement, and though it is assumed that if it was there it operated, we may often have to inquire whether in fact it was there at all & present to the mind of the person confessing. There are two kinds of cases in which the question may be raised. In the one kind, the enquiry is: Did the inducement, for the person in hand ever come into existence at all? In the other kind, the enquiry is: Was the inducement, for the person in hand brought to an end before the confession was made? U ignore § 853

Scope of the section A confession is deemed to be voluntary if (in the opinion of the Judge) it is shown to have been made after the complete removal of

S 28 the impression produced by any inducement threat or promise which would otherwise render it involuntary. Step Dig Fe Art. 23. So this section should be read as an exception to section 24. But this section makes no provision for consideration whether any inducement came into existence at all. Section 24 contains an absolute rule which is not affected by the proviso, made for a different purpose in s. 27. When the Legislature wished to make an exception to the absolute rule it did so by a separate section namely section 28, which declares under what circumstances a confession rendered irrelevant by s. 24 may become relevant. Statements that are irrelevant under one section of the Act may be relevant under some other section of the Act. No confession made under inducement, threat or promise can be relevant, except in the circumstances provided for by s. 28. King Emperor v. Nga Po Min 2 L. B. R. 169. Although a confession must be taken as a whole and considered along with the admitted facts of the case the accused being judged by his whole conduct, the Court is at liberty to disregard any statement contained in the confession which it deems irrelevant. Kamoda v. Emperor, 46 Ind. Cr. 705=19 Cr. L. J. 785.

Did inducement come into existence at all. The inducement is addressed to the person in question and thus becomes known to him as a promise or a threat directly bearing on his situation. It was intended to be accepted by him and no doubt arises as to its existence for him as an inducement. But where the inducement was not directly addressed to the person but mediated through another person, how are we to determine whether it was in fact present as an inducement? This will of course be a pure question of fact for the Judge. No ruling can serve as a precedent, the conduct and language of the person who shows whether he had the inducement in mind. The important thing to remember however is that unless the inducement was held out, directly or indirectly to the person in question, it cannot exclude the confession, in such a case that person has himself chosen to allow it to affect him and to hope that it will be applied to him by the promisor and thus he is himself responsible by free choice for its effect and not the promising person who cannot be said to have held out an inducement to him. Higmore § 534. So where a person who hears a first prisoner being offered an inducement and conceives the hope that it will be applied to him also makes a confession, such a confession would not be excluded. Jacobs 1 Cox. Cr. 51. Higmore § 534.

Was the inducement brought to an end? "Here" says Prof. Wigmore, "five questions may arise: (1) Must it be shown clearly that an improper inducement once offered, was brought to an end? (2) Are there any circumstances which this showing will be regarded as impossible and thus the inducement once made vitates any further confession of that person? (3) Can the person who has offered the inducement put an end to it so as to make a later confession afterwards made to himself? (4) Are confessions made subsequently but to a person different from the one offering the inducement treated as not made under the inducement or must it be shown to have been negatived by the second person? (5) What suffices, in general, to end the inducement?" Higmore § 535.

Subsequent ending of improper inducement. There must be independent evidence that the influence of the inducement really has ceased. Sherrington 2 D. & C. 123. Pitterson J. said: "There ought to be evidence to show that the impression under which the first confession was made was afterwards removed, before the second confession can be received in evidence in the case; that the prisoner must be considered to have received the second confession under the same influence as he made the first, the time being too short to allow of the supposition that it was the result of free and voluntary determination. A female servant being a party to a conspiracy her mistress on a Monday told her that he would forgive her if she told the truth. On Friday she was taken before a Magistrate and appeared again to her and discharged. On Wednesday her mistress ordered her to appear at the Court of Police with her mistress. She was told that she was not to be released until she liked and that if she had anything to say for herself."

would he it her' but (not knowing that her mistress had promised to forgive her) he did not tell her that if she made a statement it might be given in evidence against her. The prisoner then made a statement. Patterson held that this statement was not receivable in evidence as the promise of the mistress must be considered as still operating on the prisoner's mind at the time of the statement, but that if the mistress had not been present it might have been otherwise. J. v. Hewitt, 1 Cr. & M. 331, R. v. Rue 13 Cox Cr. 269. So the general principle is universally conceded that the subsequent ending of an improper inducement must be shown, it is assumed to have continued until the contrary is shown. Higmore § 831, see also R. v. Cleerton 21 & 1831. This inducement may be removed by subsequent caution. R. v. Hornbrook 1 Cox Cr. 51. R. v. Horner 1 Cox Cr. 161. R. v. Collier 3 Cox Cr. 57. Berigan's Case 1 Cr. Cr. C. R. 177, R. v. Bigham 1 Lebb Cr. 157, R. v. House 6 C. & P. 401.

Can inducement be irrevocable? The next question raised by Prof. Wigmore is whether there is any situation in which it cannot be shown that an inducement once offered has been brought to an end? In answering this question he said: 'There is nothing permanently irrevocable in an improper inducement whether it has been brought to an end is a fallacy always open to inquiry. Higmore § 855.

A person who has offered inducement, in put an end to it. It has not been decided specifically whether the same person may put an end to an inducement of his own creating. But there is no reason why he cannot. Higmore § 855. Where a Magistrate told a prisoner that if he did not strike the fatal blow, and would tell all he knew he would use his influence to protect him but afterwards communicated to the prisoner a letter from the Secretary of State declining to give pardon a subsequent confession was received. R. v. Cloues 4 C. & P. 221, Nott Cr. 166. In receiving the confession Littledale J. said: 'I think that this declaration is clearly admissible. I think that the conversation with Magistrate, after he received the Secretary of State's letter and the caution given by the Coroner must be taken to have completely put an end to all the hopes that had been held out.'

Inducement offered by one person and confession made to another. There is on principle, no reason for assuming that a promise or a threat made by one person will be treated by the accused as equally to be attributed to some other person who had no share in the other's conduct and shows no power or inclination to corroborate his promise or threat. Nevertheless the inducement may on the facts prove to be in effect the second person's as much as the first one's. It should thus be a question to be determined in each case, no general rule can be laid down. Higmore § 855. see also Cartwright's Trial (1812) 26 How. St. Tr. 889, R. v. Bell 10 Nally Cr. 13. R. v. Taylor, 1 C. & P. 129, R. v. Clewes, 1 C. & P. 223.

What suffices in general to end an inducement. If the impression produced by the promise or threat is clearly shown to have been removed—e.g. by lapse of time or by an intervening caution given by some person of superior (but not of equal or inferior) authority to the person holding out the inducement—a confession subsequently made will be strictly receivable. Phay Cr. p. 231. Where a prisoner confessed some months after the promise, and after due warning his confession was received. Warning by a person of superior authority, after inducement held out by one of inferior authority, will purge the confession of its taint and make it admissible. Nott Cr. 167. R. v. Bale 11 Cox 686, R. v. Horner 1 Cox 364. But where a person in superior authority holds out an inducement to a prisoner to confess a confession made to a person in inferior authority is not admissible, especially if such person do not give the prisoner any caution. Upon an indictment for arson it appeared that the committing Magistrate had told the prisoner that if he would make a disclosure he would do all that he could for him. The prisoner after he was committed, made a statement to the turnkey of the goal who had held out no inducement to him to confess and had not given him any caution not to confess. Paine J. said: 'I think I ought not to receive the evidence, after what Mr. S. (the committing Magistrate) said to the prisoner, more especially as the turnkey did not give any

S 28. caution to the prisoner R v Cooper, 5 C and P 73. In that case the Reporter observes "If a person of inferior authority cautions a prisoner not to confess after an inducement held out by a person of superior authority it is important to consider whether a statement made by a prisoner under such circumstances would be receivable as it seems to be but a fair conclusion that what was said to the prisoner by the Magistrate would be much more likely to operate on his mind than anything subsequently said by a constable." It may be said that as the inferior can have no control over the superior, it is difficult to see how any caution by the inferior could do away with the effect of the inducement by the superior as the prisoner must be aware that the inferior could have no power to prevent the superior from carrying his promise into effect. Russ Cr p 2184, see also R v Gilham 1 Mood 136, per Little J. Where a collecting panchayat and an assistant panchayat take a person into custody and put in holding an inquiry into the circumstances of the commission of a murder they must be taken to be "persons in authority" within the meaning of section 24 of the Evidence Act and if the accused person is a member of the assistant panchayat that he would be let off if he disclosed everything and in consequence of that assurance he makes a statement that statement is inadmissible under the provisions of the section above quoted. A similar statement made subsequently to a Magistrate and retracted afterwards would be inadmissible in evidence unless it could be shown that the impression which was made upon the accused's mind had been entirely removed therefrom. Empress v Ganesh 74 Ind Crs 261=50 C 127, Queen v Tuckoo, 5 N W P 85, R v Navajo, 9 B H C R 373.

In the opinion of the Court It is for the Court to decide whether the impression caused by inducement, threat or promise has been fully removed. So where promises or threats have been once used of such a nature as to render a confession inadmissible all subsequent admissions of the same or like facts will be rejected unless from the length of time intervening from proper warning of the consequences or from other circumstances there be good reason to presume that the delusive hope or fear which influenced the first confession has been effectually dispelled. Joy on Conf 69, R v Hewitt C & Marsh 534 R v Cooper, 5 C & P 534 R v Rosa Rue 13 Cox 703 Taylor § 378. So where it appears to the satisfaction of the Judge that the influence was totally done away with before the confession was made the evidence will be received. Greent Et § 221. So where the prisoner had been induced by promises of favour to make a confession which was for that cause excluded but about five months afterwards and after having been solemnly warned by two Magistrates that he must expect death and prepare to meet it he again made a full confession, this latter confession was admitted in evidence. Guild's Case 5 Halst 163. In this case upon much consideration the rule was stated to be that although an original confession may have been obtained by improper means yet subsequent confessions of the same or of like facts may be admitted if the Court believes from the length of time intervening or from proper warning of the consequences of confession, or from other circumstances, that the delusive hopes or fears under the influence of which the original confession was obtained were entirely dispelled. Guild's Case 5 Halst 180, R v Chertsey 2 F & F 833. But otherwise the evidence of a subsequent confession, made on the basis of a prior one unduly obtained will be rejected. Com v Hiram 4 Burr 269. In the absence of any such circumstances, the influence of the motives proved to have been offered will be presumed to continue, and to have produced the confession unless the contrary is shown by clear evidence. Greent Et § 221. If there is reason to think that the confession was induced by the pressure of questions by one in authority or in order to escape from his custody it should be rejected. R v Knight 20 Cox 711=69 J P 106. A girl charged with poisoning was told by her mistress that if she did not tell all about it that night, the constable would be sent for next morning to take her before the Magistrate on which she made a statement—which was rejected. The next morning a constable was sent for, who took her into custody, and on the next day to the Magistrate, without any inducement, she confessed to him. Burns v J in admitting the confession said "I think this statement receivable. The inducement was, that if confessed that night the constable would not be sent for, and she would not be taken before the Magistrates. The inducement therefore was at an end." R v Richards 5 C & P 318 Roscoe Cr 46. So it must be proved that the inducement has been clearly removed. R v Thompson, (1893) 2 Q B 12=62 L T M C 93=17 Cox Cr 641. See also R v Rose, 18 Cox Cr 717=67 L T Q B 299. R v Smith, (1897), Roscoe Cr 47.

29 If such a confession is otherwise relevant, it does not

Confession other

secrecy, etc.

become irrelevant merely because it was made under a promise of secrecy, or in consequence of a deception practised on the accused person for the purpose of obtaining it, or when he was drunk, or because it was made in answer to questions which he need not have answered, whatever may have been the form of those questions, or because he was not warned that he was not bound to make such confession, and that evidence of it might be given against him.

Scope. Confession procured by deception or under promise of secrecy are not, on this account alone, rendered inadmissible. This of course applies to confessions which otherwise satisfy the conditions prescribed for admissibility under section 24. A friend who, for the purpose of obtaining a confession, promises to keep it secret, may, nevertheless, testify in regard to it. R v Shaw 6 C & P 373. Deception alone will not render a confession inadmissible. It might seem that, in fairness to the accused, a confession obtained by fraud or artifice should not be used against him. As the ultimate object in view, however, is the truth as to the facts charged, and as deception of this sort is not likely to affect the reliability of a confession, it has not been held to render it inadmissible. McKelvey's Ex § 91. So also a confession made by a prisoner while drunk has been received. R v Spilsbury 7 C & P 167. It will be equally admissible, however much the mode of obtaining it may be open to censure, or may render the statement itself liable to suspicion. Much less will a confession be rejected, merely because it has been elicited by questions put to the prisoner whether by Magistrate, officer, or private person, and the form of the question is immaterial, even though it assumes the prisoner's guilt. Taylor Ex § 181.

Promise of secrecy. "If no inducement has been held out relating to the charge," says Mr Taylor, "it matters not in what way the confession has been obtained." Taylor § 881. It is not necessary that it should have been the prisoner's own spontaneous act. So it will be received though it were induced by a solemn promise of secrecy, even confirmed by oath. R v Shaw 6 C & P 372, Com v Knapp, 9 Pick 496, (500 510) Greenb Ex § 220b. After the prisoner had been committed on a charge of murder a fellow prisoner said to him, "I wish you would tell me how you murdered the boy pray split." The prisoner said "Will you be upon your oath not to mention what I tell you?" The other prisoner went upon his oath, and he hoped, if he told that he might never stir out of that place again. The prisoner then made a statement. It was held that this was not such an inducement as to render the statement inadmissible, and that although such oaths were very wrong and wicked, still they were not binding, and that every person except counsels and attorneys were bound to reveal what they might have heard. R v Shaw, 6 C & P 372, Patterson J, R v Hornbrook, 1 Cox 54 seems also to be overruled. Russ Cr 2169. So also where a person said to a prisoner that he might say what he had to say to him for it should go no further and the prisoner thereupon made a statement, it was held that it was admissible. R v Thomas 7 C & P 345. Russ Cr 2169. The accused made a confession of his guilt to the Regent who states to the accused that he had already obtained information from another person and promised secrecy if they told the truth. It was contended that the confession was obtained

S 29. on the promise of a reward if the person told the truth Ashton J in admitting the statement observed "As to the alleged deception and inducement that appear covered by the provisions of section 29 of the Evidence Act" Ferguson v. Mahomed Bakshi 5 Bom L R 507=4 C L J 49

Deception A free and voluntary confession is not inadmissible because it was originally obtained by an artifice practised on the accused by officers having been in charge or by other persons if the means employed were not calculated to cause him to make an untrue statement People v. McMohan 15 N Y 341. So it is no objection that the confession was made under a mistaken supposition that some of the prisoner's accomplices were in custody, not even though some artifice has been used to draw him into that supposition R v. Burley 1 Phil Ex (7th Ed) 111, 2 Stark Ev (4th Ed) 13 (n) confirmed by all the Judges Boz, where a prisoner while in gaol asked the turnkey if he would put a letter into the post for him and after his promising to do so, gave a letter addressed to his father to the turnkey who instead of posting it gave it to the warden. Magistrate of the gaol who gave it to the prosecutor. Gurrow B held that the letter was admissible in evidence and said he remembered making an objection when at the bar to evidence under the same circumstances before Gould J who overruled it. R v. Derrington 2 C & P 418, Russell 2171 R v. Nabaduray 1 B L R 615 (23). In Queen Empress v. Ram Charan 22 W R 33 where the confession it was alleged was obtained by a police officer by falsely stating that the accused's brother in law had given out that he was guilty, Marlby J in admitting such a confession at page 35 said "Whether the statement made by the police officer that the prisoner's brother in law had given out that he was guilty was actually true or not, it does not appear to us that there is any thing which would justify us in inferring that the prisoner was induced to suppose that he would gain or lose any thing by making the confession. If this amounted to any thing at all, it was a deception practised on the prisoner, but though we must disapprove of any deception being practised, section 29 of the Evidence Act expressly says that a confession made in consequence of deception is not to be excluded." The question how was the confession obtained is of minor importance. The main point to be considered is whether the confession probably true? (People v. McMohan 15 N Y 384 387 390). The real question always turns not much upon the means used in obtaining the confession, as upon the motives which prompted the prisoner to make it. As regards confession obtained by deception Faulstich J in People v. White 176 N Y 331 349 (4m) and White we do not sanction the deception practised by one of the officers in charge of the defendant, the Court could not exclude the confession made to him on that account. Deception was used in order to induce the defendant to tell the truth. No inducement was held out to him to confess a guilt unless there was guilt. The confession to the under sheriff was made to him not as a public officer, but as a supposed friend. It is not sufficient to exclude a confession by a prisoner as we have held that he was under arrest at the time or that it was made to the officer in whose custody he was or in answer to questions put to him or that it was made under the hope or promise of a benefit of a collateral nature (People v. White 80 N Y 500 515). Confessions induced by the use of decoy letters or the false assertion that some of the accomplices of the prisoner were in custody or made to a detective disguised as a confederate or upon the promise that he will not be disclosed have been received in evidence with the sanction of Courts of high authority. Cautious and he stating as Courts have always been as to regard to confession made by a person when under arrest to those in authority over him they have not gone so far as to exclude them simply because they were procured by deception provided they were voluntarily made. They are careful however to leave the credibility of the witness who practised the deception and the circumstances under which the confession was made to the consideration of the jury. In America it has been held that a confession procured by a person who by falsely representing himself to be an attorney of the confidence of the prisoner was inadmissible. Cotton v. Tate 57 Ala. 219. Commonwealth v. Tines 77 S W 363. "A man who will deliberately betray the confidence and with words of friendship upon his lips."

every means in his power to obtain an admission which can be tortured into a confession of guilt which he may blaze to the world as a means of accomplishing the downfall of one for whom he professes great friendship, cannot be possessed of a very high sense of honour or moral obligation. Hence it is doubtful if any thing is really gained in the administration of justice from the admission of such evidence. Underhill Cr. Evidence § 135. But see R v Firth 8 Cr A R 161, where Atory J said 'No one approves of the police setting traps for prisoners, but as a matter of law, if the police made an untrue statement to a prisoner which called forth an admission would it not be evidence?' ex R v Reason, 12 Cox Cr 228.

A person who may over hear the remarks of a prisoner made to himself or to another person, as his wife or an attorney or spiritual adviser who is incompetent as a witness to privileged communications may testify to what he has heard. Rex v Simon 6 C & P 540. See also Queen v Sagua 7 W R Cr 56. R v Gardner, 11 Cr A R 265. But not to incriminating declarations made during sleep for the deponent is then unconscious of what he was saying. People v Robinson 19 Cal 10 (1m). R v Elizabeth Kent Sum Ass 1839. Gore v Gibson, 13 M & W 623. Best E 11th Ed 514. A confession constituting a part of a prayer may be proved by one who overheard it though he may not be able to prove the whole prayer. Hoodfall v State, 85 Ga 69 (4m). A confession made to another prisoner under the erroneous impression that one prisoner cannot testify against the other is not for that reason inadmissible. State v Mitchell Phil (N Car) p 447 (1m). A confession to a fellow prisoner in jail, procured by the latter's spiritual exhortation and reading the Bible to the accused is not to be rejected because the witness is him (if a grossly irreligious man). Stafford v State, 55 Ga 591 (596) (1m). Underhill Cr. E § 135. H already charged was again charged jointly with G. When G's and another's statements implicating H were read by a sergeant to the three together purposely to elicit admissions, though evidence of what then took place is strictly admissible the trial Judge if satisfied of such a purpose ought to exclude it. H v Gardner, 11 Cr A R 265, H v Grayson, 16 Cr A R 7. H v Pilley 16 Cr A R 138. R v Turner 19 Cr A R 191.

When he was drunk. Confessions made by the accused when under the influence of liquor are not thereby rendered inadmissible. R v Spilsbury, 7 C & P 187. In the last named case Coleridge J said 'I am of opinion that a statement made by a prisoner while he was drunk is not therefore inadmissible, it must be obtained either by hope or fear. This is matter of observation for me upon the weight that ought to attach to this statement when it is considered by the jury. This is the rule even where the intoxication was produced by liquor given to him by the officers having him in charge for the sole purpose of procuring a confession. Nort Cr p 168. Edridge v State 25 Ala 30. Jeffers v People 5 Ark Cr (N Y) 522, 561. South v People 98 Ill 261 (265). But the extent of the intoxication and its effects upon the mind are questions to be submitted to the Court with the confession, and to be considered by them in determining its weight. McKelvey Cr 158. Any condition of mind which renders a person temporarily incompetent would make his statements while in such condition valueless and while, perhaps not inadmissible on the ordinary grounds which prevent confessions from being used still as they are of no value they should not be allowed to be introduced. If it appears that one is so intoxicated as to be incapable of understanding what he says or does, his confession should not be used against him. Com v Houe, 9 Gray (Mass) 110. Edridge v State 25 Ala 30. The question as to the mental condition of the accused at the time of the making of the confession is held to be for the jury to determine upon such testimony as both sides may submit though it is probable that in a case where there was no conflict as to the accused's mental incapacity at the time of the confession the Court would not submit the confession to the jury at all. McKelvey Cr § 92.

Some recent cases of America however reject confessions thus obtained because of the trick practised. But the general rule has been sustained even where the accused was suffering from delirium tremens if he was mentally and physically able to describe past events and to state his own participation in the crime "The intoxication of the accused at the time of making a confession must be considered by the jury in diminishing the value of the confession as evidence. The old proverb in vino veritas has never been a rule of law. It is by no means of universal application. Indeed, the contrary is often seen, for with men of a boastful disposition, intoxication is apt to result in false and exaggerated statements of their past achievements. The accused may be permitted to show that what purports to be his confession was simply boastful statements made with a humorous intention, while he was intoxicated and when he has done this, the prosecution may prove by witnesses who overheard him speaking that he appeared to be perfectly sincere while speaking." Underhill Cr. Fr. § 136.

The acts of persons of unsound mind also are not in general binding, but this is subject to some exceptions, which will be found collected in the case of Molton v. Camroux 2 Exch. 187, best Fr. § 529.

Confession in answer to questions. A confession is not to be rejected merely because it has been elicited by questions put to the prisoner. Taylor § 541. But this statement of law must be read subject to the provisions of sections 23 and 26 of the Indian Evidence Act which make confessions made to a police officer or while under police custody inadmissible in evidence. In England a confession made in answer to a question of a police officer is not rejected. (Fr. notes under Section 25) A confession elicited by questions put to the prisoner by a Magistrate is relevant under this section. R v. Ryes, 7 C. & P. 369, R v. Barlett 7 C. & P. 832, R v. Ellis, Ry & M. 432. So also when the question is put by a private individual. R v. Hild 1 Moo. C. C. 452. Ordinarily the form of the question is immaterial even though it insures the prisoner. R v. Hild 1 Moo. C. C. 452. R v. Thornton 1 Moo. C. C. 27, R v. Kern, 8 C. & P. 179, per Park J. A confession, in other respects admissible, is not inadmissible because it is not the spontaneous utterance of the prisoner. The fact that the confession was obtained by the employment of persistent questioning does not alone exclude it. (State v. Penney, 113 Iowa 691) but the practice of eliciting a confession by putting questions after questions to the accused is clearly not conducive to the procurement of truth, and the mode in which the confession was elicited may always be considered by the jury to determine whether they will believe it. Underhill Cr. Fr. § 140. In R v. Ellis, Ry & Moo. 432. Little J. admitted a statement of an accused on examination before a Magistrate without threat or promise but upon questioning and after refusal to allow counsel. This case was decided by following in unreported ruling of Holroyd J. and disapproving Hilson's Case i.e. R v. Hilson Holt N. P. 597 where Richard C. B. in disallowing such statements said "An examination of it itself imposes an obligation to speak the truth, if a prisoner will confess, let him do so voluntarily." Mr. Joy also adds his authority as to the practice in his book on confession. Joy Confession 40, see also R v. Tubby 5 C. & P. 530, R v. Ruess 7 C. & P. 177, R v. Wheely 8 C. & P. 250, where this practice was accepted indirectly. An answer given by the prisoner to a question put to him by a Magistrate was rejected by Earle C. J. in R v. Beirman 6 Cox Cr. 88. Queen v. Nabadiup 1 B. L. R. Cr. 15.

The mere fact that a statement in a confession was elicited by a question put by the Magistrate recording it does not make it irrelevant as a confession. But the fact may be very material to an enquiry as to whether the confession is voluntary or not. Barindra Kumar v. The Emperor 14 C. W. N. 1111 = 77 C. 467. In King Emperor v. Promotha, 30 C. L. J. 503 the Court in rejecting a confession obtained by continued questioning observed "His confession in our opinion cannot upon the case made by the prosecution be said to be voluntary. The evidence is that he was kept at a little distance from the Post Office in charge of a head constable and was being questioned by the Sub-Inspector and that after being in that condition for 3 or 4 hours to use the words of the learned Judge 'under the continued questioning to which he was subjected he finally broke down.' If there is reason to think that the confession was induced by the pressure of questions by one in authority or in order to escape from custody it should be rejected." R v. Knight, 20 Cox 711 = 69 J. P. 106.

In England the controversy on this point is now closed by Lez v. Pelt (1909) 1 K. B. 702 = 78 L. J. K. B. 65 where Lord Alverstone C. J. said "L.

our opinion, it is quite impossible to say that the fact that a question of this kind has been asked invalidates the trial. There are many cases in which the prisoner is entitled to give an explanation as to anything found upon him, and he may be able in answering the question to say and show that the thing found was his own property. In our opinion Reg v Gurn, 15 Cox C C 656 was not properly decided it is commented on in a note printed at the end of the report. The decision has not been followed to its full extent as appears from Reg v Braclenbury, 17 Cox C C 628. The statement of law as set out in the report is too wide, and requires qualification. So this case practically overruled Reg v Gurn, 15 Cox C C 656 and Reg v Mab, 17 Cox C C 689. In R v Miller, 18 Cox Cr C 54, Hawkins J said that it was impossible to discover the facts of a crime without asking questions and he held that the questions there were properly put after due warning. He admitted evidence of defendant's answers saying that every case must be decided according to the whole of the circumstances. Roscoe Cr Fr 49, see also R v Hirst 18 Cox Cr C 374. R v Hirst 19 Cox Cr C 16. Lewis v Harris 24 Cox Cr 66=110 L T 337. All these authorities were considered in Ibrahim v Reg, 83 L J P C 185=(1914) A C 399=24 Cox C C 174. A private in an Indian regiment murdered one of the officers. Shortly afterwards, while he was in custody the commanding officer asked him "why have you done such a senseless act?" and he replied "Some three or four days he has been abusing me and without doubt I killed him." The confession was admitted. Lord Sumner in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee (Lord Haldane L C Lord Winstan Lord Shaw Lord Voulton and Lord Sumner) said "if the matter is one for the (trial) Judge's discretion depending largely on his views of the impropriety of the questioner's conduct and the general circumstances of the case" it was not improperly exercised. Then after reviewing a large number of cases he added "The English law is still unsettled strange as it may seem since the point is one which constantly occurs in criminal trials. Many Judges, in their discretion, exclude such evidence, for they fear nothing less than that the exclusion of all such statements can prevent improper questioning of prisoners by removing the inducement to resort to it. Having regard to the particular position in which their Lordships stand to criminal proceedings, they do not propose to intimate what they think the rule of English Law ought to be, much as it is to be desired that the point should be settled by authority so far as a general rule can be laid down where circumstances so greatly vary."

Want of warning. A voluntary confession is evidence, to whomsoever it may have been made, though it does not appear that the prisoner was warned that what he might say would be used against him or even if it appear that he was not so warned. R v Thornton 1 Wood C C 27, North p 168, R v Lang, 6 C & P 179. R v Lavin Ir Cr R 813. Taylor Ld § 681. In Queen v Impress v Ucer, 10 C 775. Field J said "We may observe that it is no part of the duty of a Magistrate to tell an accused person that anything he may say will go as evidence against him. See also Queen v Nobodorp 1 B L R Cr 15=15 W R Cr 71. Answers to questions under that section are admissible in evidence, even if the Magistrate has omitted to warn the accused that he need not answer. Imhooy Roy and others 16 W R Cr 21, 5 Mad H C App 9. But sub-section (1) of section 161 of Criminal Procedure Code enacts "A Magistrate shall before recording any such confession explain to the person making it that he is not bound to make a confession and that if he does so it may be used as evidence against him and no Magistrate shall record any such confession unless upon questioning the person making it he has reason to believe that it was made voluntarily etc." The italicised portion which was added by Act XVIII of 1923 has made obsolete the decision of Queen v Impress v Ucer 10 C 775. Now the procedure laid down in this section should be strictly followed. Islam Singh v Emperor 7 Lah L J 39=26 Cr L J 731. Bahairah v Crown 6 Lah 151=26 Cr L J 1238=A I R 1925 Lah 132. Emperor v Garib Huss 30 C W N 41=27 Cr L J 621. Aranda v Parbati, 3 L B R 173, Shree Sui v King Emperor 3 L B R 213=4 Cr L J 385, Furud v Crown, 2 Lah 325. A statement of an accused in a suspect made at an inquest before a Coroner is clearly admissible either as a confession under s. 26 or as a statement made by a party to proceeding under s. 18 and 21 of the Evidence Act. As regards the objection that such a confession is not relevant in as much as the Coroner did not warn the accused, Forrest I observed. It is quite clear that, even treating the statement as a confession, the mere fact that Mr. Harle did not warn the accused that, if he made the statement it might subsequently be put in evidence against him, is immaterial. That a confession is not inadmissible on account of such an omission is expressly provided for by s. 29 of the Indian Evidence Act. Mr. Pender referred to s. 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code as containing a general principle to the contrary. But that is a special enactment applying only to certain statements made in particular circumstances contemplated by s. 164. It cannot override the general provisions of s. 29 of the Indian Evidence Act except where the circumstances bring the section into operation.

In England before the passing of the Stat. 11 & 12 Vict. C. 42 s. 18 such confessions were held to be admitted and it did not matter whether the accused was cautioned or not. R. v. Hall quoted in 2 Leach Cr. L. 3rd Ed. 63a. R. v. Magill, McNally on Laid 37, L. v. Green, 5 C. & P. 312, R. v. Arnold, 8 C. & P. 622. It will be noted that in the cases confirming the orthodox doctrine (of which R. v. Ellis, R. v. Mow 142 and R. v. Graham 1 Mood Cr. C. 186, 191 are more frequently cited) some of the confessions received were given under a caution or some were made without questions preceding, but neither of the circumstances seems to have been treated as essential to their reception. Hignore § 84. In 1849, Stat. 11 & 12 Vict. C. 42 s. 18 was passed which revised the method of conducting such examinations. That statute required two questions to be given and it apparently sanctioned all confessions previously admissible.

Aside from statute the fact that a confession which is otherwise admissible is made without the accused having been cautioned by the Court or by the person to whom the confession is made that what he says may be used against him, does not render it incompetent. Reg. v. Arnold 8 C. & P. 621, 622, Reg. v. Pratt, 4 Cox Cr. C. 378, Simon v. State 36 Miss. 636, 637.

30 When more persons than one are being tried jointly for the same offence, and a confession made by one of such persons affecting himself and some other of such persons is proved, the Court may take into consideration such confession as against such other person as well as against the person who makes such confession.

(a) A and B are jointly tried for the murder of C. It is proved that A said—"B and I murdered C." The Court may consider the effect of this confession as against B.

(b) A is on his trial for the murder of C. There is evidence to show that C was murdered by A and B, and that B said—"A and I murdered C." This statement may not be taken into consideration by the Court against A, as B is not being jointly tried.

Principle. This section is entirely a new provision of the law. There was no such provision either in Act II of 1855 or in the Criminal Procedure Code of 1861 and 1872. Before the passing of the Indian Evidence Act the confession of an accused person was only evidence against himself (Queen v. Kelly 10 W. R. 84 Cr.) and it could not be taken to be corroborative evidence or as evidence at all against any body other than himself (Queen v. Baillie 11 W. R. 179).

* This Explanation was inserted in s. 30 by the Indian Evidence Act (17th Amendment Act 1891 (3 of 1891)) s. 4.

R 35 Cr So the confession of one prisoner could not be used as corroborative evidence against another prisoner Queen v Darbaroo Das, 13 W R 14 Cr "Until the passing of the Indian Evidence Act 'such dangerous material as this could not be used as evidence against the accused person, and even by that Act, the legislature only bestowed a discretion upon the Court to take into consideration such confession as against such person as well as against the person who makes such confession' Per Phcar J in Queen v Sadhu Mundal 21 W R 69 Cr (71) The old cases followed the English cases on the subject Vide R v Fletcher, 4 C & P 250, Roseoe Cr Et 55, R v Turner 1 Moo C C 347, R v Blake, (1844) 6 Q B 126, R v Appleby 3 Stark 33

The principle underlying this section is thus stated by Phcar J in Queen v Belat Ali, 19 W R 67 It seems to me that it is this implication of himself by the confessing person which is intended by the Legislature to take the place as it were of the sanction of an oath or rather which is supposed to serve as some guarantee for the truth of the accusation against the other So when a person admits guilt to the fullest extent, and exposes himself to the pains and penalties provided for his guilt, there is a guarantee for his truth and the Legislature provides that his statement may be considered against his fellow prisoners charged with the same crime' Per West J in Empress v Daji Aarsu, 6 B 288 (291) What was intended was that where a prisoner to use a popular phrase, makes a clean breast of it and unreservedly confesses his own guilt and at the same time implicates another who is jointly tried for the same offence his confession may be taken into consideration against such other as well as against himself because the admission of his own guilt operates as a sort of sanction which to some extent takes the place of the sanction of an oath, and so affords some guarantee that the whole statement is a true one' Per Straight J in Queen Empress v Jagrup, 7 A 616, 648 The object sought by the rule of law said West J in Queen Empress v Anu Mahomed, 8 B 223, is a safe guard for sincerity and for information' This principle, it must be observed, is sound in theory rather than in practice In the first place the confession of a crime is not an absolute guarantee of its truth as to the person making it for it may have been falsely made from a sense of hopelessness of contending against the array of circumstantial evidence against him But from being a guarantee of the truth of the confession as against the confessing party to its operating similarly as regards another person is a wide step It does not follow necessarily that because a man has truly implicated himself therefore his implication of another is also true If his self implication was actuated by remorse or a sense of justice there would be ground for believing the whole of his confession even as against another but very few confessions have that character and therefore in most confessions the sanction of an oath is really wanting nor its truthworthiness is guaranteed by confrontation or cross-examination And I J (Journal) p 220 The reason for allowing the Judge to take into consideration confessions of this character is thus given by Mr Justice Cunningham in the Evidence Act Lastly, Judges are relieved from attempt to perform an intellectual impossibility by a provision, that, when more persons than one are tried for an offence and one of them makes a confession affecting him and any other of the accused the confession may be taken into consideration against such other person as well as against the person making it Such a confession is of course in the highest degree suspicious, it deserves ordinarily very little reliance but nevertheless it is impossible for a Judge to ignore it and under the Indian Evidence Act, he need no longer pretend to do so The exclusion in fact was one of the rules of evidence borrowed from the English system, which though well adapted to trials for Jury are meaningless and out of place on occasions where the functions of Judge and Jury are confined in a single official The Indian Judge has simply to consider whether the confession ought to have any weight with him and if any weight, how much in the opinion he forms about the case The exclusion of confessions of this kind from the definition of evidence is intended, apparently to remind the Judge that he is dealing with very unsound material and that though he takes them into consideration he must not rely on them as the sole and even as the chief basis of his belief' Cun Fi Intro pp 26-27 So there might be some reason for considering such confessions by a Court where the Court under ss 18 and 21 of the Evidence Act. As regards the objection that such a confession is not relevant in as much as the Coroner did not warn the accused, Fairbank v. The Queen 7 observed. It is quite clear that even treating the statement as a confession the mere fact that Mr. Atharley did not warn the accused that, if he made the statement it might subsequently be put in evidence against him is immaterial. That a confession is not in admissible on account of such an omission is expressly provided for by s 29 of the Indian Evidence Act. Mr. Pendse referred to section 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code as containing a general principle to the contrary. But that is a special enactment applying only to certain statements made in particular circumstances contemplated by s 164. It cannot override the general provisions of s 29 of the Indian Evidence Act, except where the circumstances bring the section into operation.

R 35 Cr So the confession of one prisoner could not be used in corroborative evidence against another prisoner Queen v Darbaroo Das, 13 W R 14 Cr
 Until the passing of the Indian Evidence Act "such dangerous material as this could not be used as evidence against the accused person, and even by that Act the legislature only bestowed a discretion upon the Court to take into consideration such confession as against such person as well as against the person who makes such confession" Per Phear J in Queen v Sadhu Munda, 21 W R 69 Cr (71) The old cases followed the English cases on the subject Vide R v Fletcher, 4 C & P 250, Roscoe v E 55 R v Turner 1 Moo C C 347, R v Blake, (1844) 6 Q B 126, R v Appleby, 3 Stark 33

The principle underlying this section is thus stated by Phear J in Queen v Belat Ali, 19 W R 67 "It seems to me that it is this implication of himself by the confessing person which is intended by the Legislature to take the place as it were of the sanction of an oath or rather which is supposed to give as some guarantee for the truth of the accusation against the other. So where a person admits guilt to the fullest extent, and exposes himself to the pains and penalties provided for his guilt, there is a guarantee for his truth, and the Legislature provides that his statement may be considered against his fellow prisoner charged with the same crime" Per West J in Empress v Daya Narsu, 6 B 288 (291) What was intended was that where a prisoner "to use a popular phrase, makes a clean breast of it" and unreservedly confesses his own guilt and at the same time implicates another who is jointly tried for the same offence his confession may be taken into consideration against such other as well as against himself because the admission of his own guilt operates as a sort of sanction which to some extent takes the place of the sanction of an oath, and so affords some guarantee that the whole statement is a true one Per Staught J in Queen Empress v Jagrup, 7 A 646, 648 The object sought by the rule of law said West J in Queen Empress v Nur Mahomed, 8 B 223 "is a safeguard for sincerity and for information" This principle, it must be observed is sound in theory rather than in practice. In the first place the confession of a crime is not an absolute guarantee of its truth as to the person making it for it may have been falsely made from a sense of hopelessness of contending against the array of circumstantial evidence against him. But from being a guarantee of the truth of the confession as against the confessing party to its operating similarly as regards another person is a wide step. It does not follow necessarily that because a man has truly implicated himself therefore his implication of another is also true. If his self implication was actuated by remorse or a sense of justice there would be ground for believing the whole of his confession even as against another but very few confessions have that character and therefore in most confessions the sanction of an oath is really wanting nor its trustworthiness is guaranteed by confrontation or cross-examination See Mad L J (Journal), p 220 The reason for allowing the Judge to take into consideration confession of this character is thus given by Mr Justice Cunningham in his Evidence Act. Lastly, Judges are relieved from attempt to perform an intellectual impossibility by a provision that, when more persons than one are tried for an offence and one of them makes a confession affecting himself and any other of the accused the confession may be taken into consideration against such other person as well as against the person making it. Such a confession is of course in the highest degree suspicious, it deserves ordinarily very little reliance but nevertheless it is impossible for a Judge to ignore it and under the Indian Evidence Act he need no longer pretend to do so. The exclusion in fact was one of the rules of evidence borrowed from the English system, which though well adopted to trials for Juries are meaningless and out of place on occasions where the functions of Judge and Jury are confined in a single official. The Indian Judge has simply to consider whether the confession ought to have any weight with him and if any weight, how much in the opinion he forms about the case. The exclusion of confessions of this kind from the definition of evidence is intended, apparently to remind the Judge that he is dealing with very unsound materials, and that, though he takes them into consideration, he must not rely on them as the sole and even as the chief basis of his belief. Cum Et Intro pp 26-27 So there might be some reason for considering such confessions by a Court where the Court is composed of a trained Judge alone. But even in India such confessions are generally taken into consideration by Courts which are composed of Judges and Jury as well as Magistrates who are not stipendiary Magistrates and have got very little legal training. It is a very dangerous instrument in the hands of perverse prosecutors and under the present system it is better to follow the wise advice of the writer cited by Justice Cunningham where he says "The policy of the section has been much questioned, and one writer has gone so far as to say that the best consideration which the Court can give to a confession within this section will probably be to hold that it will not act upon it against third parties." Cox v. Ly 153. It may well be doubted whether in this country, and especially among the lower classes, a confession is ever the result of such worthy motives, and the importation of such a principle into the system of Indian Jurisprudence is a dangerous innovation. Per Glover J in Queen v. Jaffir Ali, 19 W. R. 71 (64) Cr. Queen v. Sadhu Mundle 21 W. R. 69 (79), per Phear J, 3 Mad. L. J. 5000 p. 20. "I have always thought that was a most unsatisfactory section and was a needless tampering with the wholesome rule of the English Law that a confession is only evidence against the person who makes it." Per Coult's Trotter in In re Liliham, 81 Ind. Cas. 817.

Scope of the section. "The provision is flatly in contradiction to the Law of England where Judges always take the greatest pains to prevent the statements of a prisoner affecting the case of a fellow prisoner, and I do not think that Judges in India have looked with much favour on the section." Markby Es p. 28. So this section which introduces a new and a dangerous element of law not sanctioned by the salutary principle of English Jurisprudence should be construed with utmost strictness. Queen v. Jaffir Ali 19 W. R. 57 Cr. Queen v. Sadhu Mundle, 21 W. R. Cr. 69, Imperial v. Malapa Bin, (1890) 14 Ind. Jur. N. S. 19. The confessions of persons tried jointly for the same offence, by section 30, Act I of 1872 be 'considered' as against other parties then on their trial with them, but such confessions, when used as evidence against others stand in need of corroboration and cannot be used as corroborating in any way the evidence of approver against such other parties. Queen v. Jaffir Ali, supra. "Until the passing of the Indian Evidence Act, such dangerous material as this could not be used as evidence against the accused person, and even by that Act the Legislature only bestowed a discretion upon the Court to take into consideration such confession as against such other person as well as against the person who makes such confession." Per Phear J in Queen v. Sadhu Mundle 21 W. R. 69 (71). Section 30 relates to confessions made by accused person who are being jointly tried for the same offence. Empress v. Aagya, 5 C. P. L. R. Cr. 9. A confession duly made at the time, by one of several accused persons under trial jointly for the same offence can be used under s. 30 of the Evidence Act. The section is not to be treated as though the words 'at the trial' were inserted after 'made' and the word 'recorded' substituted for 'proved'. Queen v. Empress v. Tanga Rat Cox Cr. C. 510 = Cr. Rg. 30 of 1890. Confessions made by an accused person may be considered against persons who are tried with him but they cannot be accepted as evidence of any fact necessary to constitute the offence. In re Kaliyappa Goundan 2 Weir 741. In order that a confession of an accused person may be admissible as against the other accused tried with him it is not necessary that the confession should have been made in the latter's presence. 2 Weir 745.

Section 30 does not refer to statements made at the trial but the statements made before and proved at the trial. Goundan v. Emperor A. I. R. 1929 Vol. 285. Emperor v. Mahadev Prosad A. I. R. 1928 All. 322 = 45 A. 323. Emperor v. Ashutosh Chakravarty 4 C. 483 = 3 C. L. R. 270, but see In re Bali Reddy, 5 M. 302 = 22 Ind. Cas. 157 = 15 Cr. L. J. 13, where Aylmer J held that there is no reason why confessional statements made at the trial itself should not be taken into consideration under s. 30 of the Evidence Act. But according to Markby J in Emperor v. Mahadev Prosad, supra it should be before the trial, because an accused person is entitled to know what the evidence against him is, before he is called upon for a defence at all, and the closing of the case for the prosecution is no mere form but with certain exceptions closes the door to any further evidence against him. "If a prior confession is to be proved, he can attack it."

cross-examination of the witness who proves it. Against a confession made from the dock after the prosecution case has closed, he has no protection whatever. Per Waller J in Gounda v Emperor, supra. Section 30 of the Indian Evidence Act is not limited to cases where the confessing accused directly implicates another accused but extends to cases where the confession indirectly affects a co-accused. Emperor v Shuabhai, 50 B 633=27 Cr L J 1140=28 Bom L R 1013=97 Ind Crs 660=A I R 1926 Bom 513.

A statement by one accused can only be used against a co-accused if the provisions of sections are applicable. Ramhit v Emperor, 20 A L J 178=L R 3 A 30=65 Ind Crs 849=A I R 1922 A 24. The test as to whether the confession of an accused person can be used against his co-accused is whether the person making such confession could have been convicted on that confession of the crime with which he and his co-accused were charged. Chun v Emperor, 60 Ind Crs 660=22 Cr L J 260. The Court can only treat such a confession as binding assurance to other evidence against a co-accused. Emperor v Lalit Mohan, 10 Ind Crs 1582=38 C 509 (388)=15 C W N 593.

As regards the confessions of co-accused the Indian law has no counter part in England, but it seems to me that for the purpose of admissibility such confessions stand on the same footing as accomplice evidence and their weight must depend on the circumstances of each case. I propose therefore, to apply to the question of corroboration of the confession the same rules as are applicable to the corroboration of accomplice evidence. In Rex v Bastwick, (1917) 86 L J K B 28=(1916) 2 K B 638 a criminal appeal heard by a Court of five Judges specially constituted to lay down rules for future guidance, it was said, there are propositions of law applicable to corroboration which are beyond controversy. For example, confirmation does not mean that there should be independent evidence of that which the accomplice relates or his testimony would be unnecessary. Reg v Mullins, 3 Cox C C 526. Where a pardon tendered to one of two accused persons by a Magistrate was withdrawn before the close of his examination, held that the evidence thus given was inadmissible in the Sessions Court. In this case the person to whom the pardon was tendered repudiated the statement in the Magistrate's Court when examined as a witness in the Sessions Court. Queen Empress v Agu A W N 1891, 184. Section 30 merely enacts a special exception to the general rule that a confession (admission) can be proved (only) against the person who made it. It does not limit the operation of s 32. Illustration (b) to section 30 cannot be construed to have this effect. Nga Po Lin v King Emperor, U B N 1906, 1 Ind Crs 305 Cr L J 300. Where an accused person makes a confession, the most that could be taken into consideration on such a statement against a co-accused would be, under section 27 and 30 of the Evidence Act, so much of the information as was the immediate cause of the discovery of some relevant fact against him. In R Santappa Rai 18 M L J 66=31 M 127=3 M L T 270=7 Cr L J 25. Prior to the Evidence Act the rule not of law, but of practice was that a confession could not be based on the unsupported evidence of a co-accused that the accused person's statement was no evidence against a fellow prisoner. It is tried jointly with the person making the statement and that evidence is only admissible in evidence when made in the witness box. Cr. ca v Nihal Singh, 31 P R 1866 Cr, Ghadoo v Crown, 124 P R 1595 Cr, Queen v Jummigula, 124 P R 1866 Cr, Deva Singh v Crown 27 P R 1577 Cr, Crown v Jai Ram, 24 P R 1867 Cr, Crown v Ruheem 38 P R 1567 Cr.

Section must be construed strictly. Section 30, Act I of 1872, introducing as it does, an entirely new, and, I am sure, a dangerous element in the conduct of criminal trials, ought to be construed with great strictness. Per Glorier J in Queen v Jai Singh, 31 P R 1866 Cr. The section merely requires a strict interpretation of the language in section 30 of the Evidence Act to a joint trial. For the purpose of a joint trial. Manicka v Pandiyachi 14 L W 474.

Tried jointly. The words "tried jointly" in section 30 of the Evidence Act refer to the trial of the accused by a particular judicial officer who shall be the judge of the case. Procedure Code. To hold a joint trial, the judge must be a judge of the case.

S 30. by one of the accused before him as s 23 Cr Pro Code seems to contemplate that the accused should be examined before the charge is actually framed. See The Queen Empress v. Lal B R (1897-1900) 613. The term "tried jointly" means legally tried jointly with the confessing accused for the same offence. Queen Empress v. Jagat Chandra, 22 C 51 Section 30 which makes the confession of one prisoner evidence against persons other than the man who made the confession applies only to cases in which the confession is made by a prisoner tried at the same time with the accused person against whom the confession is used. Queen v. Sheikh Bano, 21 W R Cr 65, M. Radhu v. Empress 25 Cr L J 13=75 Ind Cas 701.

It is not supposed to support the conviction of persons based solely on a retracted confession of a co-accused which do not implicate to the same extent the co-prisoners. Pendra v. Emperor, (1918) Pat 175=46 Ind Cas 842=19 Cr L J 126.

Several persons were put upon their trial for an offence under s 193, Penal Ct. One of them made a statement confessing his guilt and implicating some of the other accused. The Magistrate did not convict him upon the confession but recorded evidence against all the accused and convicted them after considering the whole evidence including confession. The Sessions Judge reversed the judgment in this respect. Held that the confessing accused was tried jointly with the other accused and the confession was evidence against them all. King Empress v. Dep, 37 A 117.

A person escaping from custody during the trial, but before charge, who has been tried separately after re-arrest cannot be said to have been jointly tried with the person whose trial from a stage prior to the charge, was separate and to the escape from custody and the confession of the co-accused, first tried, was held to be inadmissible against the prisoner as the trial was not joint. Ali v. Khan v. Emperor, 29 P R 1901 Cr = P L R 1900 p 32.

Two persons jointly tried one for theft, and the other for abetment of it before hand and being present during its commission, were held to be jointly tried for the same offence within the meaning of s 30. Day Shah v. Crown 3 P R 187 Cr. In 1873, two persons were concerned in the murder of a third person, the first absconded, but the second, having been arrested was tried in the year. The second person, during his defence at the sessions trial, made a statement that the first person admitted to him having committed the murder. In 1877 the first person having been arrested and placed upon his trial—the second person had meanwhile died—the Court of Sessions used the statement of the deceased while at his trial in 1873 as evidence against the first. Held that the accused person's statement was not admissible against the first either under section 37 Cr Pro Code 1872 or ss 30 and 133 Evidence Act. Crown v. Thabu 1 P R 187 Cr.

In this connection an important question arises when the confessing prisoner pleads guilty to the charge. In such a case can he be called full jointer tried with the rest so as to let in his confession under this section against the co-accused? In Heg v. Kalu Patel, 11 B H C R 146, the Court observed that they were of opinion that the examination of Nausia was wrongly admitted as evidence in this case. After Nausia had pleaded guilty and had been convicted and sentenced to punishment and his evidence had been taken on solemn affirmation and witnesses, he could not any longer be considered as one jointly tried with others when the Assistant Judge in framing his judgment took his evidence into consideration. Heg v. Kalu Patel 11 B H C R 146, Imperatrix v. Balu Patel, 5 B 63. Venka Sam v. Queen 7 M 102, Imperatrix v. Claud Lalad, 14 Ind Jur N S 125. R v. Pubhu, 17 A 524=1895 A W N 111, Empress v. Pubhu 19 B 195.

Where a confessing accused pleads guilty, he should be sentenced and put aside or the Judge without immediately passing the sentence, ought to wait to see what the evidence discloses. These are the two courses suggested in R v. Kalu Patel supra. In the latter it seems according to this case his confession may be considered against his co-accused under this section. This view is also supported in Empress v. Ram Saran S A 306. But in Queen Empress v. Pachay 19 B 195 quite a contrary view is taken. See also Queen Empress v. Pubhu, 1895 A W N 111.

If the Court does not convict an accused person on his plea of guilty his trial does not terminate with his plea and therefore a confession by him may be taken into consideration as against any other person who had been jointly tried with him of the same offence Shanley v Emperor, 24 A L J 318 = 93 Ind Cas 341 = 27 Cr L J 449 = A I R 1926 All 318. In a trial of a number of persons by a Magistrate under the Opium Act one of them pleaded guilty and this was taken into account as against the others. Held it was admissible in evidence Fakhu uddin v The Crown 6 Lah 176 = A I R 1925 Lah 135.

Although it is open to the Court, under certain circumstances, to continue the trial without convicting those of the accused who pleaded guilty, yet it is unfair to defer convicting them merely in order that their confessions may be considered against the other accused who are being tried with them. Queen Empress v Pattua, 25 A 53 = A W N 1900, 192, Emperor v Kheoraj 30 A 540.

Where the statements of two of several accused persons followed their plea of guilty, held they were not entitled to be considered as evidence against the other accused persons and that in those circumstances they ceased to be statements of persons jointly tried for the trial ended as regards them with their plea of guilty. Queen Empress v Publu 17 A 724 = A W N 1895 11 Crown v Shuldham, 44 P W R 1914 Cr (F B) Queen Empress v Chand Rat Un Cr C 400 = Cr R 60 of 1888. Queen Empress v Lakshmi 22 M 491. Pera v Empress, 11 P R 1900 Cr, Emperor v Keramat 38 C 446, Kanhaya v Crown, 15 P R 1911 Cr.

The trial of a person does not necessarily end as soon as he pleads guilty. The proper course to be adopted, when the accused person pleads guilty is either to convict him on his plea and remove him from the dock, in which case his trial would be manifestly at an end so as to warrant his being called as a witness for or against any person who had been accused along with him, or else to allow the trial to go on as if the plea had been one of not guilty in which case his trial does not end with the plea of guilty and therefore, any confession made by the person so pleading could be taken into consideration under section 30 of the Evidence Act, as against any other person, who was being jointly tried with him for the same offence. The only case in which there may be any doubt, is where neither of these courses has been explicitly adopted but the accused who has pleaded guilty is left in the dock merely to see what the evidence will show as against him though the Court intends ultimately to convict him on the plea of guilty. In such a case, it will not be fair to allow his confession to be considered as against his co-accused for that would be in effect, to comply with the forms of justice while violating it in substance. Empress v Chuma 23 M 151.

The question whether an accused who pleads guilty is being jointly tried with the other accused who did not plead guilty so that his evidence could be taken into consideration against them under s 30 Evidence Act appears to depend upon whether the Judge accepted the plea of guilty or not. The test to be applied would seem to be whether in fact the trial proceeded as against the accused who had pleaded guilty as if he had not done so i.e. whether for instance he was examined or was given the opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses whether he was examined himself (and, in a case where there are assessors whether their opinion was taken as to the guilt). Where therefore an accused who pleaded guilty did not in fact cross-examine any of the witnesses and also declined to call any witnesses though he was given an opportunity to do so and where the Sessions Judge preferred not to act upon his plea of guilty but proceeded to take the evidence just as if the plea had been one of not guilty, ultimately deciding the case upon the whole evidence including the accused's plea, held that under the circumstances there can be no doubt that the trial was a joint trial within the meaning of s 30 of the Evidence Act. Emperor v Aga Po Tha U B R 1913, 2nd Cr 170 = 21 Ind Cr 166 = 14 Cr I J 566.

Until an accused person who has pleaded guilty is convicted or acquitted he is still an accused person and is therefore not a competent witness against the co-accused. It is open to the Court to refuse to accept the plea of guilty returned by an accused and to try the question of the accused's guilt. Where one of two accused pleaded guilty, but the Magistrate took no action on the plea

S 30. but proceeding to try the case as if against the other accused directed his mind and his judgment entirely to the case as it stood on independent testimony. Held the trial was good. Sufleb v Emperor, 9 C L J 291=13 C W N 539

In a warrant case although the statement of a co-accused amounts to an unqualified confession, he need not be forthwith convicted and removed from the dock. The co-accused is still to be deemed to be jointly tried with the other and his confession can be used against the others. A Sessions case is to be distinguished from a warrant case for this purpose. Ram Aishan v Emperor, A I R 1928 Lahore 890=111 Ind Cas 387=29 Cr L J 835, Kanhaiya v Emperor, 15 P R 1911=12 Ind Cas 931=31 P W R Cr 1911 Fakhrudin v Emperor, A I R 1925 Lah 135=6 Lah 176, Re Bati Reddi, 38 M 307, Emperor v Madho A I R 1923 All 322=15 A 323

A and B were tried at the same trial A for murder and B for abetment. A confessed to having committed the murder at the instigation of B. The Sessions Judge subsequently conceded the charge against A into one of abetment. B, who was represented by a Vakil did not object to the amendment or ask for a new trial. Held that the objection that the Judge should not, under s 30 of the Evidence Act have taken the confession of A into consideration against B could not be allowed in appeal since the two charges were so nearly related, and there was no such material prejudice as would under ss 447 to 449 of the Criminal Pro Code, have necessitated a new trial and since the amendment of the charge was not objected to. Reg v Gobinda, 11 B H C R 9, 8

Where two persons were jointly accused of theft but the Magistrate in a process against one of them only, the evidence of that person against whom process was not issued adduced on behalf of the accused who was on his trial was held to be admissible. Mohesh v Mohesh, 10 C L R 553

Same offence. The expression "same offence" in section 30 means the identical offence and does not mean even offence of the same kind. The Legislature did not intend the section to cover different offences in the same transaction by different persons. The illustration to s 30 makes the meaning of the section quite clear. Gour Chandra v Emperor, A I R 1929 Cal 14=32 C W N 1004. If the confession of a co-accused must be of the same crime of which the accused are being tried, unsupported by other testimony, its evidentiary value is very weak. The motive of the crime will not be corroborative evidence of the confession. Sheo Imbai v Emperor, 9 O & A L R 836. Where two persons were jointly tried for the offence of murder and one of them made a confession which implicated himself only of an offence under section 323, Penal Code (i.e.) causing hurt by means of poison, but not of murder. Held by Oldfield and Odgers JJ that it could be used as a confession under section 30 of the Evidence Act against the other co-accused. In re Manika Padayachi, 14 L W 74. But in the same case Rameshan J said that where the confession made by one of the accused is not a confession of the guilt of the person making it of the offence for which he is tried but of a minor offence it does not satisfy the requirements of s 30 of the Evidence Act. In a case under s 110 Cr Pro Code against the petitioner the confession made by a person who was the co-accused of the petitioner in a district case but not in the present case was admitted in evidence. Held that the confession was inadmissible. Mafizuddin v Emperor 35 C W N 239=33 C L J 10=61 Ind Cas 793. In a proceeding against several persons under section 110 of the Cr Procedure Code the confession of one is inadmissible against the other co-accused the provisions of section 30 of the Evidence Act not being applicable to a case like the present. Ambuulla v Emperor 22 C W N 408

Two persons were jointly tried the former for criminal breach of trust and the latter for the abetment of that offence. The only evidence against the latter was the confession by the former. Held that he was improperly convicted on such unsupported statement. Empress v Baldeo A W N 1881, 164. A confession made by one person while he was on his trial for murder for being a thing and implicating another was not admissible in evidence against the latter tried alone subsequent to the confession and conviction of the former. Emperor v Jita Singh A W N 1881, 164

to have been present at the time of the commission of the offence. Held that under s 114 I P Code, the accused stood in the same position as if he himself had committed the offence, that his trial with the co-accused was proper and that the confession made by the co-accused in such trial could be taken into consideration under s 30 of the Evidence Act against the accused. Thal Singh v Empress, 32 P R 1882 Cr

It is very improbable that the Legislature having before it the definition contained in s 108 Expl (4), Penal Code should, in enacting s 30, Evidence Act have omitted to explain that the word 'offence' contained in the latter section included the 'abetment of an offence' also if the intention really was that section 30 was to be so understood. But if the offence abetted is committed as the result of an abetment and the abettor is present at its commission the abettor must be held to have committed the substantive offence. Queen Empress v Kaldu S C 143 Oudh (but now this objection has been removed by adding of the explanation by Act 3 of 1891), but see Tega v Empress 33 P R 1885 Cr

The confession of one accused cannot be taken into consideration as against another unless they are tried for the same specific offence. Confession. This section must be strictly construed. It makes a clear distinction between an admission and a confession. It is only under this section that the confession of one of two or more accused jointly tried for the same offence, can be taken into consideration against the rest. It must be a confession to be so admissible that is it must affect both the person confessing and the other accused. The word confession, as used in the Act must not be construed as including a mere inculpatory admission which falls short of being an admission of guilt. The terms of the section do not countenance the construction of a statement into a confession by a process of inferential reasoning. It is one thing to make statements giving rise to an inference of guilt and another thing to confess a crime. Emperor v Santya Bandu, 11 Bom L R 633 = 3 Ind Cas 712. A confession within the meaning of this section is a full and unqualified admission of the guilt of the person making it and of a character to justify his conviction upon it. In re Kapur Singh A W N 1881 20, Empress v Byu A W N 1881 93. To determine whether a statement is a confession or not, the test is to see whether it is sufficient by itself to justify the conviction of a person making it of the offence for which he is being jointly tried with the other person against whom it is tendered. Per Straight J in Empress v Ganraj, 2 A 444 see also Empress v Dny Naru 6 B 288, Queen v Uchesh Biswas 19 W R 16, Queen v Bhatli 19 W R 67, Regina v Anrita Gorinda 10 B H C R 197, Queen v Khukree Ogram 21 W R 49, Queen v Bannaree Lal 21 W R 53, Queen v Vira, 23 W L 24, Queen v Keshub 25 W R 8, Queen v Bujoo

Affecting himself and some other. To render the confession of one person, jointly tried with another admissible in evidence against the latter, it must appear that the confession implicates the confessing person substantially to the same extent as it implicates the person against whom it is to be used, in the commission of the offence for which the prisoners are being jointly tried. Queen v Delat Ali, 10 B L R 453=19 W R Cr 67, Queen v Mahesh Biswas 10 B L R 475 Note=19 W R Cr 16. along with the person proved to have made it, but the law nowhere requires that the confession should have been made in the presence of the person against whom it is sought to use it. Queen Empress v. Kallua, A W N 1894, 11. A confession made by one of the co-accused who does not implicate himself to the same extent as he implicates the other co-accused and who tries to throw the entire blame on the other co-accused is of very little value at least as against the other co-accused. Kanya Subudhu v. Emperor, A I R 1929 Pat 275=8 Pat 289, Topandas v. Emperor 25 Cr L J 761=81 Ind Cas 249=A I R 1925 Sind 116. It is not the law that unless a confessing prisoner implicates himself as fully as his co-accused the statement will not be admissible, the principle being that there is no guarantee that the maker of the confession is speaking the truth. All that is required is that the confession shall substantially implicate its maker in regard to the crime in which he and his co-accused are charged. It is not necessary that there should be an admission of actual guilt. The admission may establish constructive guilt. Section 30 of the Evidence Act applies to confessions made to the residents of the same village as the accused. Sula Raut v. Emperor, 4 Pat L T 590. A confession in order to be admissible under this section must implicate the confessing prisoner substantially to the same extent, as it implicates the person against whom it is to be used. Since the amendment of the section, confession which implicates its author merely of an abetment may nevertheless be used as a confession against the other co-accused who is therein charged with being the principal offender, but a statement alleging that the confessing prisoner was forced by threats of death, to remain an impassive agent in the crime is not a confession within the meaning of and for the purposes of s 30 of the Evidence Act. Gul Hassan v. King Emperor, 24 P R 1910 Cr=193 P L R 1910=30 P W R 1910 Cr=8 Ind Cas 250.

Two persons, jointly tried, the one for committing a theft and the other for having abetted it previously and of being present at its commission, were held to be jointly tried for the same offence within the meaning of s 30, Evidence Act. Bag Shah v. Crown, 3 P R 1879 Cr.

Confession implicating the confessing prisoner more than the co-prisoners in the commission of the offence, charged against all. Although many decided cases laid down the rule that a confession of an accused will be taken into consideration against his co-accused when it implicates him substantially to the same extent as the co-accused (vide Queen v. Mohesh, 19 W R 16 Cr. Queen v. Belat, 19 W R 67 Cr., Queen v. Bayoo, 25 W R 43, Empress v. Gujray, 444, Imperatrix v. Babaji 14 Ind Jur N S 175), yet on principle such confession should be admissible if it implicates the confessing prisoner more than he co-prisoners in the commission of the offence charged against all. So where A made a confession that he himself committed the murder at the instigation of B who was not present at the time of the commission of the crime A's confession can be taken into consideration against B. R v. Gorindo 11 B H C R 47. So also this section is not limited to cases where the confessing accused directly implicates another accused but extends to cases where the confession indirectly affects a co-accused. *Emperor v. Confessions implicating the confessing prisoner substantially to the same extent as the co-prisoners in the commission of the offence. A statement made by an accused person before it can be taken into consideration against a fellow-prisoner as is provided in section 30, Evidence Act must amount to a confession on the part of the maker with respect to the offence with which all are charged. *Bhadreswar v. jointly for the same offence may be taken into consideration by the Court and may be used for the purpose of corroborating the other evidence. Ahanyan v Queen Empress, 4 O C 69, In re Alanga Bili, 2 Weir 742. "This section does not provide as has been repeatedly pointed out by this Court, that confession evidence, still less does it say that it shall be the foundation of a case against the person implicated. The Legislature very guardedly says that it may be taken into consideration and I think the obvious intention of the Legislature in saying was that, when, as against any such person there is evidence tending to his conviction, the truth or completeness of this evidence being the matter in question the circumstance of such person being implicated by the confession of one of those who are being jointly tried with him, should be taken into consideration as bearing upon the truth or sufficiency of such evidence." Per Jackson J in Queen v Chunder Bhattacharjee 24 W R Cr 42. This section does not say that the confession referred to therein is relevant but only says that the Court may take it in to consideration against the co-accused. The Court might take into consideration such confession with or supplementary to relevant facts which may form the basis of a judgment. As a matter of judicial prudence a confession implicating others must be regarded with suspicion. Saklu v Emperor, A I R 1922 Nag 146=65 Ind Cr 361=23 Cr L J 129. The confession of a co-accused can be taken into consideration, but the Court requires corroboration before acting upon such a confession. King Emperor v Baker 41, 21 C L J 492=19 C W N 384=42 C 789=28 Ind Crs 657=16 Cr L J 371. Adair v Crown 19 P W R 1916 Cr =17 Cr L J 156=33 Ind Cas 636. Ghosh v Rasul v Crown 34 Ind Crs 332.

A Judge should charge the jury that the mere confessions of prisoners tried simultaneously with the accused for the offence, which are in a very qualified manner made operative as evidence by Act I of 1872 section 30, are only to be treated as evidence of a defective character, and that they require peculiar careful scrutiny before they can be safely relied on. Queen v Saithu Mundul, 11 W P Cr 69. Statements made by an accused person are not evidence within the definition of "evidence" given in s. 3, Evidence Act. Aga Tha Ayan v Queen Empress, L B R (1893 1900) 368, Imperial v Bayagi Hoam 14 Ind Jur S 384, Queen v Khulree, 21 W R 48, Queen Empress v Kalyappa Gowda, 15 Weir, 3rd Ed 494, Queen Empress v Khandia Bin Pandit, 15 B 66, 7 Mal L C R App 15, R v Dyanaram 37 A 247.

In Queen Empress v Naga, 20 W R 24 Cr. Pheas J said. We find the Legislature avoids saying that confessions of this sort are evidence and marks them as evidence. It says merely the Court may take into consideration a confession. Jackson J in Queen v Chunder Bhattacharjee, 24 W R 42, Marby and Morris JJ in Queen v Narain Tel, 27th May 1875 (mentioned & overruled in 4 C 485) also took the same view. But in Empress v Chunderbatty 4 C 483, the Full Bench said that the Legislature has not avoided calling the confession of an accused person "evidence" against a co-prisoner. It has not so called it because it is not the phraseology of the Act. So according to the Full Bench, confession is evidence for the purpose of section 30 though it does not appear to be so according to section 3 of the Evidence Act. The general test must be applied to confessions by co-accused as to other kinds of evidence, when it is intended to be used against persons other than those who make them except that it must not be forgotten that the confessing prisoner is not free his statement on oath and that his fellow prisoners have not the liberty of cross-examining him and thus possibly of exposing his falsehood. Per Pillay J in Emma v Empress 29 P R 1880 Cr. "The confession of a co-accused may be considered with other evidence, and if in taking all together and considering the matter before it the Court believes that the events detailed existed, or that its existence is so probable that a prudent man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case to act on the supposition that they have existed the Court may then hold the fact stated to be proved." Per Brandt J in ibid. The confession of a co-accused, is evidence though not conclusive or of great weight against another accused. May be considered in this section means "may be considered as in the nature of evidence and the confession must be treated as evidence." Empress v Sundra A W N 1881, 24. The confession of one accused is strictly speaking evidence against the other on a joint trial for the same offence Empress v Sundia, A W N 1884 38, Emperor v Babar Ali 42 C 789. The confession of a co-accused, is evidence of the weakest kind, and if uncorroborated is not sufficient to warrant a conviction Manji Tewari v Amir Hossein, 2 C W N 749. A confession under section 30, may only be taken into consideration but cannot be treated as substantial evidence. In the matter of Ram Mulla, 1 J G 77, Queen v Naga, 23 W R Cr 24. The words "taken into consideration" in this section mean that the confessions of a co-accused are not to have the force of sworn evidence. A conviction resting on such a confession alone cannot be maintained Queen Empress v Numa Das, 22 A 445 = A W N 1900, 169. Such evidence can be taken into consideration for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion of fact, and though a co-accused's statement is not technically evidence within the definition given in section 3 it may still be used quantum valeat for the basis of a reasonable inference, and if a jury think it sufficiently supported by a partial or qualified admission of guilt on the part of the accused himself and by admitted physical facts pointing to his connection with the crime imputed to him, they are not precluded by law any more than by reason from finding of guilty thus sustained. R v Baiyaji Kom Andu, 14 Ind Jur N S 384 see also Empress v Sundia A W N 1884, 38. Although the weight of the confessions may be regarded as great against the party making them, they must be accepted with great caution against the co-accused whom they implicate unless there is corroboration forthcoming from an independent source which would make it safe to act upon the confession. Rama Kariyappa v Emperor, A I R 1929 Bom 327. In Emperor v Sabulkhan 43 B 739 = 51 Ind C 65 = 21 Bom L R 418 on a reference on difference of opinion between Heaton J and Shah J, Scott C J concurring with Heaton J and differing from Shah J held that the confessions of the co-accused were evidence against the accused inasmuch as there was testimony independent of the confessions which affected the accused by connecting or tending to connect him with the crime. Scott C J remarked (pp 469, 470) — "If the confession (of a co-accused) is corroborated by other evidence it matters not whether, in proving the case at the trial the confession precedes the other evidence or the other evidence precedes the confession. As regards the confessions of co-accused the Indian Law has no counterpart in England, but it seems to me that for the purpose of admissibility such confessions stand on the same footing as accomplices' evidence and that their weight must depend on the circumstances of each case." On this point Scott C J differed from a doctrine of Maileod J in Emperor v Gangappa Kandeppa 38 B 156 = 21 Ind C 673 = 15 Bom L R 973, where the learned Judge had expressed the opinion that a confession of a co-accused would stand on a different footing, to the testimony of an accomplice, and that the Indian Evidence Act treats it as having a higher probative value than similar evidence would have according to the English Law. According to the latter ruling there is no difference between the law in England and the law in India on this point except with regard to the corroboration of accomplice evidence. Both decisions agree that the confession of co-accused could not be said to be corroborated by the confession of other co-accused. In Emperor v Gangappa Kandeppa supra the Court observed that there was nothing in s 30, Evidence Act of 1872 which prevented a Court from convicting after taking the confession of the co-accused into consideration, but the High Courts of India had laid down a rule of practice which had all the reverence of law that a conviction founded solely on the confessions of the co-accused could not be sustained. Rama Kariyappa v Emperor A I R 1929 Bom 327. Mansing v Emperor A I R 1929 A 928, In re Magahan Bah 2 Weir 742. The expression "may take into consideration" points to the necessity of there being other evidence on record to which this statement can lend assurance. Veela v Emperor, 109 Ind Cas 801 = 29 Cr L J 609 = A I R 1928 Nag 213. Under this section the Court may take into consideration a confession made by an accused person as against the co-accused, i.e., the Court can only treat a confession as lending assurance to other evidence against a co-accused, but a conviction based on the confession of a co-accused alone would be bad in law. Debnendra Bhattacharya v Emperor 8 Pat L J 566 = 101 Ind Cas 881 = 28 Cr L J 497 = A I R 1927 Pat 27. Mohesh Biswas, 19 W R Cr 16(21) So it is clear that the corroboration must be as well in respect of the identity of all the persons concerned as of the corpus delicti. 6 Mad L Jour 96 (Article) R v Sadhu Mandal, 21 W R 69, Reg v Badhu, 1 B 475, R v Kahappa, Weir 3rd Ed 491, Queen v Dosa 10 B 231, Queen Empress v Rama Saran, 8 A 306 Pame M Far v Emperor, 89 Ind Cas 889=26 Cr L J 185 The rule, as I understand it, requires that before acting upon such confessions the Court should insist upon independent corroboration from other evidence in the case in material particulars particularly as to the identity of the accused Emperor v Sabitkhan, supra

Now the question is what independent evidence is sufficient in the eye of law to corroborate the confessions of a co accused so as to entitle proper weight to be attached to the latter and to justify the Court in accepting them as true, and acting on them? 6 Mad L J Article 97 It must be borne in mind that this sort of evidence being evidence of a very defective character should be more strictly examined by the Court before it can be safely relied on. Queen v Sadhu 21 W R Cr 69, Queen v Aga 23 W R 24 The corroborative evidence must be more cogent and should be more strictly examined by the Court than when an accomplice gives evidence as a witness. Imperatrix v Ganapabhat 14 Ind Jour N S 20 R v Sadhu Munde supra There is no doubt as to the sufficiently corroborative character of the testimony of independent eye witnesses or of confessions made by the accused, in addition to confessions by the co prisoner implicating him, but the difficulty arises in cases of circumstantial evidence. What is the precise test of sufficiency of corroboration when it consists of circumstantial evidence? What must then be the nature of the corroborating facts? (6 Mad L J Article 97) In Queen v Chunder Bhattachajee, 24 W R 42 Jackson J seems to have thought that if the other evidence "tended to criminate"—though apparently not sufficient 'per se' to support a conviction from the co prisoners—it was sufficient corroboration. A similar view seems to have been taken in Imperatrix v Bayagi 14 Ind Jour N S 348 Phear J went a step further in Queen v Aga, 23 W R Cr 24, 25 and said that where the circumstantial evidence constituted "a very strong prima facie case" it was sufficiently corroborative. 6 Mad L J Article 97 But in Empress v Ashutosh Chakrabutty, 4 C 483=3 C L R 270, Jackson and Macdonell JJ said that an accused person should not be convicted 'on the ground of such confession corroborated by circumstantial evidence unless the circumstances constituting corroboration would, if believed to exist, themselves support a conviction.' But to hold that an accused person ought not to be convicted on the ground of a co accused's confession corroborated by circumstantial evidence unless the circumstances constituting corroboration would, if believed to exist, themselves support a conviction is to render section 30 of the Evidence Act superfluous. The truth is that the question of what corroborative evidence is sufficient, with the confession, to support a conviction must depend on the circumstances of each case. Ugappa v Emperor, A I R 1929 Mad 498=1929 M W N 272, see also Per Garth C J in Empress v Ashutosh Chakrabutty supra, Emperor v Sabit Khan 43 B 139=51 Ind Cas 657 The corroboration should be by reliable witness. Hira v Crown, 19 P L R 1911=1 P W R 1911 Cr =9 Ind Crs 39 The mere fact that the statement of the co-accused was used as corroboration of another part of the finding about guilt is not a ground for setting aside the conviction. Sheodatt Ray v Emperor, A I R 1929 Pat 61 The mere identification of an accused by a confessing accused who admittedly knows him, is absolutely no corroboration of the statement of the confessing accused. Dungar v Emperor, 95 Ind Cas 938=27 Cr L J 858=A. An accused person ought not to be convicted where the only evidence against him is the confession of a co-accused and circumstantial evidence, which although true would not by itself support a conviction. Sri Kishen v Kung-Ei peroi, 6 O C 201. 2 Wier 710=7 M H C App 15

There is nothing in law to prevent the conviction of an accused on the uncorroborated and retracted confession of an accomplice, if it be believed against him. Such a confession should however be approached with the greatest caution and care and should be subjected to the most anxious scrutiny in deciding on its truth or falsity so far as it incriminates any person other than him who made it. Vijaya Gan v Impeer 11 Cr L J 179=19 Ind Cas 179=6 Bur L T 4.

Retracted confession and co-accused. A retracted confession is admissible but should have no weight attached to it unless either corroborated in material particulars or unless the tribunal comes to the conclusion that the statement as a whole is a truthful statement. In either of these cases the retracted statement may be given full weight and can be used even against a co-accused. Sheonarayana v Impeer A I R 1929 Pat 212=8 Pat 262=10 P L T 20. The Evidence Act makes no distinction whatever between a retracted or unretracted confession. Both are equally admissible and may be taken into consideration against the accused though it may be that less weight would be attached to a retracted confession. Gour Chandra v Impeer, A I R 1929 Cal 11. Mahomed v Impeer 81 Ind Cas 62.

But a mere retracted confession of a co-accused cannot be sufficient to sustain the conviction of another accused. Pala Singh v Empeer, A I R 1935 Lah 329=29 Cr L J 267=107 Ind Cas 611. Common experience and common sense show that, in the absence of corroboration in material particulars, it is not safe to convict on a confession unless, from the peculiar circumstances in which it was made and judging from the reasons, alleged or apparent of the retraction there remains a high degree of certainty that the confession notwithstanding its having been retracted from, is genuine. Jairam v Empeer 30 P R 1914 Cr =50 P W R 1914 Cr =25 Ind Cas 634=264 P L R 1914 but see Pratap Singh v Crown 6 Lah 415=7 Lah L J 482. In this case the Court observed "The law with regard to retracted confession or rather its evidentiary value where it is sought to be used against a co-accused is well settled so far as this Court is concerned. It has been laid down in a long series of cases of which it is necessary only to refer to the cases of Yasin v Empeer 28 C 689 and Empeer v Lalit Mohan Chackerbutty 38 C 519, that a retracted confession should carry practically no weight against the person other than the maker because it is not made on oath is not tested by cross examination and its truth is denied by the maker himself who has lied on one or other of the occasions and the very fullest corroboration would be necessary in such a case, far more than would be demanded for the sworn testimony of an accomplice on oath." Where a confession made by an accused person is subsequently retracted by him and he does not implicate himself in the murder though he stated that one of the conspirators held the confession could not be taken into account against the co-accused for the person making the confession did not intend to implicate himself though he actually did so. Hayat v Empeer 4 Lah L J 41=1922 Lah 119=68 Ind Cas 401=23 Cr L J 561. Rama Birapa*), though of course, in taking it into consideration no weight would be attached to it as against the person implicated, unless it was sufficiently corroborated and the mere discovery, though it might be sufficient for the conviction of A in the latter case above mentioned would not of itself (apart from evidence to show that property was found in B's premises and probably put there by him) corroborate A sufficiently as to B being concerned in the theft. Ibid

Confession of a co accused and evidence of an accomplice A confession of an accused person implicating a co accused under section 30, cannot be considered as the same thing as 'testimony of an accomplice' which is referred to in section 133 of the Act Section 133 contemplates that the accomplice shall be examined as a witness This being so the provision that a conviction is not illegal merely because it proceeds upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, has no application to the case of an uncorroborated confession taken into consideration as against a co accused jointly tried with the confessing accused under section 30 *Necha v. The confession of a co-accused stands on a quite a different footing to the testimony of an accomplice which the Evidence Act treats as having a higher probative value than similar evidence has according to English law. Emperor v Gangappa Kardeppa, 21 Ind Cas 673=18 B 156=15 Bom L R 915=8 Bom Cr C 143=14 Cr L J 625. It is not strengthened by the fact that it is supported by the other confessions, whether they have been made in such circumstances as to preclude the theory that there has been connivance between the persons making the confessions or not. Nga San Ayein v King Emperor, U B R (1917) 1st Qr 3. 31 Admissions are not conclusive proof of the matters admitted, but they may operate as estoppels under the provisions hereinafter contained.

Admission—meaning of. The word 'admission' as used in this and in the previous sections is rather misleading. The law of Evidence" says Prof Wigmore, "has suffered in its most vital parts, from an ailment almost incurable—that of confusion of nomenclature. The term admissions' exhibits this misfortune in one of its notable aspects." Wigmore § 1058. According to that learned author the term "admissions" as mentioned in these sections should be termed 'quasi admissions'. "The true admissions, in the fullest sense of the term" Prof Wigmore "is another thing and involves a totally distinct principle." Prof Wigmore "is another thing and involves a totally distinct principle." Admission proper according to him concerns a method of escaping from a necessity of offering any evidence at all whereas this kind of admission, which should be termed as quasi admission is an item in the mass of evidence. The meaning of the learned writer will be made clear if we consider the meaning of the word admission as used in Order XII of the Civil Procedure Code along with the term "admission" as used in these sections. Admissions as used in Civil Procedure Code are designated judicial admissions. Such admissions may operate as a waiver relieving the opposing party from the need of any evidence and another party may at any stage of a suit where admissions of fact have been made either on the pleadings or otherwise apply to the Court for such judgment or order as upon such admission he may be entitled to. (Vide Order XII, rule 6, Civil Procedure Code). So judicial admission is a formal act, done in the course of judicial proceedings which waives or dispenses with the production of evidence, by conceding for the purposes of litigation that the proposition of fact alleged by the opponent is true. Wigmore § 1058.

Again this kind of admission must also be distinguished from the statement of parties which become in themselves the foundation of independent rights of other persons, by virtue of some doctrine of substantive law,—in other words from binding estoppels, warranties and representations. Wigmore § 1057.

Principle. It has already been stated that admission as the term is used in this as well as in the previous sections is nothing but a piece of evidence. If A claims that his boundary line runs to a oak tree, and B admitted this. B's extrajudicial admission of the boundary's location is merely evidence for the truth of the other facts on which A rests his claim. So this kind of admission being a part of evidence, it cannot be in any sense final and conclusive. The opponent whose utterance it may none the less proceed with his proof in denial for its correctness, it is merely an inconsistency which discredits in greater or less degree, his present claim and his other evidence. As regard such admissions in Heame v. Rogers, 9 B & C 577, 5-6 Bayley 1 and There is no doubt but the express admissions of a party to the suit or a admissions implied from his conduct are evidence and strong evidence against him. But we think that he is at liberty to prove that such admissions were not taken or untrue and is not estopped or concluded by them unless another person has been induced by them to alter his condition in such a case the party is estopped from disputing their truth with respect to that person (and those claiming under him) and that transaction, but as to third persons he is not bound. See also Wentworth v. Ham 12 W R 156, Kim Siran v. Pray 13 M I A 551, Steevath v. Lindo 20 W R 112, Junan v. Doolar 15 W R 317, Osley v. Ladoo 13 M I A 585, Sooran v. Ichmut 14 B L R App 1, Polsum v. Goor 18 W R 185. An estoppel is a representation acted on by the other party by creating a substantive right does oblige the estopped party to make good his representation—in other words but inaccurately, it is conclusive. So too but for an entirely different reasons a judicial admission is conclusive in the sense that it formally waives all right to deny for the purposes of the trial i.e. it removes the proposition in question from the field of disputed facts. But statements which are not estoppels or judicial admissions have no quality of conclusiveness and on principle cannot have. Higmore § 1059 Forcridge v. Botham 1 B & P 39 Newton v. Deleher 12 Q B D 921 924 Newton v. Luddard 12 Q B D 924. Such an admission does not estop a party who makes it, he is still at liberty so far as regards his own interest to contradict it by evidence. Per Parle Lm Redway v. Philip 1 C M & R 115. So a mere admission is not conclusive. It is only so in certain cases namely where it has been acted upon by the party to whom it is made. Janon Choudhry v. Doolar 18 W R 317 Bojendra v. Chammam Datta Municipality 20 W R 223 Yasant v. Pullu, 14 B 312, Chandia Kant v. Pearee Mohan 5 W R 209.

Scope of the section. Unless admissions are contractual or unless they constitute an estoppel within sections 11, to 117 of the Evidence Act they are not conclusive but are open to rebuttal or explanation, or they may be controlled by higher evidence. And this applies equally to written admissions. The rebuttal will be in accordance with the circumstances of each particular case, but must be clearly established and must show fully the reasons why such admission should not be held binding. The party may confess its untruth, he may show mistake, or that the response which formed the admission was made not in a serious but in a jocular manner or that the admission was made in ignorance of the true state of the facts. This is true even though they are made under oath although admissions thus solemnly made are evidence of great weight against the declarant, and they throw on him the burden of showing a mistake. Rez v. Clarke 8 Term Rep 220 Thornes v. White 1 Tyro & G 110. Admissions cannot be rebutted or explained by other statements of the declarant made at another time, for such other statements are not admissible for that purpose unless they form part of the gestae. Lee v. Hamilton 3 Ala 529 Roberts v. Trautick 22 Ala 490, Burr Jones § 296. Informal admissions may be either in writing or oral or even by conduct. They may have been made in business correspondence or casual conversation long before any litigation began or was even contemplated, and with no intention of making a binding admission. They are therefore more easily explained away than formal admissions. But if sufficiently clear they shift the onus of proof. Poucell on Evidence, 430.

This section declares that admissions are not conclusive proofs of the matters admitted but that they may operate as estoppels. An admission is the easiest possible kind of evidence to procure, and when the witnesses are closely related though not necessarily interested in the case there is a certain suspicion attaching to their testimony. The provision that admissions may operate as an estoppel is sometimes attempted to be used as if in total exclusion, that an admission is not conclusive proof the section means that an admission is not sufficient proof without corroboration. But this is not the meaning of conclusive proof as defined in § 4 of the Evidence Act, and when one fact is declared to be conclu-ne intrus. Sogun Baber v Achmut 14 B L R App 3-21 W R 411. An admission contained in a statement filed in plaintiff's name is not proof that they have been made by her. Ismaelomissa v Mka Ifeji, S W R 468. Collusion will render inoperative the admissions of a party, or in title against his successor. Bepin Behare v Rajah Admoner 21 W R 125. When a deed is fraudulent it is not binding on the party. Hareesh Chander v Padma Nath 11 W R 285. Bones v Foster, 27 T T Fx 262. Scanth v Burdow 20 W R 112. Ordinarily an admission is no more than a piece of evidence to be considered by the Court and would not operate as a stoppage in the defendant's favour. Hunter Penderley v Geyulhar 21 W R 108. T P Hux v Infur 19 W R 299. The circumstances under which an admission has been made should also be considered. Hansa v Shro Goring 24 W R 31. Sogun v Achmut 14 B L R App 3. Le v Samuels 1 C & K 161 166. Mohamed v Mcham 14 W R 280.

Admission by mistake. It is only necessary here to add that where judicial admissions have been made improvidently and by mistake the Court will in its discretion relieve the party from the consequences of his error by ordering a repleader or by discharging the case stated or the rule or agreement if made in Court. Greent Fe § 206. The principle on which a party is relieved against judicial admissions made improvidently and by mistake is equally applicable to admission en pass. Accordingly where a legal liability was thus admitted it was held that the jury were at liberty to consider all the circumstances, and the unlikeliest view under which it was made, that the party might show that the admission made by him arose from a mistake as to the law, and that he was not estopped by such admission unless the other party had been induced by it to alter his condition. Newton v Belcher 13 M 23-181 1 Q B 35-12 Q B 921. Newton v Fildes 12 Q B 92. Solomon v Solomon 2 Kelly 18. But in all the admissions, made under a rule of court, it is made out relating the party to relief he is held to the admission. Greent Fe § 206. Geprell v Chundabale, 19 W R 13. An admission once made is binding against the party making it for all the purposes of the suit unless it be shown that such admission was recorded erroneously. Gauze v Mulhoo-sahib, 2 W R Act X. Rule 1. An admission made by a party in a previous suit will be taken in evidence against him quantum valcat in a subsequent suit. Shah Saib v Joon Khelewan 14 W R 160. cc also Obhoy v Bejoy 9 W R 102. Harrison v Leatham 7 W R 249, Gordon v Bejoy S W R 291.

Admissions may estop. Admission, whether of law or of fact which have been acted upon by others, is conclusive against the party making them in all cases between him and the person who concluded to let them influence him. Newton v Belcher 13 M 23-181 1 Q B 921. Newton v Fildes 12 Q B 921. The doctrine of estoppel in fact, notwithstanding the great number of cases which have turned upon it and are reported in the books cannot be adequately to rest upon any determinate legal test which will reconcile the decisions. It will embrace all transactions to which the great principles of equitable necessity, where it originated, demand that it should be applied. In fact it is becoming a purely a doctrine of practical equity that its limited application is difficult and its reduction to the form of abstract formulas is still more complicated. An able Judge (Brown Earle) has suggested that only such a rule of conduct should be treated as an estoppel in fact as would sustain an averment of falsity in representation in an action on the case. That however does not seem to have been adopted by the judges. Reform, again in Lord Denman, suggests we find where, in his words or conduct, wilfully, can be shown to believe in the existence of a state of things, in evidence him to a fact which he is to show his own previous position, the form is included from averring against the latter a different state of things, a state of things at the same time. Lord Ex 300. (Ad & 11 p) 174.

With regard then to the consequences of admission, a first and fundamental rule is that the admissions and facts of the law favour the investigation of truth by all expedient and easy means to be used, and that the doctrine of estoppel by which further investigation is precluded being an exception to the general rule.

Admission acted upon, as giving rise to a totality need not be in express language to the person himself. It may be implied from the general conduct of the party. For in this case the implied declaration may be considered as addressed to every one in particular, who may have occasion to act upon it. In such cases the party is estopped on grounds of public policy and good faith from repudiating his own representations. Quirk v. Staines, 1 B & P 293 Graves v. Key 3 B & Ad 318 *Stanton v. Admissions in pleadings. Of various kind of judicial admission there are contained in pleadings command careful consideration by reason not only that they are usually solemn contents but with regard to the time at which they are made their use de hors that action the change in circumstances by subsequent amendment in brief by the circumstance surrounding their offer in evidence against the party making them including of course their verification by the party having absolute knowledge and those who speak only from information or belief. Where parties allege matters of fact in their pleadings the other party may be offered in evidence against such parties as admissions of the facts alleged. Justin v. Fir 2 Ga App 91=55 S E 318. When a fact is admitted by clear and necessary implication from other facts expressly stated in the pleading the admission so made is as effective as though it were expressly stated and will not be overcome by a mere general denial. Miles v. Kellogg 115 W R 104. Under similar rule the pleadings in pending cases are more than a mere form. They are until changed conclusive upon the parties binding them. A party undoubtedly may such portion of his opponent's verified pleading as is contained in matter capable of being used as an admission. Burr 120. The admissions given to each other in evidence are not binding upon the parties. If the plaintiff's evidence is not sufficient to establish his case the defendant may still rely on his evidence against him.

rebutted When the allegations are made on information and belief they are still admissible in evidence as the fact only detracts from the weight of the testimony Doe v Steel 3 Camp 115 Pope v Mills 115 U S 363

Admissions in pleadings, when conclusive Where a party to an action makes solemn admissions against his interest in a pleading they should be treated as admitted facts and he will not be heard to question the correctness thereof at any stage of the case in the trial Court or an appeal where properly preserved in a transcript or otherwise made so long as they remain a part of the record If the statements or admissions were made by himself or by his counsel under an honest mistake or misapprehension of what the facts really were and he desires to be relieved from the effect thereof he should apply to the trial Court for leave to withdraw such admissions or pleadings and it required to do so make a showing of good faith in support of his application which should be granted or denied in the furtherance of justice Each party to an action is in that action conclusively bound by those admissions which he expressly makes in the pleadings or by stipulations oral or written which he formally entered into for the purpose of dispensing with proofs Burr Jones § 274

Other Judicial admissions A tacit or incidental admission in one suit will not conclude the party making it in another action where precisely the same matter is not in litigation and even then admissions which are expressly made by the pleadings in one action are not conclusive in other suits unless the second action is brought on a judgment recovered in the first Shelton v Houlting 1 Wills 238 The affidavits and depositions of a party are of course competent to show his admissions although used in another suit and from their solemn character are entitled to great weight but they are not conclusive against him and do not constitute a estoppel Doe v Steel 3 Camp 115, Cameron v Lightfoot 2 W Black 1190 Studdy v Sanders 2 Dowd & R 345 De Welpdale v Milburn Price 485 "If the deposition of the defendant was incompetent as substantive evidence, either because not filed as required by statute or because the deponent was present in Court nevertheless my admissions or declarations of the defendant are pertinent to be proved by the adverse party and it is immaterial whether such declarations were proved by the oral testimony of one who heard them or by the defendant's signed statement in the form of a deposition Phoenix Mut Life Ins Co v Chul 58 N H 161, Proffitt & Thome v Luckford 72 N H 73=74 Ad 697 The admission by judgment debtor of a certain rate of usury was held to conclude them in law Karee Olm v Volwooden 9 W R 241 "A plaintiff we think after having sworn to facts resting on his own observation and knowledge before one jury should not be permitted to swear to facts directly inconsistent and to obtain from a second jury a verdict in his favour which will involve the conclusion that his testimony at the first trial was knowingly false A party testifying under oath is more than a witness He is an actor seeking the intervention of the judicial power in his behalf and thus subject to the rule allegans contraria non est audiendus which as stated in Broom's Legal Maxims p 130 expressed in technical language the true saying of Lord Kenyon that a man should not be permitted to blow hot and cold with reference to the same transaction or in different times on the truth of each of two conflicting allegations according to the promptings of his private interest Smith v Boston Elevated Ry Co 154 Fed 357

STATEMENTS BY PERSONS WHO CANNOT BE CALLED AS WITNESSES

to the Court unreasonable are themselves relevant facts in the following cases —

(1) When the statement is made by a person — as to the cause of his death, or is to any of the circumstances of the transaction which resulted in his death in cases in which the cause of that person's death comes into question

Such statements are relevant whether the person who made them was or was not, at the time when they were made, under expectation of death, and whatever may be the nature of the proceeding in which the cause of his death comes into question

(2) When the statement was made by such person in the ordinary course of business, and in particular when it consists of any entry or memorandum made by him in books kept in the ordinary course of business, or in the discharge of professional duty, or of an acknowledgment written or signed by him of the receipt of money, goods, securities or property of any kind, or of a document used in commerce written or signed by him, or of the date of a letter or other document usually dated, written or signed by him

(3) When the statement is against the pecuniary or proprietary interest of the person making it, or when it tends to expose him or would have exposed him to criminal prosecution or to civil suit for damages

(4) When the statement gives the opinion of any such person as to the existence of any public right or custom or matter of public or general interest of the existence of which it is stated he would have been likely to be aware, and when such statement was made before any controversy as to such right or custom or matter has arisen

(5) When the statement relates to the existence of any relationship* [by blood, marriage or adoption] between persons is to whose relationship* [by blood, marriage or adoption] the person making the statement had special means of knowledge, and when the statement was made before the question in dispute was raised

(6) When the statement relates to the existence of any relationship* [by blood, marriage or adoption] between persons deceased, and is made in or to which any such deceased person belonged or in any family

Statement of persons who cannot be called as witnesses. Sections 30 and 31 contain many important exceptions to the rule which excludes hearsay. The exclusion of hearsay chiefly depends upon the desirability of getting the person whose statement is relied upon into Court in order that he may be examined as a witness in the regular way. But this is practically impossible in many cases. Martyn v. Pease 32. So the first principle on which the statements are admissible is necessity. But there must be some circumstantial guarantee as regards the truthworthiness of the statement. Under English Law such statements are relevant when the declarant is dead (Step-Dignart 24). But under the Indian Evidence Act such statements are admissible when made by a person (a) who is dead, or (b) who cannot be found, or (c) who has become incapable of giving evidence, or (d) whose attendance cannot be procured without an amount of delay or expense which the Court thinks unreasonable. Nort 14 174. The reasons for the admissibility of such evidence in England is absence of any better evidence, and therefore the exceptions (b) (c) and (d) under which in India, such evidence is admissible are consonant with reason and general convenience. Nort 14 174.

Nature of Hearsay, as an Extra Judicial Testimonial Assertion. When a witness A, on the stand testifies, 'B told me that event X occurred', his testimony may be regarded in two ways. He may be regarded as a witness to the event upon his own credit, i.e. as a fact to be believed because he is credited to know it. But when it thus appears that his assertion is not based on personal observation of event X, his testimony to that event is rejected because he is not qualified by proper sources of knowledge to speak to it. (2) But upon the order to obviate that objection that we regard A is not making any assertion about event X (of which he has no personal knowledge) but is testifying to the utterance in his hearing of B's statement as to event X. To this A is not qualified to testify, so that no objection can arise on that score. The only question then can be whether this assertion of B reported by A, is admissible as evidence of the event X, asserted by B to have occurred. It is clear that what we are now attempting to do is to prove event X by B's assertion, the utterance of B's assertion being itself proved by A's testimony to it. In other words merely the making of B's assertion is properly proved by A but the occurrence of event X is all sought to be proved by this assertion of B, which was uttered out of Court but is offered testimonially for the same purpose as if it were being made presently by B on the stand. Higmore § 1361. It is of the essence of hearsay evidence to prevent to the notice of the judge two distinct persons in the character of witnesses (1) a supposed percipient and extrajudicial narrating witness stating at some antecedent point of time in the hearing of any person not or that occasion invested with the authority of a Judge some matter of fact as having had place, and (2) a deposing or say judicially narrating witness who by his testimony not to the truth of that matter of fact but to its having actually been asserted on the extrajudicial occasion in question by the extrajudicially time or narrating witness. Book VI Ch IV of Bentham's Rationale of Judicial Evidence. The Hearsay rule tells us that B's assertion cannot be admitted because it has not been made at a time and place where it could be subjected to certain essential tests or investigation calculated to demonstrate its real value by exposing such latent sources of error. Higmore § 1361.

Hearsay Rule and its exceptions—its Historical development, etc. The great head of the law of Evidence says Prof James Bradley Thayer 'confronting indeed with its exceptions much the larger part of all that truly belongs to the forbidding the introduction of hearsay. The true historical nature of the rule is hinted by the remark of an English Court, two centuries ago and over when they checked the attempt of a woman to testify what another woman had told her. 'The Court it was quietly remarked 'are of opinion that it will be proper for Hells to give her own evidence' (Eliz abell Canning's Case, 19 How, St Tr 333, 406). That is to say, the objection went to the medium of communication, witnesses before the jury, in giving ordinary testimony, had by that time been allowed for some three centuries, but it must be an oyant et voyant, a hearer and seer, as they said in the older Year Books, one who could say as the witnesses to Courts in older times always had to say quod vidi et audivi, it must not be testimony at second hand. When juries, who were themselves originally witnesses as well as triers, came to be helped regularly by the testimony of other witnesses it was only by such as personally knew the truth of what they were saying, and not by witnesses who only knew what some one else had said to them. Juries, indeed could say what they 'knew', but witnesses to juries could only say what they had seen and heard. In the first half of the fourteenth century we find the Judges laying this down as applicable in the instance of attesting witnesses. What it meant was that while juries could form opinions from anything they knew, the verdict being given at their peril while they might act on what they had picked up in any way, and on such foundations might form a judgment which would count as knowledge, yet witnesses could not do this, or rather were not to state it if they did, were not to say what they thought or 'believed, or had heard from others, or had inferred from what we now call circumstantial evidence. This contrast between the function of the jury and that of witnesses which made it necessary to discriminate and define these points five or six hundred years ago, as regards the pre-appointed witnesses who went out with the jury—even before witnesses were ordinarily allowed to testify to juries,—has led to a steady and rigid adherence to the general doctrine of hearsay prohibition.

"But there came a large and miscellaneous number of so called 'exceptions. Some of these in reality, were quite independent rules, whose operation was rather that of qualifications and abatements to the generality of this other doctrine rules which were coeval with the doctrine itself or much older. For example, it seems always to have been true, in cases of homicide, that the dying declarations of persons killed were reported and acted on in judicial proceedings. We find these used by a complaint witness as far back as 1202, and used in evidence to the jury in 1721. Such declarations in early times, and even in later times had a peculiar credit allowed them. So in tracing pedigree, the family hearsay seems always to have been resorted to. This matter, before jury trial was developed, used to be 'tried' by witnesses, who stated circumstantially how they knew what they said, and hearsay from the family, if confirmed by circumstances was probably always a basis for their testimony. Family hearsay had the aspect of family reputation, and reputation was often reckoned an adequate ground for judicial action. In the thirteenth century we find a witness, in proving another person's age, giving as the basis of his testimony the fact of the mother's recording the age in the records of a Priory, which record he had seen. In matters affecting a whole parish or a large number of persons, the hearsay and reputation of those belonging to the given community was always regarded as good.

"There was another class of unsworn statements which had always been resorted to in judicial proceedings and admitted to the jury, namely written ones,—entries in registers in a parson's books in the account books of the stewards in a merchant's books in contracts, leases, wills, and other documents. Documents had always been shown to juries—long before witnesses were received to testify to them. In the early days they did not stick, it would seem, at showing the jury any document that bore on the case without even thinking of how the writer knew what he said. As regards ancient matters writings very imperfectly authenticated were one of the chief sources of information and often the only one. It appears, then that a number of the so called 'exceptions to the hearsay prohibition came in under the head of written entries or declarations, they came in, or rather, so to speak, stayed in simply because they had always been received, and no rule against hearsay had ever been formulated or interpreted as applying to them. Such things, continuing at the present day are, e.g., the admission of old entries and writings in proof of ancient matters, written declarations of deceased persons against interest, and in the course of duty or business, and to a limited extent, a merchant's own account books to prove his own case, a thing clearly recognized as customary and allowable in an English Statute of 1678 nearly three centuries ago, but inensibly and often ignorantly, much qualified afterwards. So also of regular entries in public books, as matter probably never even doubted to be admissible in evidence.

"In addition to all the ancient and always approved practice in this simple, original shape, operating as qualifications of the hearsay prohibition there have come in many extensions of them, as when oral declarations of deceased persons against interest were received, and, in England even oral declarations of deceased persons in the course of duty or business. And not only has the scope of these old titles been enlarged, but new exceptions have been made, and perhaps they are rather old ones coming to be recognized and formulated, such as those relating to the res gestæ, i. e. declarations which are a part of some fact itself admissible and declarations of present intention or present physical sensation. Such things are the natural development of the subject.

"Now a great deal of perplexity exists, in the law relating to hearsay from a failure to understand the scope of the exceptions and from uncertainty whether and how far they are to be freely developed, or to be strictly limited as being mere exceptions while the main rule itself which prohibits hearsay is expanded. So sometimes one thing is done and sometimes the other. In a leading case in the House of Lords in 1880 Lord Blackburn, in discussing a question of hearsay and rejecting the evidence, said 'I base my judgment upon this that no case has gone so far as to say that such a document could be received and clearly unless it is to be brought within some one of the exceptions, it would fall within the general rule that hearsay evidence is not admissible' (Stuart v. Kirk, 13 App Cas 625). On the other hand Sir George Jessel in a very different time in 1876, had declared it to be the Court's duty to extend the exceptions to the hearsay rule out of regard to the reasons and principles which have induced the tribunals of this country to admit exceptions in the other cases (Sugden v. St. Leonard's, 1 Prob Div 151). It seems a sound general principle to say that in all cases a main rule is to have extension, rather than exceptions to the rule, that exceptions should be applied only within strict bound and that the main rule should apply in cases not clearly within the exception. But then comes the question, what is the rule and what the exceptions? There lies a difficult and true analysis would probably restrict the law so as to make what we call the hearsay rule the exception, and make our main rule this, namely that what is relevant is admissible. To any such main rule there would of course be exceptions but in the case of other exceptions so in the hearsay prohibition this classification would lead to a restricted application of them, while the main rule would have freer course. One mischief about the present state of our law is that it shows a spasmodic and half-recognized acceptance of such a theory in particular instances, while rejecting it generally. For example there is sometimes a tendency to regard a hearsay statement as admissible if it be one of a set of facts giving and reflecting credit, each to the other—on the principle of what is called circumstantial evidence. This brings in confusion, for our law really goes but a very little way in that direction. No doubt, in point of hearsay statements often derive much credit from the circumstance under which they are made, say, e. g., from the fact of being made under oath or under other impressive conditions as when, against interest or made under strong inducement to say the contrary, or is part of a series of statements or a class of them which are usually careful and accurate, and the like, credit amply enough in point of fact to entitle them to be received as evidence when once the absence of any perceiving witness is accounted for and it would in fact on a second look be possible to shape our law in the form that hearsay was admissible as secondary evidence whenever the circumstances of the case alone were enough to entitle it to credit irrespective of any credit reposed in the speaker. This point of view is for ever suggesting itself in that part of the subject relating to declarations which are a part of some inadmissible fact—of the res gestæ and the phrase is often spoken of as parts of a mass of circumstantial facts described as res gestæ all evidential supporting, and supported by each other in their tendency to prove one principal fact, instead of being regarded as they should be as parts of that fact itself, pars rei gestae. It is under the count of hearsay, but received by way of exception, on account of this special intimacy of connection with the admissible facts. This part of the subject presents an instructive spectacle of confusion, resulting from the desire on the one hand to hold to the just historical theory of our case, and on the other to resort to fast principles without being aware of the size and complexity of the task which is thus unconsciously entered upon." Flayer's Pict Treat Evid pp 215, 22.

Theory of Hearsay Rule The principle of exclusion of hearsay evidence is thus stated by Chief Baron Gilbert: "Credit being derived from attestation and evidence it can rise no higher than the fountain from whence it flows, and if the first speech was without oath and when there was such a speech makes it no more than a bare speaking which cannot be of more worth derivatively than at first, and so of no value in a Court of Justice where all things are determined under the solemnity of an oath. If a man swears to his own knowledge, he must show the circumstances and incur the risk of confutation; but if a man were allowed to swear to in hearsay it would admit general allegation for the proof or disproof of which no concomitant particulars could be expected of the witness." Gilbert on Evidence by Jeff Vol II p 889. So the rule which excludes hearsay has been propounded accordingly as founded upon two reasons: "what the other party said was not upon oath and the party who is to be affected by it, had no opportunity of cross-examining him." Ibid see also Wigmore § 1362. It seems agreed that what a stranger has been heard to say is inadmissible no matter of evidence either for or against a prisoner not only because it is not upon oath but also because the other side hath no opportunity of a cross examination. Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown C II C 46 § 44. See also the objection of Peelham in Fabry's v. Mostyn 29 How St Tr 135. In Wright v. Tatham 7 A & E 313, Coleman J said: "The admission of an oath furnishes some guarantee for the sincerity of the opinion, and the power of cross examination gives an opportunity of testing the foundation and the value of it. In the same case Alderson B said: "The general rule is that facts are to be proved by testimony of persons on oath and subjected to cross-examination. In Grasham Hotel v. Manning 1 R 101 12. O'Brien J said: "The statements and declarations of opinion received in evidence in this case were made by parties not examined upon oath or subject to cross-examination and would not be exempted from the general rule excluding hearsay evidence."

In one of the cases just stated is put on the right of cross examination. In Dyball Peerage Case L R 6 App Cas 703, Lord Blackburn observed: "In England hearsay evidence that is to say the evidence of a man who is not produced in Court and who therefore cannot be cross-examined is a general rule is not admissible at all." See also Imesley v. Earl of Arundel, 17 How St Tr 1160. Lord Melville's Trial 29 How St Tr 747. So "the general rule is that hearsay evidence is not admissible for the reason that such statements are not subjected to the ordinary tests required by law for ascertaining their truth,—the author of the statements not being exposed to cross examination in the presence of a Court of justice and not speaking under the personal sanction of an oath with no opportunity to investigate his character and motives and his deportment not subject to observation." *Mayshall v. Exception to the Hearsay Rule The purpose and reason of the Hearsay Rule is the key to the exception to it. The theory of the Hearsay rule is that the many possible sources of inaccuracy and untrustworthiness which may be underneath the bare untested citation of a witness can be brought to light and exposed, if they exist by the test of cross examination. But this test or security may in a given instance be superfluous it may be efficiently clear in that instance that the statement offered is free from the risk of inaccuracy and untrustworthiness, so that the test of cross examination would be a work of supererogation. Moreover, the test may be impossible of employment—for

S 32. example, by reason of the death of the declarant—, so that, if his testimony is to be used at all, there is a necessity for taking it in the untested shape. The two considerations—a circumstantial guarantee of trustworthiness, and a necessity for the evidence—may be examined more closely, taking first the latter.

(1) Where the test of cross examination is impossible of application by reason of the declarant's death or some other cause rendering him now unavailable as a witness on the stand we are faced with the alternative of receiving his statements without that test, or of leaving his knowledge altogether unutilized. The question arises whether the interests of truth would suffer more by adopting the latter or the former alternative. Whatever might be thought of the general policy of choosing the former alternative without any further requirement, it is clear at least that, so far as in a given instance some substitute for cross examination is found to have been present, the ground for making an exception. The mere necessity alone of taking the untested statement instead of none at all might not suffice, but if, to this necessity there is added a situation in which some degree of trustworthiness more than the ordinary can be predicated of the statement, there is reason for admitting it as not merely the best that can be got from that witness but better than could ordinarily be expected without the test of cross examination.

(2) There are many situations in which it can be easily seen that such a required test would add little as a security, because its purposes had been already substantially accomplished. If a statement has been made under such circumstances that even a sceptical caution would look upon it as trustworthy (in the ordinary instance), in a high degree of probability, it would be pedantic to insist on a test whose chief object is already secured. Supposing that such a situation exists, the statement could properly be received especially if no other evidence from that person was now available. A perception of these two principles and their combined value has been responsible for most of the Hearsay exceptions. Wigmore § 1420

First Principle—Necessity. The scope of the first principle may be briefly indicated by terming it the Necessity principle. It implies that now we shall lose the benefit of the evidence entirely unless we accept it untested there is thus a greater or less necessity for receiving it. (1) The person whose statement is offered may now be dead or out of the jurisdiction, or insane or otherwise unavailable for the purpose of testing. This is the commoner and more palpable reason. It is found in the exception for dying declarations and the seven ensuing ones. The principle is not always fully and consistently carried out in the rules but the general notion is clear and unmistakable and it is acknowledged in these exceptions with more or less directness and strictness. The assertion may be such that we cannot expect, again or at this time, to get evidence of the same value from the same or other sources. This appears more or less fully in the exception for spontaneous declarations (vide notes under section 6) for reputation, and in part elsewhere. Here we are not threatened (as in the first case) with the entire loss of a person's evidence, but merely of some valuable source of evidence. The necessity is not so great perhaps hardly a necessity, only an expediency or convenience, can be predicated. But the principle is the same. Wigmore § 1421. Hearsay evidence is not receivable when there is better evidence. There are certain subjects which cannot possibly from their very nature admit of the production of immediate evidence such as relationship character custom, prescription and the like. Baynam v. Oliver. W. R. Act X Rule 30.

Second Principle—Circumstantial Guarantee of Trustworthiness. The second principle which combined with the first entitles us to accept the evidence untested is in the nature of a practicable substitute for the ordinary test of cross-examination. We see that under certain circumstances the probability of accuracy and trustworthiness of statement is practically sufficient, if not quite equivalent to that of statements tested in the conventional manner. This circumstantial guarantee of trustworthiness is found in a variety of circumstances sanctioned by judicial practice and it is usually from one of the salient circumstances that the exception takes its name. There is no complete attempt to secure uniformity in the degree of trustworthiness which the circumstances presuppose. It is merely that common sense and experience have from time to time pointed them out as practically adequate substitutes for the ordinary test, at least, in view of the necessity of the situation. Wignore § 1422

Witness qualifications, and other Rules, also to be applied to statements admitted under these exceptions. The Hearsay rule is merely an additional test or safeguard to be applied to testimonial evidence otherwise admissible. The admission of hearsay statements by way of exception to the rule therefore presupposes that the assessor possessed the qualifications of a witness in regard to knowledge and the like. In Dysart Peerage Case L R 6 App Cas 489 at p 504, Lord Blackburn said: "It is impossible to say that if a person said something and could not himself if alive have been permitted to give testimony to prove it, he can by dying render that statement admissible. I think that is a self-evident proposition." The qualifications are fundamental as rules of relevancy. Thus the extra-judicial statements may be inadmissible because of their failure to fulfil the ordinary rules about qualifications even though they meet the requirements of a hearsay exception. For example, in the Pedigree Exception there are rules about membership in the family which rest solely on the necessity of knowledge in the person whose statement is offered, not a rule of testimonial qualifications. Wignore § 1424. But Justice Cunningham says as regard dying declarations: "The English ruling in R v Pile C & P 598 according to which the dying declaration of a child of such tender years that he could not understand the doctrine of a future state, was rejected is not applicable under the present section, nor it would seem is the question of the competence of the person to hear testimony, one which affects the admissibility of the statement. If it complies with the requirements of this section it is relevant, though, possibly, of small importance." Cum Ex 162

Scope of Section 32 This section is also an exception to the Hearsay rule of the evidence. Secondary evidence of any oral statement is called hearsay. The repetition by a witness of that which he was told by some one else who is called as a witness is hearsay, and is therefore, as a general rule inadmissible. The reasons for this rule are obvious. We can generally trust a witness who states something which he himself has either seen or heard but when he tells us something which he has heard from another person, his statement is obviously less reliable and satisfactory. A multitude of probable contingencies diminish its value. The witness may have misunderstood or imperfectly remembered or even may be wilfully misrepresenting the words of a third person or the latter may have spoken hastily inaccurately or even falsely. Moreover the person who is really responsible for the statement did not make it on oath he was not cross-examined upon it, and the Court had no opportunity of observing his demeanour when he made it. It is a fundamental principle of our law that evidence has no claim to credibility, unless it be given on oath, or what is equivalent to an oath and unless the party to be affected by it has an opportunity of cross-examining the witness. Poulet, Et 305. There are various exceptions to the general rule and they are based on good reasons. The exceptions as stated in this section are as follows:—Statements written or verbal of relevant facts when made by a person (a) who is dead or (b) who can not be found or (c) who has become incapable of giving evidence or (d) whose attendance cannot be procured without an amount of delay or expense which under the circumstances of the case appears to the Court unreasonable, are admissible. (1) when it relates to the cause of his death or (2) when it is made in course of business or (3) when it is made against the interest of the maker or (4) when it gives opinion as to public right or custom or matters of general interest or (5) when it relates to relationship or (6) when it is made in will or deed relating to family affairs or (7) when it is made in document relating to transaction mentioned in section 13 clause (ii) or (8) when it is made by several persons and expresses feelings relevant to the matter in question. In the absence of the conditions prescribed by section 32 of the Evidence Act a plaint filed in a prior litigation is not admissible to prove a statement by a superior landlord. Lalshan v Talim 39 C 1 190-28 C W N 103, = 80 Ind Cas 557. A recital in a document is

S 32 admissible in evidence against parties who are not parties to the document only where the conditions laid down in section 32 of the Evidence Act are fulfilled
Ram Sarup v. Bhagwant Prasad 57 Ind Cas 191

Requisites of admissibility under section 32 Statements oral and written made by persons not parties to the suit, and not witnesses therein, are not admissible to prove the truth of the facts stated except in two classes of cases (a) where they are rendered necessary by the difficulty of obtaining other proof, and where the circumstances under which they are made furnish some guarantee of their reliability other than the mere fact of their having been made. McClellan v. Do p 251. The above is a statement of the rule of evidence commonly called the 'rule against hearsay' and perhaps is a satisfactory statement as now. Roughly speaking two general notions underlie these exceptions to the Hearsay rule and these notions have already been said are suggested by the principle of the rule itself. The first of these is that of necessity, i.e. the situation in which it is no longer possible to subject the person to oath and cross-examination so that if his statements are to be had at all they must be had without applying these securities (i.e. securities guaranteed by oath and cross-examination) for truthworthiness. The law on the subject is thus laid down by Tyler v. C. J. in Garwood v. Dennis 4 Binn 328 "It is objected that, however impressive the declaration of a man of character may be, yet the law admits the word of no man in evidence without oath. The general rule certainly is so but the subject to relaxation in cases of necessity or extreme inconvenience." The second notion is that even though a necessity exists for relaxing the Hearsay rule nevertheless this is not to be done unless there is, in the particular class of declarations offered some circumstantial guarantee of truthworthiness which shall in some degree at least—supply the test of oath and cross-examination otherwise required. Green v. Li Vol I p 196. In Southwell v. Williams 10 Conn 507 Loomis v. J. and "The law does not dispense with the sanction of oath and the test of cross-examination is a prerequisite for the admission of verbal testimony unless it discovers in the nature of the case some other indication or test equivalent for ascertaining the truth. So statements made by persons who are dead or otherwise incapacitated from being called as a witness are admitted in the cases mentioned in s 32 and 3. Steph v. J. 110 On the principle of necessity the rule excluding hearsay is relaxed, and circumstances under which statements are made under the section guarantee the truthworthiness of the statements. Id. Marby Li 33. The whole scope and object of the section centre upon securing the highest degree of truth, possible in the circumstances, for the statement. Sethna v. Mir 9 Bom L R 1047. Section 32 imposes restrictions upon the admissibility of statements made by persons who cannot be brought before the Court to give their own evidence. The object of those restrictions and the reasons for them are plain. The basic principle of legal evidence being that the Court must always have the best it follows that where persons can be they must be brought before the Court to tell what they know at first hand. Their veracity can then be tested by the art of cross-examination. Where however witnesses cannot be brought before the Court their previous statements are at best indirect evidence of a kind that a Court would not except under necessity receive at all. The conditions which are compelled by necessity to take this evidence or none are imposed upon it. Its admissibility plainly must afford some guarantee of its truth. As there is no chance of testing the man by cross-examination his statement will not be admitted unless it is made under conditions which looking to the ordinary course of human affairs raise pretty strong presumptions that it was a true statement. Per Braman J. in ibid

Written or verbal The rule regarding hearsay is so sweeping that it excludes all written hearsay irrespective of the mode in which it is procured. It is very often in the form of official record but more frequently according to a particular commercial transaction to which it relates. Of course the fact that a written hearsay is in the form of letters or telegrams does not avail to make it admissible. The fact that hearsay is printed no matter in what form does not affect the application of the rule. Barr Jones § 298. A written statement is excluded if they fall within the hearsay rule, it is but proper that they should be admitted as evidence if they fall within any of the exceptions to that rule.

'Verbal' means by words. It is not necessary that the words should be spoken. If the term used in the section were 'oral' it might be that the statement must be confined to words spoken by the mouth. But the meaning of the word 'verbal' is something wider. The words of another person may be so adopted by a witness as to be properly treated as the words of the witness himself. Per Petheram C J in Queen Empress v. Abdulla 7 A 355 (397) F B. In the same case Straight J said: 'I am also of opinion that the signs made by the deceased Dulari in response to the question put to her may be given in evidence with the object of supplying material from which the inference may properly be drawn that he either adopted or negatived the matter of such questions. If the significance of these signs is established satisfactorily to the mind of the Court then I think that such questions taken with her assent or dissent to them clearly proved, constitute a verbal statement as to the cause of her death within the meaning of s 32 of the Evidence Act. I am not disposed to draw such a purely technical distinction as to say that while questions adopted or negatived by a mere 'yes' or 'no' constitute a verbal statement within s 32, they become inadmissible when a sent or dissent is expressed by a nod or a shake of the head. But Mahmood J expressed a different view in the same case. At page 393 he said: 'I should accept the view expressed by the learned Chief Justice if we had not to interpret the language of the Statute and if I did not feel unable to extend the meaning of the term 'verbal' in s 32 of the Evidence Act beyond that of word to mere verbal cannot mean more than by means of a word or words. Nodding the head or waving the hand is not a word. As regards dying declarations Prof Greenleaf observes: 'The testimony here spoken of may be given as well by signs as by words: thus where one lying at the point of death and conscious of her situation, but unable to utter fully by reason of the wounds she had received, was asked to say whether the prisoner was the person who had inflicted the wounds and if so to squeeze the hand of the interrogator, and she thereupon squeezed his hand it was held that this evidence was admissible and proper for consideration of the jury. Greenleaf Li § 139(b). In Mahabub v. Com 78 Ky 552 Hines J said: 'Dying declarations are not necessarily either written or spoken. Any method of communication between mind and mind may be adopted that will develop the thought as the precursor of the hand and eye of the hand or a glance of the eye. See also R v. Lome 10 Lj C 1, 3 9, R v. Steele, 12 Cox Cr C 168.

Rejection of evidence by the lower Court. When the Court below had rejected the evidence of certain witnesses on the ground that it was hearsay only and had not conformed with section 32 of the Evidence Act and on the face of the evidence it was sometimes uncertain whether the witnesses were speaking from their own personal knowledge or from information derived from others but the Court had considered it from both points of view and held it admissible the Judicial Committee was no reason to differ from the estimate which the Court had formed as to the credibility of the witness in the former case nor in the latter case, to question the manner in which the Court had applied the provisions of section 32. Shafiq ul Misa v. Shabou Ali Khan 26 A 791-9 C W N 105-6 Bom L R 759.

Relevant facts. This section lays down that the statement whether written or verbal must be a statement as to relevant facts. Per Petheram C J in Queen Empress v. Abdulla 7 A 355 (386) F B. As regards relevant facts the rule notes under sections 3 and 7. Now the question is whether facts in issue are relevant facts. In Rajani Bhusana v. India Landis, 34 W 875 it was contended that facts in issue are not relevant facts. In that case Phillips J in delivering his judgment said: 'If a fact is in issue it is undoubtedly a fact relevant to the case or proceeding. Facts must be either relevant or irrelevant and I am not prepared to uphold the learned Advocate General's contention that there are 3 separate classes of facts, i.e. relevant irrelevant and facts in issue. To hold that facts in issue are not relevant facts within the meaning of section 32 cannot see that the meaning in that section can be different to that of relevant facts.

S 32. other portions of the Evidence Act, would lead to startling results. Dying declarations as to the deceased's murder would be inadmissible in evidence for and absolutely the identity of the murderer is a fact in issue in a trial for murder. A Court could also shut out most important evidence by framing issues as regards all relevant facts. These facts would then become facts in issue and all statements relating to them would at once be inadmissible. This cannot have been the intention of the Legislature. Facts in issue are facts about which there is a question in issue between the parties, and although all relevant facts are not necessarily facts in issue, I cannot understand how the facts that are in issue can be other than relevant to the determination of the suit and thus I think it clear from the language of section 6. But see Patel v Patel, 15 B 565.

Person. This argument was based entirely upon the provision of the General Clauses Act which says that 'person' shall include 'persons', it was contended that 'person' in section 32 must be read as 'persons'. I do not think that this ingenious argument is entitled to succeed. Pri Maclean C J in Chin Nath v Nirmadhab, 3 C W N 88 (89) = 26 C 236 (237). So a statement relating to the existence of any relationship contained in a document signed by several persons some only of whom are dead, is admissible in evidence under clause 5 of section 32 of the Evidence Act, if any of the executants of the document is dead, the statement made by that person, would be admissible under section 32, if it comes under one or other of its clauses, being that the statement of a person who is dead. Ibid.

Who is dead. Death is universally considered to be sufficient to entitle a Necessity Principle. In Pitch v Chapman, 10 Conn 11 Williams J said 'I am of opinion that where such evidence is admitted seem to proceed generally upon the principle that, by the death of the person, better evidence cannot be had. Whether a person, though alive at the time the plaintiff closed his case was not called a witness, statement in writing by such a person filed before his death in support of the plaintiff's case was held to be inadmissible in evidence as statement of a deceased person. Jagat Lal v Jogeshan 25 A 149 P C. So also this section has no application to the case of a witness who has been fully examined and cross-examined but who happens to die before the termination of the trial. In such a case it is not open to either party to apply under section 32 for admission of the previous statement made by the witness. Sahdeo v Anu Kumari, 46 Ind Cis 929. Where a person making a dying declaration chooses to live his statement is not admissible. Emperor v Jam Sattu & Bawa R 434.

Who cannot be found. If a witness has disappeared from observation or is in effect unavailable for the purpose of compelling his attendance, his disappearance is shown by the party's inability to find him after due and diligent search. The only objection to recognising this ground of unavailability is the possibility of collusion between party and witness, but supposing the Court to be satisfied that there had been no collusion and that the evidence is bona fide, this objection loses its force. Wignore § 1405. 'If a party cannot find a witness then he is as if he were dead unto him, and his former testimony may be read so as the party make oath that he did his endeavour to find the witness but that he could not see him nor hear of him. Amen. God hold.' In Oates Trial 10 How St Tr 1227, 1285 Oates. 'My lord I will produce what he swore at another trial, J. C. J. Jeffereys. Why when I was he dead?' Oates. 'My lord it has cost a great deal of money to search for him out, but I cannot anywhere meet with him and that makes my case so much worse that I cannot, when I have done all that man can do to get my witness together. I went in the depth of winter for him when I thought my trial would have come on before, but I could never hear of him. L. C. J. Jefferies. Though in strictness unless the party be dead we do not use to admit such evidence yet if you can prove anything he swore at any other trial we will indulge you so far.' So it must be proved that after diligent search he was not found within the jurisdiction of the Court. Mer inability to find at the residence or in the country is not sufficient. Thomas v State 113 Al 133. Mich v State 111 Al 1. Burton v State 113 Al 174, Page 5.

1 In Jacobi v State 133 Ala. 1 a fruitless search for him in every country in which there is any apparent likelihood of his being found was held sufficient so to make a living person's statement admissible under this section it must be shown that even after a reasonable exertion to find him, he was not found. Queen v Lalumaram 24 W R Cr 18 (19), Jude notes under s 33 Where a person making a dying declaration chances to live his statement cannot be admitted in evidence as dying declaration under s 32 of the Evidence Act but it may be relied on, under s 177 of the Evidence Act to corroborate the testimony of the complainant when examined in the case. Imperial v Rama Sattu 4 Bom L R 434

Incapable of giving evidence In a murder case one of the witnesses for the prosecution was deaf and mute, and the question whether the gesticulation of that man at the place, where the body of the murdered boy was found and during the police inquiry, and subsequently in Court, were evidence against the prisoner and if so what was their value. The Sessions Judge was satisfied that the deaf mute could not understand the questions that were put to him and for the most part could not make his meaning intelligible. Held that the deaf mute was not a competent witness within the meaning of section 118 of the Evidence Act. The signs made by him if regarded as conduct were not admissible as evidence against the prisoner under section 8 of the Evidence Act and if regarded as statements, they were equally inadmissible under section 32 of that Act. Samaidin v King Emperor, 5 O C 246. In delivering the judgment the Court observed at p 249 "In the present case we are not satisfied that Bikari was during the police enquiry capable of understanding questions put to him, and he has therefore not become incapable of giving evidence within the meaning of section 32. He has all along been incapable of giving evidence." For further meaning of the word "incapable", vide notes under section 33 where the matter has been fully discussed.

Delay or expense Plaintiffs were the agents of the defendants for the sale of certain produce shipped to Europe. Such produce was disposed of by plaintiffs sub agents, at various markets abroad who were submitting accounts to the plaintiffs for the sums realised by the sale of the produce. These account sales were admitted in evidence under s 32 of the Evidence Act as written statements of relevant facts made by persons whose attendance could not be procured without unreasonable delay and expense such statements having been made in the ordinary course of business, and consisting of documents used in commerce and written or signed by persons making them. Musen v Ram Sattu 16 M 238. Vide also notes under section 33.

CLAUSE I

Dying declarations when admissible under English Law A declaration made by a declarant as to the cause of his death or as to any of the circumstances of the transaction which resulted in his death is deemed to be relevant only in trials for murder or manslaughter of the declarant, and only when the declarant is shown to the satisfaction of the Judge to have been in actual danger of death and to have given up all hopes of recovery at the time when his declaration was made. Steph Dig Art 26 So declarations are not admissible upon charges other than homicide, or as to homicides other than that of the declarant. The deceased must be proved to the satisfaction of the Judge to have been at the time of making the declaration in actual danger of death and to have abandoned all hope of recovery. Philp Fit 3d Ed p 277 In England this evidence is peculiar to homicide. So the application of the rule is strictly and absolutely limited to cases in which the death of the person who made the declaration is the subject of enquiry or is part of the same transaction. R v Wead 2 B & C 605. So dying declaration is not admissible on an indictment of perjury. Ibid So when on an indictment for administering swin to a woman pregnant, but not quick with child, with intent to procure abortion evidence of her dying declaration was tendered (the woman being dead) Baley J rejected the evidence observing that although the declaration might relate to the cause of the death still such declarations were admissible in those cases alone where the death of the party was the subject of enquiry. R v Hutchison, 2 B & C 603 (note), see also J v Hind, 29

S. 32. L J M C 117. So as to robbery, the dying declaration of the person killed has been frequently disallowed. J. v. Lloyd 3 C & P 273. Such declaration is also not admissible when in a charge of rape. J. v. Dimmock 1 Leach 347. In R. v. Baker, 2 M & Rob 5, it appeared that poison was administered to a male which he ate for breakfast immediately after which he was taken ill and his maid servant who was present and had made the cake, and that he was not afraid of it and thereupon ate of it, and was in consequence poisoned and died. His dying declarations touch after she knew of her master's death and was conscious of her own approaching death as to the manner in which she had made the cake and that she put nothing bad in it and that the prisoner was present eating his breakfast at one end of the table while she was making the cake at the other end of it were tendered in evidence and objected to on the ground that the only person whose dying declarations could be received in evidence was the person whose death formed the subject of enquiry at the trial. To render a dying declaration admissible in evidence it is necessary to the Judge beyond reasonable doubt not only that when it was made the declarant was in articulo mortis or actual danger of death [See Pierce Case 11 C & L 108 (112)] but also that he had given up all hopes of life, i.e. was settled, hopeless expectation of impending death. J. v. Woodcock, 1 Leach 347. In that case Eyre C J said "The general principle on which the evidence is admitted is that the declaration made in extremity when the party is at the point of death and when every hope of this world is gone, when every motive to falsehood is silenced, and the mind is induced by the most powerful considerations to speak the truth, a situation so solemn and so awful is considered by the law as creating an obligation equal to that which is created by a positive oath administered in a Court of Justice." Similarly in J. v. Fike, 6 C & P 595, Faite J said "We allow the declarations of persons in articulo mortis to be given in evidence if it appear that the person making such declaration was then under the deep impression that he was soon to render an account to his Maker." Similarly in Ishton's Case 2 Lew C C 147, Milner J said "When a person comes to the conviction that he is about to die, he is in the same practical situation as if called on in a Court of Justice under the sanction of an oath, and his declarations as to the cause of his death are considered equal to an oath but they are nevertheless open to observation for though the sanction is the same the opportunity of investigating the truth is very different and therefore the accused is entitled to every allowance and benefit that he may have to it by the absence of the opportunity of more full investigation by the means of cross-examination." In J. v. Woodcock 6 C & P 160 Woodcock J observed that "any hope of recovery however slight existing in the mind of the declarant at the time of the declaration being made would undoubtedly render the evidence of such declarant inadmissible."

At the Old Bailey in September Session 1754 George was indicted by the Thorn Eyre present Mr Justice Gould, for robbing the Mail of Charenton (a gold watch chain seals and trinkets). During the trial the prisoner counsel informed the Court that a young man of the name of Edward very much resembling the person of the prisoner had been recently executed for the same robbery and immediately previous to the awful moment of his fate, he had communicated something to the Rev Mr Filleter the chaplain in ordinary of the prison touching the commission of the identical robbery then under consideration. He therefore submitted to the Court that as Mr Filleter's knowledge of this subject had proceeded from the solemn declaration of a dying man it was admissible evidence in favour of the prisoner. The Court observed "It will be inconsistent with the rules of evidence which are rules of justice to exclude a witness to the declaration of a person dying under the solemn sanction of a witness." The principle upon which this species of evidence is received is that the prisoner is impressed with the awful idea of approaching dissolution and under a great

S. 32. appear to have been laid down that dying declarations are only admissible when the death of the declarant is the subject of enquiry. The existence of this rule of exclusion is asserted in R v Mead, page 608, but Jb Justice Colman in Mr Baron Parke in h v Bates Morley and Robinson's Report Vol 2, page 30, did not act upon it. In R v Hind, 29 Law Journal Magazine's Cases 145 the rule was laid down in R v Mead was again enunciated and acted on. Neither in R v Mead nor in R v Hind is a single argument given or authority quoted in support of the rule. It cannot, therefore, be said that the authority of English decisions is very strong, in support of the exclusion. With regard to the English treatises Best, Phillips, and Taylor, all recognise the exclusion of the evidence in such cases, they all treat the admissibility of dying declarations as an exceptional and place this limitation on the exception, that the declaration must relate to the death of the person making the declaration, and is only evidence when that is the subject of enquiry, but there is little force in their reasoning. Our reason for thinking that this evidence ought to have been admitted is, that no possible reason can be given for its admission in the case where the death of the party making the statement is the subject of the enquiry, which does not apply with equal force to its admissibility in the present case. The ground on which dying declarations are admissible is that when they are made the declarant is in a condition in which, according to experience of mankind it is not less likely that what he says is true than if it had been said before a Magistrate under the sanction of an oath and in presence of the prisoner. It is therefore put on a level with a deposition, technically called which is admissible in the case of the deponent's death or absence from illness. But this has nothing to do with the nature of the crime to which the evidence relates. It is just as applicable to one crime as to another. It has been said that Courts have been driven to accept this evidence by the necessity of the case, the necessity arising from the fact that the injured person, who might be the principal witness against the prisoner is dead. We may remark that such necessity, as it is called is not a ground for receiving evidence which ought on other grounds to be excluded nor is it the reason why this evidence is admitted, but even if it were so that necessity is just as likely to exist where the deceased person has been robbed or raped or assaulted as where he has been murdered. See also Queen v Updell 3 D W P 212. In England to render a dying declaration admissible, the declarant must have been in actual danger of death he must have been fully aware of the danger and death must have ensued. Taylor 11 Cr 718, Sussex Peerage 11 Cr 11 Cl & F 108, R v Curtis 21 F & L 87, h v Woodcock, 10 Cox 3, R v Osman 15 Cox 1, R v Gloster 16 Cox 471, R v Forster, 10 Cox 3, Whitely Stokes Anglo Ind Codes Vol. II p 828. It is not necessary that the apprehension should be of death in a certain number of hours or days. The question turns rather on the state of the person's mind at the time of making the declaration than upon the interval between the declaration and the death. Russ Cr 2089. It is not necessary that the deceased should express any apprehension of danger for his consciousness of approaching death may be reasonably inferred not only from his declaring that he knows his illness, but from the nature of the wound or state of illness or other circumstances of the case. R v John 1 East P C 357, R v Woodcock 1 Leach 500, 14 Cox 337. But in India the statement is relevant, whether the person who made it was or was not at the time when it was made under expectation of death. See also Queen v Dugamber 19 W R Cr 44. Before the passing of the Indian Evidence Act the law of India was somewhat on this point that of England. So according to Act XXV of 1851, the declaration of a deceased person was only evidence when the deceased "at the time of making such declaration believed himself to be in danger of approaching death" although he entertained at the time of making it hopes of recovery. Section 29 of Act II of 1857 also enacts that when a dying declaration is evidence, it shall be received if it be proved that the deceased was at the time of making the declaration and then thought himself to be, in the danger of approaching death etc. Both these enactments then required that before a dying declaration is received in evidence it should be proved that the person making it believed himself to be in danger of approaching death. It appears that the evidence is not received upon any other ground than that of necessity in order to prevent murder going unpunished. Its admission can be justified only on the ground of this last necessity growing out of the facts that the murderer, by putting the witness, and generally the sole witness, of his crime beyond the power of the Court by killing him, shall not thereby escape the consequence of his crime. Nevertheless, this is the only ground on which such testimony can be admitted it remains to be seen whether that exists so generally or to so great an extent where the death of any one other than the declarant is the object of the inquiry as to justify the adoption of rule admitting such testimony? Such declaration may not concern any and all topics. It may concern fact leading up to or in connection with the injurious act which has resulted in the declarant's death, but it is only in such facts that the supposed necessity for the testimony can exist. Hopwood 1 Cr. & 1151. The foregoing limitation, it will be observed, are logically required by the principle is introduced by Sergeant Fitz in Notes of the Common Law Vol. I p. 343 where he said "Be it then and evidence of guilt in general cases of felony that a declaration of evidence more particularly in the case of homicide which is the declaration of the deceased after the mortal blow is to the fact itself and the party by whom it is committed. Evidence of this sort is admissible in this case on the full necessity for it often happens that there is no third person present to be an eye witness to the fact and the usual witness on occasion of other felonies, namely the party injured himself is either dead or but too faint and equally necessary result of it have never been accepted."

(1) If the killing was not secret or if other and adequate testimony in the circumstances of the death is obtained nevertheless the dying declaration is admissible even though in strictness it is not needed.

(2) When the fact of the killing is conceded the dying declaration under the spurious principle is by hypothesis unnecessary, nevertheless the result is not recognized the declaration is admitted even where the killing is conceded. Hopwood & 1151.

Where in committing a felony, the deceased caused the death of a person the latter's dying declaration is to what was done by those concerned in the felony in which the murder was caused, was held to be not only relevant but the person who actually caused the death but also against those concerned in the felony. In re J. Subba Iyer 2 Wier 740, see also R v. Leitch, 2 M. & R. 53.

The dying declaration must not in general include matter inadmissible from the mouth of a witness—e.g. hearsay or irrelevancy. Philp 15th Ed. 100. Jay 1 Cr. 720. Ex v. Sellers 1 Cr. & L. 233. Whatever the declaration may be it must be complete in itself for if the dying man appears to have intended to qualify it by other statements which he is prevented by any cause from making, it will be received. Bayley 1 Cr. & 621. Section 32 (1) does not cover only statement made by the person when he is dying from the result of the injury which caused his death but it also covers the statement as to the circumstances of the transaction which resulted in his death made before the injury causing his death was inflicted. Emperor v. Shudhan A. I. R. 1926 Bom. 514 = 50 I. L. J. 28 Bom. I. R. 101; see also Chunhal v. King Emperor A. I. R. 1924 A. 11 = 11 I. R. 191; Emperor v. Jai 20 P. I. R. 1916 Cr. = 10 Ind. Cr. 998 = 47 P. I. R. 1916 but see Antar Singh v. The Crown 31 Ind. 421 = A. I. R. 1921 Ind. 215 where it was held that dying declarations or statements made by a dying person as to the injuries which have brought him to that condition in the circumstances in which the injuries were inflicted and a such statement made by a declarant long prior to the occurrence resulting in death were not dying declarations and are not admissible under the Evidence Act. When a person commits murder the result of all treatment received at the hands of an accused person and the treatment is the cause though not the direct cause of the death the whole of all treatment and subsequent medical treatment and the treatment and the treatment made by the deceased is to the cause of his death and the treatment made and a section 32 (1) of the Evidence Act. Emperor v. Jai 20 P. I. R. 1916 Cr. = 47 P. I. R. 1917. Where the deceased who had himself charged the accused with having wounded him stated that another who had died was killed by the accused, held that such statement was not admissible.

sible under s 32 (1) Talbot v Empire 17 P R 1901 Cr. In the proceedings before a Magistrate on a charge of causing grievous hurt two (among other) witnesses one of whom was the person injured were examined on behalf of the prosecution. The prisoners were committed for trial. Subsequently the person injured died in consequence of the injury inflicted on him. At the trial before the Sessions Judge, charges of murder and of culpable homicide not amounting to murder were added to the charge of grievous hurt. The deposition of the deceased witness was put in and read at the Sessions trial. Held, that the evidence was admissible either under s 32 (1) or s 33 of the Evidence Act notwithstanding the additional charges before the Sessions Court. Empress v Joshua 7 C 12-8 C L R 27. A statement of a witness as to what he heard from the deceased when it does not relate to the cause of his death or the circumstances of the transaction which resulted in his death is hearsay and is not admissible, they must be proved in the ordinary way, i.e. by evidence of a primary character and not by hearsay testimony. Queen v Empire v Sweeney 10 C L R 274-28 C 197. This clause rests on the doctrine of necessity, i.e. that the injured person is dead and is generally the principal witness and so is likely to know more or as much about the circumstances of his death than of any other person. So this doctrine does not apply when the object of the trial is to ascertain whether certain persons in the deaths or not a matter which has nothing to do with the declarant's death. See Rex v King Emperor 20 Ind C 1590-14 Cr L R 310.

Rule against opinion evidence—Application to dying declaration. Dying declarations are admissible only to the extent to which the deceased declarant would have been competent to testify if sworn in the case. He must therefore in general speak to facts only and not to mere matters of opinion and must be confined to what is relevant to the case. Taylor v 10th Ed 720 R v Sellers Cr R Supp 233 Law v 2092. But according to Prof Wigmore Opinion rule has no application to dying declaration. 'The theory of that rule says Prof Wigmore that whenever the witness can state specifically the detailed fact observed by him the inferences to be drawn from them can equally well be drawn by the jury, so that the witness' inferences become superfluous. Now since the declarant is here deceased it is no longer possible to obtain from him his questions any more detailed data than his statement may contain and hence his inferences are not in this instance superfluous but indispensable. Nevertheless most Courts accept the opinion rule as applicable. Moreover the rule is by some Courts applied here with more than the ordinary averality of result found in the use of the rule. Some of the rulings in their pedantic technicality are a scandal to any system of evidence supposed to be based on reason and common sense. Wigmore § 1447.

Testimonial qualification of the declarant. The declaration of the deceased is admissible only to the extent to which he would have been competent to testify if sworn in the case. Taylor v 10th Ed 720. In I v The State 10 C L R 1905 the dying declaration of a child of such tender years that she could not understand the doctrine of a future life was rejected. See also I v Drummond 11 C L R 438 R v Perlm 9 C L R 39. In America also the same rule is followed. In Donnelly v State 26 N J 1 620 Opden v and. Whatever would disqualify a witness would in such (dying) declarations incompetent testimony. Similarly in People v Sanchez 24 C L R 26 Sanderson v and. They stand upon the same footing as the testimony of a witness sworn in the case and are governed by the same rules except as to leading question. See also People v Glendon 10 Mich 434 People v State 97 Ind 22 State v Todd 15 Walsh 15. Any of the declarant would have disqualified to the stand by reason of infancy or insanity or interest in extrajudicial declarations must also be inadmissible. The declarant must have had actual observation or opportunity for observation of the fact which he relates. Wigmore § 1445. But these limitations according to Ju the Cunningham are not applicable under the present action. So according to him the question of competency of the person to bear testimony does not affect the admissibility of the statement. If it complies with the requirement of this section it is relevant though possibly, of small importance. Cunningham v 162. But in an English

S-32 case it was held that the gesticulations of a deaf mute at the place where a dead body was found during the police enquiry, and subsequently in Court, could not be used in evidence against an accused person, as he was not a competent witness under s 118 of the Evidence Act. Samadhin v King Emperor, 50 C 246

Testimonial Impeachment and Rehabilitation The dying declaration being in effect a testimonial statement made out of Court, the declarant is open to impeachment and discrediting in the same way as other witnesses, so far as such a process is feasible. Thus impeachment by bad testimonial character is allowable (Carrie v U 8 161 U S 694, Carrie v State, 191 Al 3, Lester v State 3 Fla 392) or by conduct showing a revengeful or irrelevant state of mind at the time or by conviction of crime, or by subsequent or prior inconsistent statements. Wigmore § 1446. In State v Thauley, 4 Harringt Del 362 general evidence of the declarant's intemperate habits and of his low state of health at the time was admitted & similarly evidence may be given that the deceased does not believe in future rewards and punishments. Carrie v U S, 164 U S 694. The declarant may also be corroborated by evidence of similar consistent statements, so far as this is allowable by the principles of that subject. Wigmore § 1446.

Form of dying declaration According to this section the declaration may be written or verbal. In a trial upon a charge of murder, it appeared that the deceased shortly before her death was questioned by various persons as to the circumstances in which the injuries had been inflicted on her that she was at that time unable to speak, but was conscious and able to make signs. Evidence was offered by the prosecution, and admitted by the Sessions Judge, to prove the questions put to the deceased, and the signs made by her in answer to such questions. Held by the Full Bench (Malimood J dissenting) that the questions and the signs taken together might properly be regarded as "verbal statements" made by a person as to the cause of her death within the meaning of s 32 of the Evidence Act and were therefore admissible in evidence under that section. Queen Empress v Abdulla, 7 A 385 (F B). Where a dying declaration is made by signs in response to questions put, it is admissible in evidence. In such cases, however, the statement should be a true record of what, in point of fact occurred, and should bear on its face the questions put and the nature of the gesticulation made in response. Bulla v Empress, 2 P R 1886 Cr. Where a person whose throat had been cut as a result of which death ensued later made certain gestures in reply to questions put by the police. Held the gestures were admissible in evidence. The interpretation of the gesture is for the Court alone and the opinion of witnesses as to their meaning is not evidence. Chandila v Ram Kahan, 1 Pat 401=3 Pat L T 71= (1922) P 535=71 Ind Crs 353. Where shortly after the deceased had received the injury a Magistrate proceeded to record her dying declaration in the hospital and although she could not speak in answer to questions put to her pointed out the accused as the assailant. Held that questions and answers taken together might properly be regarded as verbal statements made by a person as to the cause of her death within the meaning of section 32 of the Evidence Act and were therefore admissible. Emperor v Sadhu Churn 26 C W N 114=49 C 600=111=1922 Cal 409=77 Ind Crs 993. See also Ranga v Emperor, 84 Ind Ca 33=37 Lah 305. See also Green v E § 19 (h), Morab v Com, 28 Key 38=39 R v Lome, 10 Br C 1 3, 9 R v Steele 12 Cox Cr C 103. In the last mentioned case the deceased had told Dr Patchatt his story, then when dying and being asked what happened, he said, "Tell him, Patchatt and Dr Patchatt reported the story in declarant's presence. In admitting Dr Patchatt's statement I said, "It is equivalent to saying it himself. So it is clear that dying declarations may be communicated by any adequate method of communication whether by words or by signs or otherwise provided the indication is positive and definite and seems to proceed from an intelligence of its meaning. Wigmore § 1446.

A statement giving the substance of questions and answers is not admissible, the actual words of the deceased must be given and so must be put if any for answers even if taken word for word seem to me to be without the question and when a person is in such a condition the declaration arising from leading questions is enormously increased. Per Cur J 171 Ind Mitchell 17 Cox C C 503. Although a dying declaration if properly received

1 a valuable piece of evidence, but if while the statement is being recorded a third person is present and prompts the deceased to give out names of certain accused, it would be exceedingly unsafe to attach any weight to such a dying statement. Bishan Singh v Crown 8 L L I 296=96 Ind Cas 215=27 P L R 494=27 Cr L I 903=A I R 1926 Lah 496

Nature of the proceeding in which dying declaration is admissible A dying declaration as to the cause of death is admissible even when the charge is not one of homicide. Lalji v Emperor A I R 1928 Pat 162=67 Pat 747=106 Ind Cas 698 In delivering the judgment Mullick A C J said "The words of section 32 are very wide and it is not necessary that the charge should be one of homicide. The evidence as to the cause of death was relevant to the charge of robbery and consequently the cause of death that is to say the assault committed by the appellant came in question in the trial. Before the Indian Evidence Act was enacted it was held in Queen v Bissooanun Mookerjee, 6 W R Cr 75 that there was no necessity in India for following the very narrow rule of English law and that a dying declaration could be used as evidence in a charge of rape. One of the illustrations to section 32 of the present Indian Evidence Act expressly provides for such evidence where the charge is not culpable homicide but rape. A dying declaration can be used as evidence even though the accused is not charged with the offence of homicide. Dusadh v Emperor, 6 Pat 747=106 Ind Cas 698=29 C L J 106=A I R 1928 Pat 162

Proof of dying declaration A dying declaration may be either verbal or written. A verbal dying declaration recorded by a Magistrate cannot be accepted in evidence, when it has not been proved by taking the statement of the Magistrate. Shah v Crown, 17 P R 1911 C 1=289 P L R 1912=14 C L J 131=18 Ind Cas 883 When what purports to be the dying declaration of a deceased person is not taken down by the committing Magistrate it cannot be admitted in evidence without proof of solemn affirmation that the deceased person actually made such a declaration. Crown v Harder, 11 S C 29 Oudh, see also R v Fata Lalji, 11 B H C 247 Where the dying declaration of a deceased person taken down in writing by a head constable is admissible in evidence under s 162 Cr P C Code, the proper course is to put in the document itself and have it formally proved by that officer and not to allow him to give evidence orally as to its purport. Empress v Thalwara, 7 C P L R Cr 14 So a dying declaration recorded by a head constable, who certified in Court that he had reported it correctly is admissible in evidence in proof of its own contents and it is unnecessary that the person who recorded it should repeat exactly what was said. Jyotap Singh v Emperor, 7 Lah 91=92 Ind Cas 167=27 Cr L J 215=A I R 1926 Lah 310 Emperor v Balaram Das 49 C 358=A I R 1922 Cal 382

When a declaration is in writing the question may arise whether it is his narration at all. If the declarant has written it, or signed or otherwise approved it after reading it, or hearing it read aloud to him, it may be offered as his declaration. Otherwise it is not his declaration but merely the written statement of the person taking the declaration. Higmore § 1445 The dying statement of a deceased person must be taken in the presence of the accused, if not so taken, the writing cannot be admitted to prove the statement made. The statement may be proved in the ordinary way by a person who heard it, and the writing may be used for the purpose of refreshing the witness's memory. Empress v Sampruddin, 8 C 211 Sarat Chandra v Emperor, 52 O 446=88 Ind Cas 890=26 Cr L J 1244=A I R 1925 Cal 821 A declaration made by a person in expectation of death recorded in the absence of the accused and in a language different from the one in which it is made by an officer who is not examined in the case cannot properly be used in evidence against the accused and at any rate, such a declaration should not be relied upon in convicting the accused. Aeng Emperor v Mathura, 6 C W N 72 In the same case Lalji, I observed "With regard to the so-called dying declaration the witnesses should not have been allowed to prove the document as if it was a substantial piece of evidence in the case. The relevant fact to be proved was the statement made by the deceased person admissible under section 32 of the Evidence Act. That statement is not; the document made by the Magistrate but by the verbal statement made by the deceased person.

The document made by the Magistrate does not amount to a deposition or evidence. It was not taken in the presence of the accused, nor was it taken in their absence under the provisions and conditions prescribed by section 32 of the Cr Pro Code. The only way of proving the statement was therefore by the evidence of some witnesses who heard it made, the said witness being allowed to refresh his memory by referring to the note made by him or read over by him at or about the time the statement was made. I would lay stress upon this because in many cases irregularities of this nature have led to a miscarriage of justice or to great delay in the trial of cases. I may note that the record before the Magistrate is in English. It clearly does not contain the exact words used by the accused which alone would detract considerably from its value as a record of the statement made. But as it is most probable that the statement was not a continuous statement by the dying person but was elicited in answer to one or more questions the document to be really of use should have clearly set out the exact questions put and the answers made to them. See Kunz Lal v Emperor 67 Ind Cas 577=23 Cr L J 417=4 U P L R (L) 61. Gouridas v Namasudra 2 Ind Cas 841=36 C 659=13 C W N 680=10 Cr L J 186. A dying declaration was recorded in the presence of a witness and given over to the deceased in the presence of the witness and admitted by the deceased to be correct. If the witness, who heard that statement swears that the witness statement correctly reproduces the words used by the deceased that is sufficient to prove that the deceased did use the words contained in that statement. Emperor v Balaram, 49 C 358=(1922) A I R 382. A dying declaration recorded, in the absence of the accused, by a Magistrate, who held the enquiry preliminary to commitment to the Court of Sessions is not admissible in evidence unless and until it has been proved by the Magistrate, who recorded it, that the order sheet that the document was admitted without any objection on the part of the accused does not make any difference. Panchu Das v Emperor 34 C 66=11 C W N 666=5 Cr L J 427 see also Zaidad v Empress 29 P R 188. The written record of a dying declaration is not admissible in evidence, but if it was recorded in the absence of the accused person. The proper method of proving the statement of a dying man was by the oral evidence of any person who heard that person being allowed to refresh his memory by reference to the statement made or read at the time. Bagan v Emperor 10 N L J 19=1 Cr L J 243=23 Ind Cas 195, see also Queen Empress v Shethya 2 Bom L R 1911. It is of the utmost importance that evidence as to the dying declaration should be as exact and as full as possible. When what is sought to be proved is a verbal statement of a dying person, the proper and legal mode of proving it is by eliciting from the person who heard the deceased make the statement the words the deceased said. If the statement was taken down in writing by the witness or by some one in the presence of the witness, the witness would be allowed to refresh his memory, if he so wanted, by referring to such writing, otherwise the writing itself is not relevant unless it is in the nature of a deposition taken in the presence of the accused. Where the deceased dictated his statement in writing and he then signed the statement after being satisfied of its accuracy such writing may be regarded as a statement of the deceased and is writing admissible under s 32 of the Evidence Act. But even if what was taken down by some one in writing and signed by the deceased is not a statement of the witness who heard the statement from proving it is by the evidence of the witness. And ordinarily it would be desirable to have on record in addition to the writing in which the statement was taken down. Pratap Singh v Emperor 11 M L T 214=1912 M W N 40=22 M L J 41=1 Cr L J 468=15 Ind Cas 308. It is of the utmost importance that evidence as to a dying declaration should be as exact and full as possible. Rule of Preferring Written Testimony "The principles which determine whether a written report of another person's statement is to be preferred to oral testimony and must therefore be produced, have already been examined in their general applications. It is, however, more convenient to consider here their application to dying declarations. (a) Where an auditor of a dying declaration makes in written form a note or report of the oral utterances, this written statement of the auditor is not preferred evidence and need not be produced, for there is not and never was any principle of evidence preferring a person's written memorandum of testimony to his or another's oral or recollection testimony. Nor is the case different when the person thus making the written report was a Magistrate having power to administer oaths or take testimony on a preliminary examination for such a person has no duty or authority by law to report dying declarations, and it would be solely by virtue of an express duty that a Magistrate's report could be preferred to other witnesses. (b) When a written memorandum or report thus made is read over to the declarant and signed or assented to by him the writing thus becomes a second distinct declaration by him. The first oral statement is not merged in the latter written one because, since the transaction is not a contract or other legal act between two parties thereto, the rule of Integration or Parol Evidence rule has no application. The first oral declaration is therefore provable without producing the latter written one. Nevertheless, the majority of Courts, neglecting the superficial analogy of the Parol Evidence rule or of Depositions, require the writing to be used excluding testimony to the oral statement (R v Gay 7 C & P 230, Per Coleridge J). It may be noted that of course so far as the proponent is offering to prove the terms of the writing, not of the oral utterance, the writing must be produced. (c) Where the declarant makes one oral statement and afterwards at another time a second statement, the latter being in writing or reduced to writing there are here two distinct statements and either one may be offered without testifying to the other, for the principle of completeness requires only that the whole of a single utterance should be offered together and in the present instance the declarant, though referring to the same occurrence is nevertheless making distinct statements each of which is independently admissible. It is thus clear (1) that separate oral utterances are admissible even though the written one has been proved. (2) that even before or without proving the written one, the separate oral ones are admissible—though on the latter point the Courts are not always explicit. Hignmore § 1450, see also J v Leason and Transfer 16 How St Tr 73. Rule of Preferring Written Testimony "The principles which determine whether a written report of another person's statement is to be preferred to oral testimony and must therefore be produced, have already been examined in their general applications. It is, however, more convenient to consider here their application to dying declarations. (1) Where an auditor of a dying declaration makes in written form a note or report of the oral utterances, this written statement of the auditor is not preferred evidence and need not be produced, for there is not and never was any principle of evidence preferring a person's written memorandum of testimony to his or another's oral or recollection testimony. Nor is the case different when the person thus making the written report was a Magistrate having power to administer oaths or take testimony on a preliminary examination for such a person has no duty or authority by law to report dying declarations, and it would be solely by virtue of an express duty that a Magistrate's report could be preferred to other witnesses. (b) When a written memorandum or report thus made is read over to the declarant and signed or assented to by him the writing thus becomes a second distinct declaration by him. The first oral statement is not merged in the latter written one, because, since the transaction is not a contract or other legal act between two parties thereto the rule of Inter-ration, or Parol Evidence rule has no application. The first oral declaration is therefore provable without producing the latter written one. Nevertheless, the majority of Courts, accepting the superficial analogy of the Parol Evidence rule or of Deposition, require the writing to be used, excluding testimony to the oral statement (R v Gay 7 C & P 230, Per Coleridge J). It may be noted that of course so far as the proponent is offering to prove the terms of the writing, not of the oral utterance, the writing must be produced. (c) Where the declarant makes one oral statement, and afterwards at another time a second statement, the latter being in writing or reduced to writing there are here two distinct statements and either one may be offered without testifying to the other for the principle of completeness requires only that the whole of a single utterance should be offered together, and in the present instance the declarant, though referring to the same occurrence is nevertheless making distinct statements each of which is independently admissible. It is thus clear (1) that separate oral utterances are admissible, even though the written one has been proved (2) that, even before or without proving the written one, the separate oral ones are admissible,—though on the latter point the Courts are not always explicit. Higmore § 1450, see also R v Heason and Transfer, 16 How St Tr 33. In that case Pratt L C J said 'You know in the Court of Chancery, when the party is examined on his oath, he gives in a first answer and on exceptions taken to it he gives in a second and so on third, all these are deceased was in such a state as to render the evidence clearly admissible. It appears from the evidence that the deceased said he thought he should not recover as he was very ill. Now people often make use of expressions of that kind who have no conviction that their death is near approaching. If the deceased in this case had felt that his end was drawing very near, and that he had no hope of recovery, I should expect him to be saying something of his affairs and of who was to have his property, or giving some directions as to his funeral, or as to where he would be buried, or that he would have used expressions to his widow purporting that they were soon to be separated by death, or that he would have taken leave of his friends or relations in a way that showed he was convinced that his death was at hand. As nothing of this sort appears I think there is no sufficient proof that he was without any hope of recovery and that I therefore ought to reject the evidence. But even in cases where all the guarantees of the trustworthiness of dying declarations are present, we must receive it with certain degree of caution. It may be seldom that a dying declaration is made wilfully false but there are many circumstances in the situation of a wounded man which may introduce fallaciousness into his statement. Thus the effects of the wound itself may diminish memory, or weaken or confuse his intellectual powers. The very suddenness of the attack may have rendered him unfit in his identification of his assailant, the darkness, the disguise may tend to the same result. Nort Es 176

"So dying declarations have not the same weight as if they were made by the declarant as a witness in Court subject to cross examination before a jury having the opportunity to observe his demeanour, the accused is deprived of the opportunity of calling the attention of the declarant to certain fact which if brought to his attention might cause him to modify his statements or make none at all and there is no opportunity to test the declarant's judgment the strength of his recollection or his bias. Unquestionably every discount should be made from the full value of the declarations which it might be supposed that a competent cross examination would necessitate. Testimony as to dying declarations is generally given by relatives and friends of the deceased who had watched by his bed side and bias in his favour is to be expected. And even if given by police officer it should be carefully scanned. The declarations are liable to be misunderstood and to be reported by an unfaithful memory especially if much time has elapsed since they were made and the evidence goes to the jury with surroundings tending to produce upon the mind emotions of deep sympathy for the decedent and of involuntary sentiment against the accused. There is considerable danger that juries will be too credulous of the entire integrity of the evidence. The physical condition of the declarant is apt to make his own recollection imperfect or for the sake of ease and to bind of the importunity and annoyance of those around him he may say what ever they choose to suggest. So too as respects the declarant's statements it is to be remarked that many persons even in serious conversation, assert as facts those things of which they have only strong convictions and not knowledge derived from senses. If the declarant related his opportunities for observing the facts stated and they appear to be ample this would add to the weight of the declaration, and so if he repeated his statements rationally and uniformly until he was incapable of speech. Moore's Weight and Value of Evidence § 1180 see also Taylor § 722. After a dying declaration or any other evidence has been admitted the weight to be given to it is a matter exclusively for the jury. They believe it or may not believe it but so far as they do or do not, their judgment is not controlled by rules of law. Therefore, though they themselves do not suppose the declarant to have been conscious of death, they may still believe the statement conversely, though they do suppose him to have been thus conscious, they may still not believe the statement to be true. In other words their canons of ultimate belief are not necessarily the same as the preliminary legal conditions of admissibility whose purpose is an entirely different one. Wagmore § 1451

Value of dying declarations in India. As regards the value of dying declarations in India the following observation of Mukerji J in Emperor v Parmawanda, 29 C W N 738=52 C 987=88 Ind Ca 1000=42 C L J 247 is very important "In the case of a dying declaration which by the law of this country assumes a character very widely different from what it is under the English Law which is relevant under the Evidence Act whether the person who made it was or was not at the time when it was made under expectation of death, and the weight to be attached to which depends not upon the expectation of death which is a guarantee of its truth but upon the circumstances and surroundings under which it was made and very much upon the nature of the record that has been made of it, it becomes almost always a question of fact as to whether it should be relied upon or not. So statements made by a dying man relating to the cause of his death are inadmissible in evidence against person causing his death, but too much reliance cannot be placed upon the details of such statements as they are hearsay." Emperor v. Sukhu Beua 76 Ind Ca 339. It is not safe to base a conviction on the uncorroborated dying declaration of a deceased person, for it is well known that the inhabitants of the Punjab will often in a dying declaration not only incense the actual offenders but will also include the names of other enemies. Bakhshish Singh v. Emperor 86 Ind Ca 826 = A I R 1925 Lah 549. See also Stephen's History of Law. When the accused is already named and the fact is known to the declarant the value of his dying declaration is very little. Muoffer v. Emperor 99 Ind Ca 322. "Dying declarations in India are not to be regarded as if they were made in England. Very often the murdered man himself before his death implicates every male member of his supposed murderer's family or of the supposed instigator of the murder, hoping by this means to drink the cup of revenge to its last dreg and to rid his own family of all future annoyance." See a paper by Mr Rattigan, Lau Magazine May 1885 p 249. Cases are not uncommon in this country of false deposition being made by a dying man. In Mudappa Kone 5 M L F 217 = 4 Ind Ca 1127 = 11 Cr L J 193. A trustworthy dying declaration alone made by a deceased person in full possession of the faculties and proved by the clearest and most reliable evidence to be the exact words of the person making it and corroborated by the surrounding circumstances, is sufficient to support a conviction for murder under s 302 I P Code. Karim Khan v. Crown 4 P W R 1909 Cr = 9 Cr L J 156 = 1 Ind Ca 191. But a Court should receive a dying declaration with caution. The details of the violence referred to by the deceased might have occurred under circumstances of confusion and surprise tending to prevent their being correctly observed. The deceased might have stated his inferences from events regarding which he might have arrived at the wrong conclusion. Before the dying declaration is received in evidence any enmity between the accused and the deceased should also be taken into consideration. Sheru v. Crown, 117 P R 1866, Sheriff v. Crown P R 1868 C1. When a dying man after receiving extreme unction makes a declaration, it should generally be believed to be true and acted upon. Patil v. Emperor (1911) 2 M W N 183 = 12 Ind Ca 296 = 12 Cr L J 523. Though dying declarations are in some respects deserving of a great degree of consideration and of credence which ordinary statements are not, they are not subject to the test of cross-examination, and if not substantially borne out by independent evidence and the probabilities of the case, or admitted facts, are worth little or nothing. In re Dabulota, 2 Weir 753. Much weight must be given to the dying declaration recorded by the Magistrate when it is supported by the consistent evidence given on behalf of the prosecution. Saujan Singh v. Emperor, 10 Lah L J 231. It is doubtful whether a dying declaration which contradicts itself in its various parts is even admissible in evidence. But supposing for the sake of argument that it is admissible in evidence, the evidentiary value of such a declaration is for all practical purposes negligible. Inayat Ali v. Emperor 108 Ind Ca 526 = 9 Cr L J 118 = 10 A I Cr R 68. Although the statement made by the deceased just before his death is admissible in evidence as dying declaration, in order to convict the accused of murder there must be independent corroborative facts and circumstances to prove that offence. Billa Singh v. Emperor A I F 1929 Pat 249.

Dying declarations in the form of questions and answers "Where a statement is not the ipsa verba of the person making it but is composed of a mixture of questions and answers there are several objections open to its reception in evidence, which it is desirable should not be open in cases in which the person has no opportunity of cross-examination. In the first place the questions may be leading questions and in the condition of a person making a dying declaration there is always very great danger of leading questions being answered without their force and effect being fully comprehended. In such circumstances the form of the declaration should be such that it would be possible to see what was the question and what was the answer so far as to discover how much was suggested by the examining Magistrate and how much was the production of the person making it. Per case in R v Mitchell 17 Cox C C 503, see also Imperor v Parmananda Datta 29 C W N 738=88 Ind C 15 1000=42 C I J 247=26 Cr L J 1236=52 C 987=A I R 1925 Cal 876. There is no general rule here against leading questions. R v Lagnet 7 C & P 238. It is not necessary that the examination of the deceased should be conducted after the manner of interrogating a witness in the case, though any departure from the mode may affect the value and credibility of the declarations. Therefore it is no objection to their admissibility that they were made in answer to leading questions or obtained by pressing and earnest solicitation. Russ C 2092. R v Isaacson 184 499, R v Woodcock 2 Leach 51, R v Welbourn 1 East P C 338. R v Smith, L & C 607, R v Steele 12 Cox 163. R v Whitmarsh, 62 J P 680, 711.

Statement must be taken as a whole. But whatever the statement may be it must be complete in itself, for if the declarations appear to have been intended by the dying man to be connected with and qualified by other statements, which he is prevented by any cause from making they will not be received. Russ C 2092. The statement as offered must not be merely a part of the whole as it was expressed by the declarant, it must be complete as far as it goes. But it is immaterial how much of the whole affair of the death is related, provided the statement includes all that the declarant wished or intended to include in it. Thus if in interruption (by death or by an intruder) one short statement which thus remains clearly less than that which the dying person wished to make the fragmentary statement is not receivable because the intended whole is not there, and the whole might be of a very different effect from that of the fragment, yet if the dying person finishes the statement he wishes to make it is no objection that he has told only a portion of what he might have been able to tell. Hignore § 1448. As regards a dying declaration, to accept a portion and reject the rest entirely out of the question, there must be absolute guarantee of the accuracy of the record and the truth of the entire statement before it can be acted upon. Imperor v Premananda, 29 C W N 738=42 C L J 247=88 Ind C 15 1000=26 Cr L J 1236=52 C 987. Dying declarations are admissible not only against the prisoner, but also in his favour. R v Seafie, 1 M & Rob 351. "The ground upon which dying declarations are admissible being that they are tantamount to statements made upon oath in the presence of the prisoner, and such statements being clearly admissible if in favour of the prisoner there seems no reason to doubt the propriety of admitting a dying declaration which is in favour of the prisoner. Indeed, almost every case of man slaughter in which such declarations have been admitted is an authority to that effect, as the prima facie presumption is that the prisoner has murdered the deceased. And, moreover, a declaration in favour of a prisoner must ever be taken to be more likely to be true as it is not probable that a person should make a statement favourable to the person who has inflicted a mortal injury upon him but rather the contrary." C & G, Russ C 2092. Prof Hignore says: "Owing to the present peculiar limitation of this evidence to public prosecutions for homicide, and the tenor of the declarations usually made by the dying person it has sometimes been argued that the declarations cannot be used by the accused. But the argument has no foundation whatever, and has been generally repudiated. Hignore Lr § 1442 see also Mattox v U S, 146 U S 151. Moore v State, 12 Ala 767. People v Southern 120 Cal 645, Com v Bednorck, 264 Pa 124.

CLAUSE II

Scope of the Clause According to English law when a person in the regular course of his duty or office performs some business transaction and makes forthwith a return or record of it which he has no interest to falsify, such return or record is after his death evidence against all persons of the performance of the transaction and is known as a declaration in the course of duty. Price v Torington 1 Sm L C, Polin v Gray 12 Ch D 411, Sturle v Freeman, 3 App Cas 623 640. The guarantee of its credibility consists in the obligation to discharge the duty faithfully, and the accuracy which is generally produced by business routine. Hills Etc 2nd Ed p 178. There are three principal restrictions upon the admissibility of its evidence in English law, namely (i) that it should be by a person having personal knowledge, (ii) that it should be contemporaneous, (iii) that it should not be an entry of any collateral fact over and above what it was the strict duty of the person entering it to record. These restrictions have been advisedly omitted by the Legislature so that Courts will be committing an illegality if they exclude any evidence which falls within the terms of the present section. Cunningham Etc 163. The statements may be verbal or written. Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Cl & F 113, Stipulation v 71ough 2 D & B 933, R v Bulley 13 Cox 293. The effect of the statement as to weight may be very different in the two cases, but both are equally receivable and relevant. The words "and in particular, in this section seem to point to the superior force of written over verbal statements. Illustrations (b), (c), (d), (e), and (f).

(b) refer to this clause. Vort F 177, see also illustration (b) and (c) of S 32 section 21

Section 32 provides that written or verbal statements made by a person who is dead or cannot be found are relevant facts in certain cases. Rama Saami v. Rama Nandan, 22 Ind Cas 627=(1911) M W N 240=1 L W 136. The phrase "in the ordinary course of business" in this section is used to indicate the current routine of business which was usually followed by a person whose declaration it is sought to introduce. Ibtulla v. Ma D Kuz, 11 Ind Cas 974=1 Bur L J 195. A statement of a relevant fact which is inadmissible under s 32, will not be admissible under s 11. Bala Ram v. Mahabu 34 A 341.

Principle. As has already been stated in connection with clause (a) such evidence is admissible on two distinct principles, namely (1) the Necessity principle, and (2) the principle of Circumstantial Guarantee of Trustworthiness.

Necessity principle. On the principle of Necessity this exception sanctions the use of statements by persons whose testimony though not necessarily the sole evidence available on the subject is yet the only testimony now available for that purpose. Hence the usual rule applies that the person must be unavailable as a witness. Higmore § 1521. In Lefebvre v. Norden, 2 Ves Sr 511 Lord Hardwicke LC said: "On proof that the defendant was dead, such evidence has been read," by reason of the difficulty of making of proof in cases of this kind the Court has gone so far." In Welsh v. Battell 15 Mass 380, Parker CJ said: "The question was thought to fall within the general rule which requires the best evidence the nature of the case admits of." It is analogous to the exceptions to other general rules of evidence. Similarly in Archolls v. Hebb, 8 Wheat 326 Story J said: "If a party is dead we cannot have his personal examination upon oath and the question then arises whether there shall be a total failure of justice or secondary evidence shall be admitted to prove facts where ordinary prudence cannot guard us against the effects of human mortality. It is of course at least necessary that the witness should be some how unavailable. Where the absence of the desired witness is not somehow accounted for the entries cannot be used." Higmore § 1521 see also Bond v. Reilly 63 U S App 157, Stoll v. Scott 292 Ida 117. The death of one member of a firm does not admit the books of the firm. Jure Fontaine Jure Doulay, (1909) 2 Ch 382 (390). Of the various facts sufficiently excusing from production, death, as in other hearsay exceptions is a common and commonly conceded in fact. Insanity should be equally sufficient. Budgen v. Rorhury 51 Con 217, Union Bank v. Knapp 3 Pick 109. Illness effectively preventing the attendance of the witness should suffice. Taylor v. R Co, 80 Ia 435. Such statement of a witness who is absent from the jurisdiction of the Court and whose attendance cannot be procured without an amount of delay or expense which under the circumstances of the case, appears to the Court unreasonable can also be admitted. North Bank v. Abbott 13 Pick Mass 171, where Shaw CJ said: "It was satisfactorily proved not merely that the witness was out of the jurisdiction of the Court, but that it had become impossible to procure his testimony. We cannot distinguish this principle from the case of death or alienation of mind. The ground is impossibility of obtaining the testimony, and the cause of such impossibility seems immaterial. In a case in which the mere fact that a witness happens to live at Rangoon is not a ground for holding that his evidence cannot be procured without unreasonable delay and expense." Kadappa v. Thirupathi 21 L W 210=85 Ind Cas 576=11 R Mal (1923) 411 see also R v. Porter 19 Cox Cr 360.

Circumstantial Guarantee of Trustworthiness. The reasons justifying the admission of this class of statements, untested as they are by cross-examination have not been clearly defined by the Judges as in other hearsay exceptions but they seem fairly clear. The situation is one where even though a desire to state the truth may actually have subsisted more powerful motives to accuracy, over-power and supplant it. In the typical case of entries made systematically and habitually for the recording of a course of business dealing, experience of human nature indicates three distinct though related motives which operate to secure in Section 32 provides that written or verbal statements made by a person who is dead or cannot be found are relevant facts in certain cases. Rama Sanni v Rama Nandan, 22 Ind Cas 627=(1914) M W N 210=1 L W 156. The phrase "in the ordinary course of business" in this section is used to indicate the current routine of business which was usually followed by a person whose declaration it is sought to introduce. Abdulla v Ma F Kut, 11 Ind Cas 874=4 Bur L J 195. A statement of a relevant fact which is inadmissible under s 32, will not be admissible under s 11. Bela Ram v Mahabir 31 A 311.

Principle. As has already been stated in connection with clause (a) such evidence is admissible on two distinct principles, namely (1) the Necessity principle, and (2) the principle of Circumstantial Guarantee of Trustworthiness.

Necessity principle. On the principle of Necessity this exception sanctions the use of statements by persons whose testimony, though not necessarily the sole evidence available on the subject, is yet the only testimony now available for that purpose. Hence the usual rule applies that the person must be unavailable while as a witness. Hignore § 1521. In Lefebvre v Warden 2 Ves Sr 511, Lord Mansfield C said: "On proof that the defendant was dead, such entry has been read, by reason of the difficulty of oral tag of proof in cases of this kind the Court has gone so far. In Welsh v Brett 15 M & S 380 Parker C J said: "The question was thought to fall within the general rule which requires the best evidence the nature of the case admit of. It is analogous to the exceptions to other general rules of evidence. Similarly in Nicholl v Helli, 8 Wheat 326, Story J said: "If a party is dead we cannot have his personal examination upon oath and the question then arises whether there shall be a total failure of justice or secondary evidence shall be admitted to prove facts where ordinary evidence cannot guard us against the effects of human mortality. It is of course at least necessary that the witness should be somehow unavailable. Where the absence of the desired witness is not somehow accounted for the entries cannot be used. Hignore § 1521, see also Burd v Reilly 131 S App 17, Stoll v Scott 282 Ida 117. The death of one member of a firm does not admit the books of the firm. In re Fountaine Iron Doular (1909) 2 Ch 382 (390). Of the various facts sufficiently excusing from production death is in other Hearsay exceptions is a common and commonly conceded instance. In many would be equally sufficient. Budgeater v Porbury 51 Con 217, Union Bank v Knapp, 3 Pick 109. Illness effectively preventing the attendance of the witness should suffice. Taylor v R Co, 80 Ia 175. Such statement of a witness who is absent from the jurisdiction of the Court and whose attendance cannot be procured without an amount of delay or expense which, under the circumstances of the case, appears to the Court unreasonable can also be admitted. North Bank v Abbott, 13 Pick Mass 171, where Shaw C J said: "It was satisfactorily proved not merely that the witness was out of the jurisdiction of the Court but that it had become impossible to procure his testimony. We cannot diminish this in principle from the case of death or alienation of mind. The ground is impossibility of obtaining the testimony and the cause of such impossibility seems immaterial. In Reid v Madras the mere fact that a witness happens to live at Rangoon is not a ground for holding that his evidence cannot be procured without unreasonable delay and expense. Halley v Thorp 21 L W 210=8, Ind Cas 776 = A I R Mad (1923) 111 see also, I v Dexter 19 Cox Cr 360.

Circumstantial Guarantee of Trustworthiness. The reasons justifying the admission of these statements are untested as they are by cross-examination have not been clearly defined by the Judges as in other Hearsay exceptions but they seem fairly clear. The situation is one where even though a desire to state falsely may actually have subsisted more powerful motive to accuracy over power and supplant it. In the typical case of entries made systematically and habitually for the recording of a course of business dealings experience of human nature indicates three distinct though related motives which operate to secure in

§. 32. the long run a sufficient degree of probable trustworthiness and make the statements fairly trustworthy

(1) The habit and system of making such a record with regularity and accuracy through the interest and purpose of the entrant, and the influence of habit may be relied on, by very inertia to prevent casual inaccuracies and to counteract the possible temptation to misstatements. In Poole v Ducas 1 Bing N C 849, Tindal C J said "It is easier to state what is true than what is false the process of invention implies trouble, in such a case unnecessarily incurred"

(2) Since the entries record a regular course of business transactions an error or misstatement is almost certain to be detected and the result disputed by those dealing with the entrant, misstatements cannot safely be made, if at all except by a systematic and comprehensive plan of falsification. As a rule, the fact (if no motive of honesty obtained) would deter all but the most daring and unscrupulous from attempting the task, the ordinary man may be averted by the decline to undertake it. In the long run this operates with full effect to secure accuracy

(3) If, in addition to this the entrant makes the record under a duty to an employer or other superior, there is the additional risk of censure and disgrace from the superior, in case of inaccuracies—a motive on the whole the most powerful and most palpable of the three. In Poole v Ducas 1 Bing N C 849 Tindal C J said "The clerk had no interest to make a false entry, if he had any interest it was rather to make a true entry, a false entry would be likely to bring him into disgrace with his employer. Again the book in which the entry was made was open to all the clerks in the office so that an entry if false would be exposed to speedy discovery. Wigmore § 1522, see also Taylor Et § 67 The Wills Et 2nd Ed p 181, Phlipson Et 3rd Ed 271. Justice Taylor says "The considerations which have induced the Courts to recognise this exception appear to be principally these—that, in the absence of all suspicion of sinister motives a fair presumption arises that entries made in the ordinary routine of business are correct, since, the process of invention implying trouble it is easier to enter what is true than what is false, that such entries usually form a link in the chain of circumstances which mutually corroborate each other, that false entries would be likely to bring the clerks into disgrace with their employers, that a most entry made in the course of business are subject to the inspection of several persons and an error would be exposed to speedy discovery; and that as the facts to which they relate are generally known but to a few persons, a relaxation of the strictness of evidence in favour of such entries may often prove convenient if not necessary, for the due investigation of truth." Taylor Et § 697

"Section 32 imposes restrictions upon the admissibility of statements made by persons who cannot be brought before the Court to give their own evidence. The subject of those restrictions and the reason for them are plain. The basic principle of legal evidence being that the Court must always have the best evidence that where persons can be they must be brought before the Court to tell what they know at first hand. Then veracity can then be best tested by the direct cross examination. Where however witnesses cannot be brought before the Court, then previous statements may not be indirect evidence, of a kind that the Court would not, except under necessity, receive at all. The conclusion was when compelled by necessity to make this evidence or none are imposed upon the admissibility plainly run at affording some guarantee of its truth. As there is to be no chance of testing a man by cross examination his statement will not be admitted unless it has been made under conditions which looking to the ordinary course of human affairs raise pretty strong presumptions that it was a true statement. Thus the whole scope and object of section 32 centre upon securing the highest degree of truth possible in the circumstances for the first time."

Statement made in ordinary course of business. This clause provides that a written statement of a relevant fact made by a person who is in the ordinary course of business, when the statement was made by such person in the ordinary course of business. The applicability of this clause entirely depends on the exact meaning of the words "course of business". The expression has more than one place in the Evidence Act. Thus in section 18 it refers to the question whether a particular act was done, the existence of any course of business, according to which it naturally would have been done is a relevant fact. Illustration (a) to that section is evidently the case of Hetherington v Kemp 4 Camp 193. The course of business there put forward was a certain usage in the plaintiff's counting house. It was not a usage in a private house which however methodical, cannot carry the same weight as the ordinary routine of an office. So too, by section 114 the Court may presume the existence of any fact, which it thinks likely to have happened, regard being had to the common course of natural events, human conduct, and public and private business in their relation to the facts of the particular case. What is meant by 'the common course of public and private business'? Illustration (f), with its explanation refers to the public business of the Post Office. Private business would apparently apply to such a case as that alluded to above (Hetherington v Kemp). If the expression was meant to include the dealings of a private individual apart from his avocation or business, different language would have been used. The explanation to illustration (c) of the same section (114) speaks of a man of business' which in its well known popular sense must mean a man habitually engaged in mercantile transaction or trade. Again in the explanation to section 47 it is said that a person is said to be acquainted with the hand writing of another person when in the ordinary course of business documents purporting to be written by that person have been habitually submitted to him. Here, too the expression must mean in the ordinary course of a professional avocation. The illustration is that of a broker to whom letters are shown for the purpose of advice.

Again by section 34, entries in books of account regularly kept in the course of business are relevant. In Alacheshau Berony v The New Dhurumsey Spinning and Weaving Company 1 L R 4 B 576 at p 353 (not approved by the Privy Council in Deputy Commissioner, Bira Bank v Ram Pirshad 27 C 118-4 C W N 147 P C) West J referred to a private account book tendered in evidence, which had been entered up casually once a week or fortnight, with none of the claims to confidence that attach to books entered up from day to day or (as in banks) from hour to hour as transactions take place. 'These only' (he said) 'are I think regularly kept in the course of business'.

Having regard then to the above considerations there can I think, be no doubt that the expression in the ordinary course of business in section 32 (2) must be read in the same sense. It may in one sense be true that it is, in the ordinary course of business, for a mortgaged deed to contain recitals of the boundaries of the land mortgaged. But that would not make the recitals evidence. The question is whether the mortgage deed itself is a statement made in the ordinary course of business. Looking at the particulars set out in clause (2) of section 32 the nature of the statements 'made in the course of business,' and looking at the sense in which the expression is apparently used in other sections of the Evidence Act it can not be said that a mortgaged deed executed by an agriculturist falls within that term. It is not the profession, trade, or business (to borrow the words used in section 27 of the Contract Act) of an agriculturist to execute mortgage deeds. Per Candy J in Ningaua v Bhorrappa 23 B. 65 at pp 65-67. In the same case Fullon J at p 70 observed 'It can hardly be said that the execution of a mortgage deed is an act done in the ordinary course of business.' Doubtless when a person has determined to mortgage his land, the insertion of the boundary is made in the ordinary course of business in the course of the transaction, but I think that in using the phrase 'in the ordinary course of business' the legislature probably intended to refer to statements similar to those admitted in England as coming under the same description. The subject is dealt with in chapter XII of Mr Pitt Rivers' Treatise on the Law of Evidence and the cases which he has collected show that this exception to the general rule against hearsay extends only to statements made during the course, not of any particular transaction of an extrajudicial kind such as the execution of a deed of mortgage, but of business of a general kind, such as which the declarant was ordinarily or habitually engaged in, (see also Singh v Jeonandan 13 C W N 71). The fact was apparently one of the current routine of business, and was followed by whom whose declaration is sought to be proved.

evidence that there was any such current routine of business but actually no evidence that the practice had ever been adopted in any other occasion much less that it was habitually adopted on all occasions. Held that a statement made by a person, since deceased, to his wife that the defendants had asked him to lend them money and that he had lent them money on a demand note was inadmissible. Abdulla v. Ma E. Kim, 4 Bur L R 185 = 11 Ind C 854. The business referred to may be of a temporary character. Sheonandan v. Jeonandan 13 C W N 71.

Under the English law also the requirement is that the entry must have been made in the regular course of business. Wignore § 1523. In Doe v. Tinsford 3 B & Ad 890 Parle J and Tauntton J used the term 'in the ordinary course of business' while in Pook v. Dumas, 1 Bing N C 619, Findil C J used the expression 'made in the usual course and routine of business.' In Ravens v. The Refrains 28 Beav 473 Romilly M R in admitting a solicitor's book as evidence in the exercise of his business and duty and in the regular course of business. See also Nicholls v. Webb, 8 Wheat 326, Halls v. Howard 7 Mete Mas 481 State v. Phau, 49 Vt 378 Don v. Sayer, 29 Me 119. So also in America and England the entry must have been made in the way of business. 'This may be defined' says Prof. Wignore 'to mean a course of transaction performed in one's habitual relations with others and as a natural part of one's mode of obtaining a livelihood. It would probably exclude for instance, a diary of doings kept merely for one's personal satisfaction but it would not exclude any regular record that was helpful though not essential nor usual in the same occupation is followed by others. There is, therefore, no special limitation as to the nature of the occupations.' Wignore § 1523.

In Champneys v. Peal, 1 Stark 326, a memorandum of delivery of copy of bill by a clerk who usually made such a memorandum upon the copy kept was admitted. Similarly in R v. Cope, 7 C & P 726, an endorsement of every order in a order of the aldermen, the writer's duty being to send orders and endorse them when served was also admitted. So also an endorsement on the cover of a registered letter that the cover had been tendered to the addressee on a certain day and had been refused by him, is at least a record of a statement by the person and would be admissible either under section 32 (2) or section 33 of the Evidence Act if the requirements of those sections are fulfilled. Gobinda v. Duran 20 C L J 45. Where account books are admitted in evidence before the Commissioner under section 32 of the Evidence Act is having been kept in the ordinary course of business by persons deceased it is in the discretion of the Court to hold that they are sufficient evidence of the transaction to which the entries of the book relate without further proof. Dayi Ataji v. Govind 10 Bom L R 511. The Post mortem report of a Civil Surgeon who unfortunately died before his examination by the trial Court is admissible under 32 (2) of the Evidence Act as being a statement made by a dead person in the ordinary course of business and in the discharge of his professional duty. Mohan Singh v. Emperor, L R 6 All 49 = 85 Ind Cas 647 = 26 Cr L J 551 = 1 I R 193. All Jama nasid baki and Jamabandi papers can be admitted in evidence under this clause but it must be clear that the persons who made them are dead and that the papers were made in the ordinary course of business. An entry as to the rate of rent cannot be distinguished from other entries therein is not made in the ordinary course of business. Dulhu Ma v. Jigedesh Nath 90 Ind Cas 564.

Since it is not essential that the occupation should be a mercantile or an industrial one, nor even that it should be a secular one it follows that a register of marriages or the like kept by a priest or minister is admissible. Kennedy v. Doyle 10 All Mr 161. In that case Gray J said "An entry made in the performance of a religious duty is certainly no less valuable than one made by a clerk or messenger or notary or attorney or solicitor or a physician in the course of his secular occupation."

A deed of conveyance was tendered in evidence which purported to be the mark of C as vendor, and which was duly attested by four witnesses. C however, denied that she had ever executed the deed, and said that the mark was not hers. All the attesting witnesses were dead. A witness was called who knew made under a duty to a third person, it may be conceded that an oral statement would be so much inferior to a written one in trustworthiness. In this country, however, where that limitation does not obtain, the trustworthiness of an oral statement would seem to be far inferior to that of a written one, especially as affected by the second reason for the rule (vide supra under the head circumstantial guarantee of trustworthiness). Nevertheless, in the actual conduct of business by subordinates in mercantile or industrial houses (practically the only class of persons by whom oral reports are regularly made), the element of duty (as required in England) does in fact exist, and where it does exist the case seems a proper one for the adoption of the broader English rule admitting oral statements. Apart from the above considerations, there is no reason for distinguishing between oral and written statements and of the disadvantage of the former, no such distinction is made in most of the other exceptions.

Section 32 (2) and section 34. In Rampyabai v Balaji, 23 B 291-5 Bom L R 50 the plaintiff relied on entries in the hand writing of her deceased husband kept in the ordinary course of business. The lower Court rejected certain items for want of corroboration. On appeal, Jenlins C J in delivering the judgment observed "The plaintiff sues to recover a sum of money and in support of her claim she produces certain accounts and also calls oral evidence. The accounts are relevant both under section 34 and under section 32 (2) of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872. The learned Judge has considered that corroboration of these accounts was required, and by that we understand that he considered corroboration was necessary as a matter of law. Entries in accounts relevant only under section 34 are not alone sufficient to charge any person with liability corroboration is required, but where accounts are, as here, relevant also under section 32 (2) they are in law sufficient in themselves and the law does not as in the case of accounts admissible only under section 34 require more. Entries in accounts relevant in the same suit be relevant under both sections as here and where this is so, it is clear that, in as much as they are relevant under section 32 (2) corroboration is not required by the Act. The learned Judge was in error in supposing that the requirements of section 34 applied to the accounts, though they were relevant under section 32 (2). At the same time we wish it to be distinctly understood that though the accounts which are relevant under section 32 (2) do not as a matter of law require corroboration, the Judge is not bound to act on them without corroboration, that is a matter on which he must exercise his own judicial discretion as a Judge of fact. In what I have said I have in no way limited the discretion of the Judge as a Judge of fact in determining whether or not he will act on the accounts without corroboration the only point being that the law does not require corroboration." See also Musht Rani v Firm Bahadur, 62 Ind. Cas 916. So also where entries in Jama bandi papers began over 70 years before the action was tried the presumption was that the person who made them was dead and could not be called and as they were made in the ordinary course of business by the landlord's agents, they were relevant without any corroboration, as evidence against the tenants under sub section (3) section 32 of the Indian Evidence Act which does not require corroboration as under section 34. Dhulha Munda v R. Grant 16 C L J 24 see also Htowh v Farak Nath 16 C L J 308=17 C W N 774=17 Ind Cas 266 Khero v Bejoy, 7 W R 533, Rama Sawan v Ram nandan 22 Ind Cas 627. Such documents both signed and unsigned would be admissible not only as corroborative evidence but as independent evidence if the landlords comply with the requirements of this clause. It is no doubt necessary for the landlords to establish the antecedent condition that the persons who prepared the papers are dead or cannot be found. Charitar v Kailash, 41 Ind Cas 422=4 Pat L W 213. So also Talub Baki papers may be evidence under section 32 Cl (2) of the Evidence Act but before they can be admitted a landlord is to show that the person making the statement is dead and the entries made by him in the ordinary course of business. Umed Ali v Yauab Khaj, 31 C L J 63=47 C 266=56 Ind Cas 38 Duku v Jogadish 90 Ind. Cas 761=A I R 1926 Cal 359 Jonab Biswas v Sna Kumari A I R 197 Cal 955. But in Gopeshwar Sen v Burdwanadhipati, A I R 1923 Cal 851 Mr Justice Mukerji said "The only material difference is between an entry relevant under section 34 and one relevant under section 32 cl (2) is that in the former case the person who made the entry may be available as a witness while in the latter case he is not. I find it very difficult to appreciate on what ground the legislature could intend to exempt entries relevant under s. 32 cl (2) from the disability that it imposed on entries relevant under s. 31 by the second part of that section, and personally I have always felt inclined to take the view that such entries no matter whether they are relevant under the one section or under the other are not to be considered as alone sufficient to charge any person with liability.

English Law A declaration is deemed to be relevant when it was made by the declarant in the ordinary course of business, and in the discharge of professional duty, at or near the time when the matter stated occurred (Doe v. Terford, 3 B. & Ad. 590) and of his own knowledge. Such declarations are deemed to be irrelevant except so far as they relate to the matter which the declarant stated in the ordinary course of his business or duty, or if they do not appear to be made by a person duly authorised to make them (Steph. art. 2). The leading case on this rule is the case of Priest v. Earl of Torrington 1 Salk. 285 = 2 Smith L. C. 320. The short report of it in Salk. is as follows: The plaintiff being a brewer, brought an action against the Earl of Torrington for beer sold and delivered, and the evidence given to charge the defendant was, that the usual course of the plaintiff's dealing was, that the draymen came every night to the clerk of the warehouse and gave an account of the beer they had delivered out which he set down in a book kept for the purpose, to which the draymen set their names; that the drayman was dead, but this was his hand set to the book, and this was held good evidence of a delivery, otherwise of the shop book itself singly without more. That case was decided by Chief Justice Holt in 1703. Previous to that in Pitman v. Maddox 1 Lord Raym. 732, before the same learned Judge the plaintiff produced in evidence his shop book written by one of his servants who was dead. And upon proof of the death of the servant and that he used to make such entries of debt, etc., it was allowed by Holt, Chief Justice, to be good evidence, without proof of the delivery of the goods, etc. And he said, this was a good proof as the proof of a witness's hand (who was dead) subscribed to a book, etc. And (by him) notwithstanding the statute of 7 Jac. 1. C. 12, says, that a shop-book shall not be evidence after the year, yet he did not hold such book to be good evidence within the year alone. Thayer's Case L. J. 11.

Origin In England, formerly a party to an action was not permitted to testify in his own behalf. An apparent exception to this rule, however, existed in the application of the so-called "hop book rule". In early times in England parties were permitted to show by entries made in their books, the sale of goods or performance of labour, and this was so well recognised a doctrine that a Statute of 7 Jac. 1, C. 12 was passed in 1609 A. D. to limit the scope of the rule. The relevant portion of the Statute runs as follows:—Be it therefore enacted by the authority of this present parliament, that no tradesman or handicraftsman keeping a shop book as aforesaid, his or their executors or administrators, shall after the feast of St. Michael the Archangel, next coming be allowed admitted or received to give his shop book in evidence in any action for any money due for wares hereafter to be delivered, or for work hereafter to be done, above one year before the same action brought, except he or they, their executors or administrators shall have obtained or gotten a bill of debt or obligation of the debtor for the said debt, or shall have brought or pursued against the said debtor, his executors or administrators some action for the said debt wares, or work done within one year next after the same wares delivered, money due for wares delivered, or work done. Later developments narrowed the rule to the cases where the entries were made by a clerk. Cooper v. Marsden, 1 L. J. 1. This doubtless, seemed to the Courts more consistent with the doctrine that a party could not be a witness for himself. The clerk himself was a competent witness and entries made by him were considered equally unobjectionable. Authentication of the entries was required by the clerk who made them if living and within reach; if he was not proof of his handwriting was considered sufficient. Pitman v. Maddox, 1 Lord Raym. 732. Priest v. Earl of Torrington 2 Id. Raym. 873. The rule with respect to entries made by a party in his own books did not meet with much favour from the English Judges in later times, and survived only in minor Courts. Thayer

(as Li 509, Glyn v Bond 2 V & S 38, Crouch v Drury, Keble 21, Swan v Williams, Comb 217 Bram v Preece, 11 M & W 773 Its development originally and its modern application in England and its explanation and justification on the part of the Courts in America, illustrate the fact that it is a rule which has drawn its utility from the necessities imposed on Courts by the contemporaneous methods of business. McClellan v Balfour 1 Atk 21 Lord Chancellor Hardwicke said "A tradesman's book is admitted as evidence through no absolute necessity, but by reason of a presumption of necessity only inferred from the nature of commerce." See also Woodcock v Lord Cobham, Bomb 180, Ford v Hoplins, 1 Salk 283. So parties' own book continued to go on, when the entries were the clerk's whether he was living or dead. There is reason to think that the practice of admitting similar entries when made in a stranger's book, grew out of the practice in the case of a party's own 'shop book'. Phayer Li 509.

English rule—Duty to a third person. The further limitation exists in England and Canada that there should have been a duty to a third person to the contents of which the report or record was made. (Chambers v Bernasconi, 1 C & J 151 on app 1 C M & R 347. So in order to make such evidence admissible the declaration must be actually in the discharge of a duty to a third person. So a farmer's book of his farm labourers' work done was rejected on the ground that it was not made in the discharge of some duty for which he was responsible. R v North 4 Q B 132. In Mellor v Malmesley (1914) 1 Ch 525, to identify a boundary a field book of a deceased surveyor, employed by the Local Board to survey was produced but it was excluded. But on appeal (1935) 2 Ch 161, the decision was reversed. In delivering the judgment of the Appellate Court Taughan Williams L J said "Here the duty of the surveyor was to record everything, without which he could not arrive at that ultimate conclusion. If it was his duty to record those matters at the time and he in fact did so contemporaneously I think the rule as to admissibility applies. See also Lytell v Kennedy 35 W R 725 Mercer v Dume, (1904) 2 Ch 302 (511) on appeal (1905) 2 Ch 538 (554). So there must have been a duty to do the very thing recorded. Smith v Blackley, L R 2 Q B 337. See also Forster v Grey L R 12 Ch D 431 Lytell v Kennedy, 35 W R 725 Stull v Forster 5 App Cas 623, Hills v Hills, 36 T L R 772, Trotter v McLean 13 Ch D 779 Money v Allen 13 Ch D 558. In Chambers v Bernasconi, 1 C & J 151 the Court rejected the Deputy's return of the place of arrest, because it was not the duty of the Sheriff's officer to make a return to the Sheriff that he had made it correct but it is not a necessary part of that duty that he should take the particular place of the arrest. So the statement of other circumstances, however natural they may be thought to find a place in the narrative is no proof of those circumstances. Bram v Preece 11 M & W 773 R v St Mary's Church, 22 J M C 109. In Smith v Blackley L R 2 Q B at p 332 Blackburn J said "There is to the admission of such evidence is confined strictly to the entry of the particular thing which it is the duty of the person to do and unlike a statement against interest does not extend to collateral matter however closely connected with that thing. It is an essential fact to render such an entry admissible that not only it should have been made in the due discharge of the duty about which the person is employed but the duty must be to do the very thing to which the entry relates and then to make a report or record of it. The existence of the duty must be proved by other independent evidence. Leggerton 2 Deg 1 & J at p 611, The Henry Cotton 5 P D 136, R v Purford L R 2 Q B at p 332, Perceval v Nanson 7 Ex 3 Chambers v Bernasconi, 1 C M & R 347. Personal custom is not equivalent to duty and creates no responsibility towards any person. Therefore, entries in the book of a deceased solicitor or bill of costs delivered by him are not admissible on the ground that it was his duty to keep proper books, or that they were made in the course of duty. Pouell 1 C 321. See also Bright v Leggerton 1 C & J at p 617 Hope v Hope (1893) W N 21, Ferroyd v Condliffe (1897) p 25, contra Raulus v Pichard, 28 Berr 370. The office of an employer to which the duty is attached may be private, as in the case of an ordinary or public, as in that of a Sheriff (Chambers v Bernasconi, 1 C M & R 347).

Duty to a third person—Necessity under this section Under the Indian Evidence Act, the report or record need not be made in the course of a duty to a third person. "The statement or entry, in order to be admissible under the Act must relate to a relevant fact, and it would appear to make no difference so far as the question of admissibility is concerned, whether this fact is connected with the performance of a duty or is merely an independent collateral matter. Whether this fact naturally finds a place in the narrative what is the nature of its connection with the fact, the statement of which was a matter of duty, and whether this connection was such as to raise a presumption of accuracy of information or observation must however, be questions of importance in estimating the weight due to such evidence when it relates to collateral matters merely." Fiddell 7th Ed p 98 So in India the following observation of Lord Denham in Chambers v Bernasconi, 3 L J Ex 373=1 C M & R 347 has no application. "We are all of opinion that, whatever effect may be due to an entry made in the course of business any office reporting facts necessary to the performance of a duty the statement of other circumstances however naturally they might be thought to find place in the narrative, is no proof of those circumstances. A register of marriages kept by Ishahad since deceased who celebrated a marriage, and in which register was entered the amount of the dower, was held to be admissible and relevant, as evidence of the sum fixed, being an entry in a book kept in the discharge of duty within section 32, cl (2) Zalena v Salma, 19 C 689=19 I A 149

Contemporaneity—Necessity under the Indian Evidence Act According to English Law, the entry should have been made at or near the time of the transaction recorded,—not merely because this is necessary in order to assure a fairly accurate recollection of the matter but because any trustworthy habit of making regular business records will ordinarily involve the making of the record contemporaneously. The rule fixes no time, each case must depend on its own circumstances. Wigmore § 1526 In Doe v Trufford, 3 B & Ad 890, Parle B said "It is to be observed that in the case of an entry against interest proof of the hand writing of the party, and his death, is enough to authorise its reception. It whatever time it is made it is admissible but in the other case (in declarations in the course of business) it is essential to prove that it was made at the time it purports to bear date it must be a contemporaneous entry. Similarly in Poole v Deas, 1 Bing N C 649, Tindal C J said "If there were any doubts whether the entry was made at the time of the transaction the case ought to go down to trial again. See also Smith v Blackley, L R 2 Q B 326 Ryan v King 25 L R Ir 84, The Henry Coron L R 3 P D 156, Champneys v Peel, 1 Stark 326 So where an entry was not made until two days after the event it was held not contemporaneous. The Henry Coron 3 P D 156 The provisions of the Indian Evidence Act contain no similar restriction as to the admissibility of this kind of evidence but in determining the weight to be allowed to it in particular cases, it will always be important to consider how far the statement or entry was contemporaneous with the fact it relates. Fiddell 7th Ed 93 Cum Fd Tenth Ed 163

Personal knowledge The declarations in only evidence of the precise facts that it was the writer's duty to record and of which consequently he had personal knowledge. Phy 7th Ed p 251 In Braun v Pierce 11 M & W 773 an action was brought to recover the sum of £4 15s for coals alleged to have been sold by the plaintiff's tator to the defendant. At the trial it appeared that it was the duty of a person of the name of Harey who worked at the coal pit to give notice to Yem the foreman of the coal which was sold. Yem was not present when the coal was delivered and not being able to write employed a person of the name of Baldum to make entries in the books from what he, Yem,

S 32. told him Both Hume and Yem were dead, but in order to prove the delivery of the coal Paldam was called as a witness who produced the book, and stated that he made it out from Yem's directions, and that every evening he read over the entries to him. It also appeared to have been the course of business for the customers to go to the pit's mouth, and take the coal away with them. There was evidence that the coal in question had been delivered to the defendant, but it did not appear to have been credited in the plaintiff's books, whenever the plaintiff concluded it had not been paid for. The under-sheriff rejected the entries in the book. On appeal Lord Manger C B discharging the Rule said "It is like some other case of public officer who does anything in the course of business. But the case where the books are not written by the party himself, but at his appointment by another man who is dead, is widely different. As regard the case of Pine v Lord Torrington it is better to adhere to that case, and it is not to give any extension to it." When the entry has been made on hear it will not be received. Meier v Demie (1905) 2 Ch 538. Similarly in the case of Henry Green, 3 P D 178, So Robert Phillimore said "It seems to me that the authorities point to this that entries in a document made by a deceased person can only be admitted as evidence when it is clearly shown that the entries relate to matters done by the deceased person and not by third parties. There can be no doubt that the general principle of testimonial evidence should apply here in a case where, namely, that the person whose statement is required to testify should speak from personal observation or knowledge (vide o C). This principle has often been invoked in excluding hearsay entries made by a person who had no personal knowledge of the supposed facts recorded. Henry Green v Lord Torrington 1905, 2 Ch 538, Illing v Morgan Co, 126 All 376. In the former case Peters said "Such a book must contain the registration of some fact by one who would at the time have been a competent witness to the fact which he registered. But does this principle exclude all entries made by persons not having personal knowledge of the fact entered? May not this act of personal knowledge on the part of the entrant be supplemented by the personal knowledge of some other person whose knowledge is in fact incorporated in the entry? In other words if the element of personal knowledge can somehow be adequately supplied by a second person it is material that the entrant himself did not have this personal knowledge. (vide more § 1570). Then after discussing the matter he says "The conclusion is, then, that when an entry is made by one person in the regular course of business, or in any oral or written report made to him by one or more persons in the regular course of business, of a transaction lying in the personal knowledge of the latter there is no objection to receiving that entry under the present exception, and the testimony of the former person only provided the practical inconvenience of producing on the stand the numerous other persons thus concerned would in the particular case not weigh the probable utility of doing so." (Wigmore § 1570(4)).

According to clause (2) of section 32 of the Evidence Act account book containing entries not made by nor at the dictation of a person who had personal knowledge of the truth of the facts stated is inadmissible. Leg v Hemmatta 1 B 610. In delivering the judgment of the Court McBride J said at p 616 "But the Indian rule of evidence (Evidence Act section 32 clause 2 and section 31) simply requires that entries in account books should in order to be relevant be regularly kept in the course of business, although it may be no doubt important to know that the person making or dictating the entries had or had not a personal knowledge of the facts stated, this is a question which according to the Indian rule of evidence affects the admissibility of the entries. But in Jagat Pal Singh v Jagat Singh 25 A 143 P C a genealogical table purporting to have been made by a person since dead but which was shown to be merely an exhibit binding on him for the purposes of a former suit was held to be inadmissible in evidence, having been made without the personal knowledge and belief which must be found to be premised in any admissible statement by a deceased person. In delivered the judgment Lord Robertson at p 151 said "The other document found in a different position. Its alleged author Ru Gardat Singh, had died before the trial. But the exhibit in question is merely a genealogical table filed on behalf of

Girdal in a claim made by him for certain village. The object of Girdal in the proceeding was to make him self out to be of the elder branch of his family and this admittedly was untrue. But the fatal objection to the admissibility of the document is that it is in no way brought home to Girdal except as being in exhibit handed on him for the purpose of that suit. His relation to the document is therefore something entirely different from the personal knowledge and belief which must be found or presumed in my statement of a deceased person which is admissible in evidence. For aught that appears the genealogical table in question might never have been seen or heard of by Girdal personally, but have been entirely the work of his pleader. But according to Mr Justice Hoodroffe, the observation of the Privy Council relates to statement under (1) the terms of which require 'special means of knowledge.' Hoodroffe J 5th Ed 325. To reject a declaration on the ground that it is not based on personal knowledge would create an inconvenience. The inconvenience is thus stated by Jumplin J in Fidler v Gutter 13 Cal 199. Shall the plaintiff be compelled to go behind the books thus verified by the clerks who kept them and resort to each of the subscribers who participated in the transaction and the sale of this produce? Are not the entries thus made in the usual course of business of this extensive trading establishment and as a part of the proper employment of the witnesses who prove them not only the best but the only reliable evidence which it is practicable to secure? We have no hesitation in holding that propriety, justice and convenience require them to be admitted. The witnesses, wharfingers and numerous subordinates who handled this cotton kept no books. They report to the clerks who keep the books of the concern and their functions are performed. It is not reasonable to suppose that they can remember the multitude of transactions thus occurring every day. To impose a different rule upon these establishments would immediately commence and amount to a denial of justice.

In England this rule has not been acted on in the case of declarations made in the course of duty. Doe v Dimes, 10 Q B 314, Lugges Miller v Heathly, 29 L R Ir 144. In the latter case the handwriting of a deceased clergyman to a register more than thirty years old was required to be proved. That the declaration was made in the ordinary course of business must also be proved. Rule section 114 illus (f) Ducila Das v Laloo Jani 6 M L A 87. Hoodroffe J 5th Ed p 324. But in Budnath Sahay v Anant Minton 29 Ind Cas 219, a division bench of the Calcutta High Court consisting of Mr Justice Hobnood and Mr Justice Vallab held otherwise. In that case they observed: There is nothing in section 32 clause (2), which requires any formal proof that the papers are kept as a fact in the ordinary course of business. He (Subordinate Judge) appears to have confused section 32 clause (2) with section 1 with which we have nothing to do in this case.

To reject a declaration on the ground that it is not based on personal knowledge would create an inconvenience. The inconvenience is thus stated by Lampkin J in Fielder v Collier 13 Cr 499. Shall the plaintiff be compelled to go behind the books thus verified by the clerk who kept them and is out to each of the sub-agents who participated in the transaction and the sale of this produce? Are not the entries thus made in the usual course of business of this extensive trading establishment, and a part of the proper employment of the witnesses who prove them not only the best but the only reliable evidence which it is practicable to secure? There was evidence that the coal in question had been delivered to the defendant, but it did not appear to have been credited in the plaintiff's books, whenever the plaintiff concluded it had not been paid for. The under sheriff rejected the entries in the book. On appeal Judgment C. B. discharging the Rule said "It is like any other case of public officer who does anything in the course of business. But the case where the books are not written by the party himself, but at his suggestion by another man who is dead is widely different. As regard the case of *Price v. There can be no doubt that the general principle of testimonial evidence should apply here, where namely, that the person whose statement is received as testimony should speak from personal observation or knowledge. (Rule 4 (b)). This principle has often been invoked in excluding hearsay entries made by a person who had no personal knowledge of the supposed fact recorded. Wright v. Trier 19 Ch 195, Halling v. Morgan Co, 126 Ala 376. In the former case Jessup said "Such a book must contain the recitation of some fact by one who would at the time have been a competent witness to the fact which he registered. But does this principle exclude all entries made by persons not having personal knowledge of the fact entered? May not this act of personal knowledge on the part of the entrant be supplemented by the personal knowledge of some other person whose knowledge is in fact represented in the entry? In other words if the element of personal knowledge can somehow be adequately supplied by a second person is it material that the entrant himself did not have this personal knowledge?" Wright v. Trier § 1570. Then after discussing the matter he says "The conclusion is then that when an entry is made by one person in the regular course of business, or in any other or in a written report made to him by one or more persons in the regular course of business, of a transaction lying in the personal knowledge of the latter there is no objection to receiving that entry under the present exception, unless by the testimony of the former person only provided the practical inference is produced on the stand the numerous other persons thus concerned would in the particular case not weigh the probable utility of doing so." Wright v. Trier § 1574.

According to clause (2) of section 32 of the Evidence Act recent books containing entries not made by him at the dictation of a person who had personal knowledge of the truth of the facts stated if regularly kept in course of business are admissible. Pry v. Hemmanta 1 B 610. In delivering the judgment of the Court McNally said at p 616 "In the Indian rule of evidence (Evidence Act section 2 line 2 and section 32) imply requires that entries in account should in order to be relevant be regularly kept in the course of business, although it may be no doubt important to show that the person in making or dictating the entries had or had not personal knowledge of the facts stated, this is a question which according to the Indian rule of evidence affects the relevancy not the admissibility of the entries. But in Jagat Pal Singh v. Jyoti Singh 25 A 113 P C a genealogical table purporting to have been made by a person since dead but which was shown to be merely an exhibit binding on the purposes of a former suit was held to be inadmissible in evidence, although it was made without the personal knowledge and belief which must form the basis of any admissible statement by a deceased person. In delivering the judgment Jagat Pal Singh said "The other document found by the court is a genealogical table. Its alleged author Ru Gurul Singh had died before the trial. Scope of clause (3) This clause makes declarations against interest admissible in evidence Illustrations (e) and (f) apply to this clause This section makes three classes of declarations against interest admissible in evidence, namely 1st where they affect the declarant's pecuniary interest, 2ndly his proprietary interest 3rdly, his personal liberty or property by tending to charging him with a crime, or to subject him to payment of damages Nort Li 179 Under this clause it is the statement and not the document containing the statement which must be against the proprietary interest of the person making it Karuppanna v Rangaswami, 107 Ind Cas 293=A I R 1928 Mad 103 see also Re Paddappanai, (1910) M W N 668=8 Ind Cas 263=9 M L T 91, Venkataraja v Narasayya (1914) M W N 779=26 Ind Cas 747 Statement against interest is admissible Kalyan Lal v Jagannath, A I R 1925 All 130 The first part of sub-section (3) of section 32 enacts the well known principle

S. 32. of the English law of Evidence established in Hugham v. Rutguy 10 Eas. 1. Under this section documents are admissible against a party, if they are admissible against the interest of the person through whom he claims. Pratt v. Khagendra, 31 C. 871 P. C. = 9 C. W. N. 74. Under this clause the admissibility of statements against interest made by deceased persons rests on—
 (1) the deceased must have had personal knowledge of the fact he was declaring;
 (2) the facts stated should have been to the immediate prejudice of the deceased;
 (3) the statement must have been, to the knowledge of the deceased, contrary to his interest; and (4) the interest must be either pecuniary or proprietary.
Ramanathan v. Munuguppa, 33 Ind. C. 969 = 3 L. W. 216 = (1916) 1 M. W. N. 208.

English law. According to English law declarations against interest are statements made by deceased persons adverse to their pecuniary or proprietary interest, and the guarantee of their credibility consists in the fact that they are thus opposed to the declarant's interest, since it is the general experience of mankind that statements so made are likely to be true. Beddleton v. W. & A. 10 B. & C. 317 (327), Gleadon v. Allen, (1833) 1 C. & M. 410 (13), 14 B. & C. 317 (327), Bermingham (1861) 31 L. J. M. C. 63, 67, Bentley v. Allinson, (1819) 1 C. D. 297. But declarations against interest in other sense as for instance admission of liability to criminal prosecution do not come within the rule. Sussex Peerage Case 11 Cl. & Fin. 104, 113, 114. In Gladstone v. Allen 1 C. & M. 410 at 424, Dayley J. states the rule as follows: "An entry by a man in his deed will be evidence as to strangers, if it relates to a fact peculiar to his knowledge if he had no interest in misrepresenting it, or if the entry charges him with the receipt of money for a third person, or imports it as a debt which would otherwise be due to him is paid." In Queen v. Lyster (1844) 1 B. 341 Hayes J. observed: "Having regard to the great change that has taken place in recent times, been made in admitting the evidence of the interested witness when alive it would be most objectionable to lay down any narrow rule upon the reception of declarations in any way against interest which have been made by persons since deceased, and which are frequently the only evidence that can be obtained on the subject to which they refer and where the Courts are frequently obliged to supply the want of evidence by presumption."

In Taylor v. Williams 5 Ch. D. 695 = 45 L. J. Ch. 793 Jessell M. R. said: "It is no doubt an established rule in the Courts of this country that a declaration against the interest of the man who made it is receivable in evidence after his death for all purposes. What is the meaning of its being against interest? I adopt the view of Brown Park in the case of Key v. Lower Heyford (1841) 1 C. 343 that it must be prima facie against his interest that is to say the meaning of the entry standing alone must be against the man who made it. In Massey v. Allen, 13 Ch. D. 558 Jessell M. R. introduced a declaration in relation to the effect that in order to be admissible as a declaration against interest the entry must be one which under no circumstances could be for advantage or benefit who made it. In Ex parte Edwards, 14 Q. B. D. 415 the Court of Appeal remarked that the statement is admissible in evidence must be against the interest of the person at the time it is made and not an admission which may or may not turn out at some subsequent date to have been against his interest. In Fuelers v. Ollery (1841) 1 B. & C. 117 (1912) 2 K. B. 317 = 81 L. J. K. B. 693 Lord Justice Maule said: "The qualification that it must be shown that the statement was made by the deceased contrary to his interest. In this state of mind it came up for consideration before the Court of Appeal in Harley v. F. & S. Flood v. Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company (1913) 2 K. B. 130 = 131 B. 131. The statement which was sought to be put in evidence was a statement of paternity and a promise made by the deceased to marry the child, who claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act as a dependant on the deceased. Lord Justice Maule after a detailed observation that as between the declarant and the child the statement could be made available for the person himself and that of the child it was sufficient that the statement was made for the interest of the child."

making it, he is inclined to the former view 'if there is any real difference between them,' proceeds to lay down categorically the tests of admissibility of statements against interest. According to the learned Lord Justice, (1) the deceased must have had personal knowledge of the facts he was stating, (b) the statement should have been to the deceased's immediate prejudice, (c) the statement must have been to the knowledge of the deceased, contrary to his interest, and (d) the interest must be either pecuniary or proprietary. The case went up to the House of Lords. Lords Loreburn and Moulton apparently accepted the statement of the law as laid down by the Court of Appeal, but Lord Shaw was not prepared to agree with it. See Floyd v Powell Sufferin Steam Coal Company Ltd, (1914) A C 733=51 I J K B 1051. The other learned Lords made no comment on this point. The statement was held admissible by the whole House on another ground. Rumathin v Manuguppa, 33 Ind Cas 969.

In a probate suit it was alleged that the testatrix destroyed her will at the time when she was not of sound mind, memory or understanding. Under the will which had been destroyed her husband took a life interest in her estate. Thereafter under an ante-nuptial settlement he was, in the event that had happened, entitled absolutely to her estate. A statement by the husband, who had died before the suit was brought that he did not think the testatrix was of sound mind when she destroyed her will was admissible in evidence as being a declaration of his own title by limitation to a life estate. Paul v Miles, 27 I L R 262.

Difference between English and Indian Law. According to English law, only declarations oral or written, of deceased persons made while the declarants were in a position to know of the matters stated, and which are against pecuniary or proprietary interests, are admissible in evidence. Per Bayley J in Gleadon v Hill (1 C & M 423). The provision underlining relevant any statement which would have exposed a man to criminal prosecution is a departure from English law. So according to this clause a declaration which would subject the declarant to a prosecution of civil action is also admissible. This seems to be a departure from the rule laid down in Sussex Peerage Case, 11 C & F 109. In that case the question was whether A was lawfully married to B. A statement by a deceased clergyman that he performed the marriage under circumstances which would render him liable to a criminal prosecution was not deemed to be relevant as a statement against interest. Steph Dig Est Art 24. Lord Lyndhurst, Chief J, in declaring his opinion that this evidence should be rejected observed:

It is not true that the declarations of deceased persons are in all circumstances receivable in evidence when in some way or other they might injuriously affect the interest of the party making them. Nor is it true that because while living a party would be excused from answering as to certain facts, his declarations as to those facts become evidence after his death. These are not correlative nor corresponding propositions. Lord Trougham in that case added: 'To say if a man should confess a felony for which he would be liable to prosecution, that, therefore, the instant the grave closes over him all that was said by him is to be taken as evidence in every action and prosecution against another person, is one of the most monstrous and untenable propositions that can be advanced.' Vol I 184. So 'the interest involved must according to the English Law be one of a pecuniary or proprietary nature, no other interest will suffice. But the Indian Law laid down in sub-section (2) of section 32 of the Evidence Act extends the scope of this exception and puts a personal interest on the same footing as a pecuniary or proprietary interest. Per Shadi Lal C J in Mahomed v Emperor A I R 1926 Lah 41=89 Ind Cas 252 (278). So a statement which would have exposed the declarant to a criminal prosecution or to a suit for damages would be admissible as a piece of evidence in any proceeding in which such evidence is relevant to the issue or issues being tried in such proceeding. Per Fouldes J in Mohammad v Emperor 89 Ind Cas 252 (274).

Principle. The exception presupposes like most of the others first a necessity for resorting to hearsay, i.e. the death of the declarant, or some other condition rendering him unavailable for testimony in Court, and secondly, a circumstantial guarantee of truthworthiness, in this instance, the circumstance that the

S 32. fact stated being against the declarant's interest, is not likely to have been stated untruthfully Higmore § 1455

Necessity principle The Necessity principle, as here applied, signifies the impossibility of obtaining other evidence from the same source, the declarant being unavailable in person on the stand. Whenever the witness is prima facie unavailable, his statement should be received. Death is universally considered to be sufficient Manley v Curtis 1 Price 229, Phillips v Cole, 10 4 & L 106, Barrows v White 4 B & C 328, Spargo v Brown, 9 B & C 94. In Fitch v Chapman 10 Conn 11 Williams J said 'The cases where such evidence is admitted seem to proceed generally upon the principle that by the decease of the person better evidence cannot be had.' But the principle of necessity is broad enough to assimilate other causes. Illness and insanity should be equally sufficient to admit the statement, as well as absence from jurisdiction Higmore § 1456. The circumstances under which such evidence is receivable is stated in this section. But in England physical incapacity is not considered sufficient to admit such declarations. In Harrison v Blake 3 Camp 468, the declarant had suffered an apoplectic fit and was declared by his physician to be in extremis. The question was whether the declaration of such a person would be admitted. In rejecting the evidence Ellenborough J said 'No case has gone so far as to admit such evidence and I am afraid to establish a precedent. It is difficult to determine when a patient is past all hope of cure. If such a relaxation of rules of evidence were permitted there would be very sudden indisposition and recovery. Under this section of the Evidence Act, a statement against interest is admissible when the declarant is absent from the jurisdiction and his attendance could not be procured without an amount of delay or expense, which under the circumstances appears to be unreasonable. Asiatic Steam N Co v Bengal Coal Co, 20 C 751

Circumstantial Guarantee The basis of this exception is the principle of experience that a statement asserting a fact distinctly against one's interest is entirely unlikely to be deliberately false or heedlessly incorrect and is thus sufficiently sanctioned, though oath and cross examination are wanting. In Smith v Barclay L R 2 Q B 326, Blackburn J said 'When the entries are against the pecuniary interest of the person making them, and never could be made without a statement by the person himself, there is such a probability of their truth that such statements have been admitted after the death of the person making them.' Similarly in Lalor v Lalor, 4 L R 631 Fitzgibbon C J said 'The interest against which the statement appears to be made (is required) in order to supply that sanction which after the death of the party, is accepted as a substitute for an oath. In Mercer v Adair v Mzelin, 14 Buh 244, Gibson C J said 'Experience has taught us that when one makes a declaration in disparagement of his own rights or interests it is generally true, and because it is so the law has deemed it safe to admit evidence of such declaration. The reason for the exception to the rule against second hand evidence is that a man is unlikely to make a false statement against his own interest. Self interest is supposed to be the best guarantee of truth. But this person does not wholly agree when a person while making a declaration prejudicial to his own interest testifies something which is injurious to other persons. Cessante ratione cessat effectus. Per Shadwell C J in Mahommed v Emperor A I R 1920 Lah 111. Ind Cis 232. In Tucker v Oldbury Urban District Council, (1912) 2 K B 31, 81 L J K B 668 Lord Justice Moulton said 'Such declarations were admitted as evidence in our jurisprudence on the ground that declarations made by persons against their own interest are extremely unlikely to be false.'

Origin of the rule In John Bunbury 16 (1719) rentals or arrears of money received by the steward were allowed at Winchester and Dorchester Assizes. This case was approved in Harpur v Brool, 3 Woolson's Lectures 133 cited in Thayer Case 11 177. There it is said 'On a similar fact it appears rentals are admitted in evidence, because the bailiff or receiver charges himself with the specific sums. In Porter v Hunter v Buchanan 12 279, (1866) Lord Ellenborough observed 'The contents of the 17th adverse to the title of the person who had possession of it, it diminished his interest in the fine on renewal, in the same proportion as it raised the rent to be reserved. The paper was written by a confidential agent at least, though it does not appear that he was the immediate steward of the estate at the time, but certainly, as the contents show, by one who had an intimate knowledge of it, and it was in some degree recognized as authentic by the then owner of the estate, the tenant for life, by this endorsement written upon it. When any part of an entry against interest is admissible in evidence, the whole of it is admissible, not merely the words which tell immediately against the interest of the deceased. For instance if the deceased gave a receipt for money paid to him in discharge of a debt, the whole receipt can be read to the jury not merely the word "paid" and the amount. Poult. L. 307. The leading case on the subject is Higham v Rutguay, 10 East 109. There the question was whether one William Fowden Junior was born before or after the 16th April 1768. The plaintiff, in order to prove that his birth was subsequent to that date, tendered in evidence the following entries from the day book and ledger of a man mid wife who had attended the mother of William Fowden junior at his birth and was since deceased —

Day Book Entries

These entries were tendered in evidence to show the precise day of the birth of Wm Fowden, Junr. The evidence was objected to. But the jury found on this evidence that Wm Fowden Junr was not born on the 2nd but on the 22nd April 1768. Lord Ellenborough C. J. in delivering the judgment said "I should be extremely sorry if any thing fell from the Court upon this occasion which would in any degree break in upon those sound rules of evidence which have been established for the security of life, liberty and property, but in declaring our opinion upon inadmissibility of the evidence in question, we shall lay down no rule which can induce such ruinous consequences nor go beyond the limits of those cases which have been often recognized beginning with that of Warren v Greenville 2 Strange, 1128 (1740). The question is whether the books of a man mid wife, attending upon a woman at the time of her delivery and making charges for such his attendance, which he thereby acknowledges to have been paid are evidence of the time of the birth of the son as noted in those entries."

A deed whereby a mortgagor mortgaged his life interest in real estate under the Will of a person therein named is admissible after the mortgagor's death to show that such a Will existed as the deed amounted to a declaration by the mortgagor against his interest as limiting his estate to an estate for life under a particular Will Sly v Dredge 46 L J P 63 A declaration of F deceased that her husband made a Will, and that he thereby gave her a life interest in his property and legacies to others amounting to £8,000 or £9,000 was admitted in evidence as being a declaration against pecuniary or proprietary interest made by a deceased person on the ground that F would if her husband had died intestate have been entitled absolutely to a moiety of a certain sum mentioned in a marriage settlement Blood v Russell 29 L R Ir 91 Upon the principle of written declarations being admissible, where they are against the pecuniary interest of a person making them, the accounts of a deceased trustee, containing acknowledgments of money received by him on behalf of his cestui que trust and for which he was liable held admissible against the cestui que trust Bright v Legerton 29 L J Ch 852 In an action by an executor for a debt due to the estate a parol statement by the testator against his pecuniary interest with reference to such debt is admissible Watson v Sandford 40 L T 39 Declarations made by a testator are evidence against a person claiming in the character of his administrator Smith v Smith 7 Cir & P 401 In an action of trover to recover a watch, the defendant pleaded that it was not the property of the plaintiff It appeared that the watch had formerly been the property of the father of the plaintiff and the defendant who were brothers The defendant proved in evidence letters of administration of his father's effects, which had been granted to him Held that the plaintiff, in answer to this evidence was entitled to give evidence of conversations in which the deceased had stated that he had given the watch to the plaintiff Smith v Smith 3 Bing N S 29 In order that an admission made by a dead man may be admissible in evidence on the ground that it was against his

S 32. interest, it must have been actually against his interest at the time when it was made, it is not sufficient that it might possibly turn out afterwards to have been against his interest Eduards, Ex parte, 14 B D 415

Against Proprietary interest 'By declaration against proprietary interest we mean statements made by a party while in possession of an estate, a term, or a more limited interest in the land, and in disparagement of some higher title to it. These declarations are evidence for or against stranger. They have been received both as to the tenure and extent of the property, and the landlord under whom it was held without being confined to the extent of the interest of the party in possession, though they are more generally offered with reference to the title or interest in the property. The principle on which the declarations are received lies in the presumption of absolute ownership arising from possession. When a party in possession of land admits that he holds a lesser estate than a fee simple, as for instance, that he is tenant in tail, for life for a term of years, or at will, he manifestly cuts down his own interest in the land, he cuts down his own title, and it is not likely that a man would do this if he really had a higher interest than he claimed or stated.' Nort Es 180, see also Wills Es and E 192, Peaceable v Watson 4 Taunt 16, R v Birmingham, 31 L J M C 6, R v Exeter, (1869) L R 4 B 341. In R v Birmingham, Blackburn J said 'It is now well settled that a statement against interest by a deceased person is, with certain limitations, admissible evidence in proceedings between strangers. There are numerous cases which show that where a person is in possession of real property, which possession is prima facie evidence of a tenancy in fee, any statement that he makes to cut down that interest is admissible in evidence after his decease, as being a statement against interest.' Similarly in the Baron Bode's Case, 8 Q B 208 (244) the declaration of the deceased father of the claimant, who had been in the possession of the property that he only occupied and managed it for his son was held admissible as being against the interest of the person making it. A declaration which shows that the declarant has no interest in the land whatever is also admissible in evidence under this clause Grey v Redman, 1 Q B D 16. This is based on the well known rule of law, that a person in possession of land is presumed, until the contrary appears, to be the owner thereof in fee simple. Ibid, see Wills Es 193 Webb v Wainwood, 7 T R 397. The rule therefore is not applicable where the declaration simply relates to the limit of the land occupied by the declarant since there is nothing to show that it is more against his interest to deny his possession of one close than it is to assert his possession of another. Crease v Barrett, (1835) 1 C M & R 919 931, Wills Es 11. 'It is difficult to see on the other hand' says Mr Wills 'any object in principle to treating declarations by a deceased occupier of land which show the existence of an easement over it as being within the rule, since although there is no presumption of law that land is held free from easements the admission of their existence might well be considered a statement against interest. It has however been decided otherwise in several cases.' Wills Es 2nd Ed 1. Thus where a question of public way was in issue the declaration of a deceased occupier of land made whilst planting a tree stating that he planted it to mark the boundary of road is not evidence of public right for it is not a statement of general reputation but of a particular fact. R v Bliss 7 Add & 1 of Scholes v Chadwell 2 Moo & Rob 507. As assertions that one's estate is a freehold and not a leasehold or that one's possession is merely as a tenant in fee simple or a trustee for another are admissible. Waller v Broadstall 1 F P 4, Taur v Nicholby 51 sp 1 Doe v Jones 1 Camp 367, Peaceable v Watson 4 Taunt 16, Carne v Nicoll 1 Bing N C 180 Doe v Longfield, 16 M & W 1. A declaration by the person in possession that his interest was less than a fee simple for his own life only would be primary evidence that it ceased to exist at his death. Dodd Welsh v Longfield, 16 M & W 497. To make a declaration by a proprietary interest in lands evidence after the death of the declarant he must have been at the time in actual possession. La Tourne v Hutton 1 R 1. A declaration or a written entry by a deceased person when occupier of land that he was tenant at so much rent, and had paid it, is admissible as a declaration against proprietary interest, to prove the fact of the payment as well as the

the tenants, Rex v Exeter Guardians, 10 B & S 433. Declarations of a deceased person claiming a limited interest under a particular Will of property of which he was in possession, are admissible to prove the fact that the Will had a legal existence, and certain persons were named executors therein. Sly v Dedge, 16 L J P 63. On an issue as to the right of L to a fishery, entries of a deceased receiver charging himself with the receipt of rent from a sub-receiver, due from persons (of whom the sub-receiver was one), for fixing a net in the fishery, are evidence in support of L's right. Peirce v Vanson 7 Ex 1=21 L J Ex 1. Declarations made by persons in disparagement of title to land are admissible in evidence under section 32 (3) of the Evidence Act, if such declarations were made whilst the declarant was in actual possession of the property. Ramdas v Iyandandas, 63 Ind Cas 685.

Criminal prosecution and suit for damages It has already been stated that according to English law, a statement against interest in order to be admissible must be against "pecuniary" or "proprietary interest." It is not sufficient, for instance, that the statement was made under circumstances which show that the person making it would be liable to criminal prosecution (Sussex Peerage Case, 11 C & L 103), although that would seem to be a case in which he would be liable to a pecuniary penalty, by way of fine or to something admittedly worse, i.e., imprisonment. Cockle Cas Li 198. But the Sussex Peerage Case, which was decided in 1844, was neither strongly argued nor the Judges considered the precedents, so a hasty step was taken and an arbitrary limit was put upon the rule of accepting declarations against interest. Thenceforward this rule was accepted in England. Dunn v Lloyd, 1 C & K 276, Papendick v Bridgwater, 5 L & B 180. The Sussex Peerage Case plainly introduced a novelty even at the time of its inception. Before that such statements were admissible. In Hulet's Trial 5 How St Tr 1183, 1102, which was decided in 1660 the accused was charged as being the executioner of King Charles, it was disputed—and has never been clearly known—whether Gregory Brandon, the common hangman officiated on that occasion the executioner being marked, the accused Hulet tried to prove that Brandon did the deed. Witness said "When my Lord Capell Duke of Hamilton and the Earl of Holland, were beheaded in palace yard, in Westminster, my Lord Capell asked the common hangman, said he, 'Did you cut off my master's head?' 'Yes' saith he. 'Where is the instrument that did it?' He then brought the axe and kissed it, and gave him five pieces of gold. I heard him say Sirrah were not thou afraid?' Saith the hangman, 'They made me cut it off, and I had thirty pounds for my pains.' Similarly in Standen v Standen Peeko 32, where the marriage register entry recited the publication of bans the clergyman's declaration that he married without bans was received. See also Pouell v Harper, 5 C & P 590. Wigmore § 1476. So it is plain enough that this limitation, besides being a fairly modern novelty, is inconsistent with the broad language originally employed in stating the reason and principle of the present exception to the Hearsay rule. Furthermore, it cannot be justified on grounds of policy. The only plausible reason of policy that has ever been advanced for such a limitation is the possibility of procuring fabricated testimony to such an admission if oral. This is the ancient rusty weapon that has always been drawn to oppose any reform in the rules of Evidence, viz the argument of danger of abuse. This would be a good argument against admitting any witnesses at all for it is notorious that some witnesses will lie and that it is difficult to avoid being deceived by their lies. The truth is that any rule which hampers an honest man in exonerating himself is a bad rule, even if it also hampers a villain in falsely passing for an innocent. The only practical consequences of this unreasoning limitation are shocking to the sense of justice, for in its commonest application it requires in a criminal trial the rejection of a confession, however well authenticated, of a person deceased or inane or fled from the jurisdiction (and therefore quite unavailable) who has avowed himself to be the true culprit. The absurdity and wrong of rejecting in a criminal case all such evidence is patent. Wigmore § 1477. In the United States also the English rule is generally followed. But nevertheless some Judges expressed dissent against this "barbarous doctrine." Ibid. In Donnelly v United States 228 U S 243 Holmes J dissenting said "The confession of Joe Dick, since deceased, that he committed the murder for which the plaintiff in

S. 32. error was tried, coupled with circumstances pointing to its truth, would have a very strong tendency to make any one out side of a Court of Justice believe that Donnelly did not commit the crime. The rules of Evidence in the main are based on experience, logic and common sense, less hampered by history than some parts of the substantive law. There is no decision by this Court against the admissibility of such a confession, the English cases since the separation of the two countries do not bind us, the exception to the hearsay rule in the case of declarations against interest is well known, no other statement is so much against interest as a confession of murder. It is far more calculated to convince than dying declarations, which would be let in to hang a man, and when we surround the accused with so many safe guards, some of which seem to me excessive, I think we ought to give him the benefit of a fact that if proved, commonly would have such weight. The history of the law and the arguments against the English doctrine are so well and fully stated by W. Wigmore that there is no need to set them forth at greater length."

So also under the Indian Evidence Act, the third case in which declaration against interest are receivable under this clause, that of its not being given in either pecuniary or proprietary interest, but such as to subject the declarant to a prosecution or civil action, appears to depart from the law laid down in Sutton v. Peetage Case supra (Vide illustration f). But it may well be thought that a declaration by which a man makes himself liable to a criminal prosecution, or payment of damages, affords as good a guarantee for its truthfulness as one simply against his pecuniary or proprietary interest. Nori Et 184. But in order to make such statement admissible in evidence, the fact stated in the statement must expose him, to a criminal prosecution or to a suit for damages at the time it was made. Stoke's Anglo Ind Code Vol II 874, see also Nicholas v. Aspher, 21 C 216.

Where an accomplice incriminated himself and the appellant by a statement to the police detailing the incidents of the crime, and he subsequently died it was contended that the statement of the accomplice was inadmissible by reason of his death. This statement was admitted by the trial Judge under section 32 (3) of the Evidence Act as one made by a deceased person. This admission was confirmed by the High Court. Uma v. Emperor 2 O W N 5=52 I A 101=70 P L R 120=87 Ind Cis 811 P C=46 M L J 61 P C. On a trial for forgery one of the accused who has made a statement before the enquiring Magistrate died before the commencement of the trial. The statement was admitted by the Sessions Judge under section 32 (3) of the Evidence Act. Held that the statement was inadmissible since its maker had already rendered himself liable to criminal prosecution at the time it was made. Emperor v. Keshvi, 20 Bom L R 248. A woman stated that she had witnessed a murder to her paramour Doolal and to the Police in the course of an investigation ten days after the act. She then died before the inquiry. Doolal deposed to the statement of his mistress before the committing Magistrate and then disappeared. Held that both the statements of the deceased were relevant under s 32 (3) of the Evidence Act for she having witnessed an offence and not having informed the nearest police officer or Magistrate exposed herself to criminal prosecution. *At Gosh v. Statements of sundry facts against interest. There are many facts which in their ultimate effect are against the proprietary or pecuniary interest, though in their immediate and narrow aspect there may be no such clear character. These facts, however may never the less be facts so decidedly against interest that no one would be inclined falsely to concede their existence. If so on the general principle they should therefore be admitted. No more precise rule can be formulated except in the suggestion that the interest injured or the burden imposed by the fact stated should be one so palpable and positive that it would naturally have been present in the declarant's mind. Wigmore § 1491. In Smith v. Barclay L R 2 Q B 326, a letter by a clerk notifying the employer of the arrival of B's draft with three huge cases at the office and going on to state the terms of the contract with B was rejected. Barclay J said "there is no more than an admission that he has the care of the three chests which have arrived at the office, in the possibility that this statement might make him liable."

in case of their being lost is an interest of too remote a nature to make the statement admissible in evidence.' In Shy v Shy L R 2 P D 91, declarations by one running a loan that his estate was a life interest under a Will were admitted to show the existence of the Will. In Flood v Russel 29 L R 1re 96 declaration by a wife as to the existence of a Will by her husband by which she profited less than by his intestacy was admitted. In Lloyd v Pouell Duffryn (1914) A C 733, the question was whether a workman's compensation-claimant was a defendant, the claimant being concededly an illegitimate child, the deceased's statements admitting his paternity, held admissible as conduct. Earl Loreburn L C also admitted the statement as a statement of a fact constituting a legal duty to support the child and therefore semble a fact against interest. Higmore § 1461. In P v North 4 Q B 134 an entry in a book of a certain wages in the deceased master's private book with a memorandum of payment was held inadmissible in evidence. The reason for the rejection is thus given by Lord Denman C J. The book here does not show any entry operating against the interest of the party. The memorandum could only fix upon him a liability on the proof that the services referred to had been performed and whether on dispute, a jury would have found him liable for the sum entered, or more or less, we cannot say. From the above statement of law it is clear that the liability involved in the fact stated must not be a mere conditional or contingent one. 'But this limitation' says Prof Higmore, 'cannot be supported, and would, if consistently carried out, practically nullify the exception in this respect. The liability to pay conditionally is none the less a liability, moreover every contract is subject to some conditions imposed by implication of law. The incurring of a contract liability of any sort is on principle a fact against interest.' Higmore § 1461.

Statement, meaning of "It must be remembered that it is not merely the statement that must be against the interest, but the fact stated. It is because the fact is against interest that the open and deliberate mention of it is likely to be true. Hence the question whether the statement of the fact could create a liability is beside the mark." Higmore § 1462.

Preponderance of interest—Credit and debit side—No motive to misrepresent. In some cases it has been stated on the analogy of other hearsay exceptions that there must be no motive to misrepresent and this has been put as an additional requirement. Gleason v Allen, 3 Tyrw 301, Miles v Lohie 3 Bing N C 408. But" says Prof Higmore 'there is no such additional requirement. The real object of this mode of statement is to furnish a fact for a not uncommon situation,—the situation in which along with the disserving interest, there is also a more or less palpable interest to be served by the fact. The real question is, shall we attempt to strike a balance between the two opposing interests and admit the statement only if on the whole the disserving interest preponderates in probable influence? Or shall we regard the disserving interest as sufficient to admit, and leave the other merely to affect the credit of the statement? The former alternative has by the Courts been generally followed.' Higmore § 1464, Short v Lee 2 Jre & W 477. Clair v Whitmot 4 Y & C 54. But in Taylor v Witham L R 3 Ch D 605 Jessel M R noted in accordance with the latter alternative. In that case he said "It is no doubt, an established rule in the Courts of this country that an entry against the interest of the man who made it is receivable in evidence after his death for all purposes. What is the meaning of its being against his interest? I adopt the view of Mi Baron Parke in the case of Reg v Inhabitants of Louer Heyford, 2 Sm L C 7th Ed p 333, that it must be prima facie against his interest that is to say the natural meaning of the entry standing alone must be against the interest of the man who made it. Of course, if you can prove alibi that the man had a particular reason for making it and that it was for his interest, you may destroy the value of the evidence altogether, but the question of admissibility is not a question of value. The entry may be utterly worthless when you get it, if you show any reason to believe that he had a motive for making it and that though apparently against his interest, yet it was for it but that is matter for subsequent consideration when you estimate the value of the testimony." 428 "A common illustration of this question" says Prof Wigmore "is the use of a merchant's credit entry of payment received (thus against his interest) which at the same stroke has included (thus in favour of his interest) the debit entry of this claim leading to the payment, and conversely in agent's debit and credit account in which the receipts creating liability are on the whole equalled or exceeded by the payments or credits in his favour. When in the former case, the entry of payment received, or, in the latter case, of an entry creating liability, is sought to be used, the argument has been made that since taking both sides of the account together, the writer is not left with any liability and perhaps appears to have a claim for a balance, the matter cannot be said to be against his interest. This argument, accepted at Nisi Prius in De v. Touels, 1 Moo & R 261, has since been repudiated. The answer to it is that the entrant's interest in making the favouring items does not really affect, as a counter motive, his interest against the individual charging items, the entry of the latter, taken by themselves are to be trusted." Wigmore § 1461. Similar objections were advanced in Roue v. Brenton, 3 M & Ry 266, by W. Brougham. But Littledale J in rejecting the objection said "A man is not likely to charge himself for the purpose of getting a discharge." So accounts are evidence, though the writer upon the whole discharges himself. Per Coleridge J in R v. Worth, 4 Q B 131, see also Williams v. Greaves, 8 C & P 362.

Statement admissible for all facts contained in it—Separate entries. Since the principle is that the statement is made under circumstances fairly guaranteeing the declarant's sincerity and accuracy it is obvious that the situation guarantees the correctness of whatever he may say while under that influence. In other words the statement may be accepted not merely as to the specific fact against interest but also as to every fact contained in the same statement. Wigmore § 1462. The leading case on this subject is Higham v. Radgway, 10 East 109 (Vide supra) as for the limits which it thus becomes necessary to set, these must be largely a matter of judgment in each case. For the phrasing of a rough general test, different language has been used by different judges. In Percival v. Anson, 7 Exch 1 Pollock, C B said "If the entry is admitted as being against the interest of the party making it, it carries with it the whole statement." In R v. Er, 1 L R 4 Q B 344, Hayes J said "The principle that a declaration against interest was evidence as to all that formed an essential part of it was since settled." See also Stead v. Heaton, 4 T R 690, Doe v. Cartwright Ry & M 62, Davies v. Humphreys, 6 M & W 153, R v. Birmingham 1 R & M 763. In Smith v. Blaley L R 2 Q B 326, a very wide test is laid down by Blackburn J, where he said "It is admissible as evidence not merely of the precise fact which is against interest, but of all matters involved in or connected with the statement." In Doe v. Beers, 7 C B 504 the accounts of the store contained on one side items charging himself with the receipt of money and on the other side items discharging him by showing how the money received had been disbursed. The discharging entries were not admitted. Coleridge J said "The receiver has no interest in speaking falsely when he charges himself, but it is obviously his interest to falsify the account upon the discharging part of it. Where the charging part of the accounts refers to the discharging part it may be necessary to read the whole. So where the latter contains anything explanatory of the former that may render the whole admissible. But that is not the case here." In the same case Wille J said "It may be that a person in charging himself, makes a declaration which is intelligible without looking at the other side of the account, and in that case recourse must necessarily be had to both sides. But the items of discharge in the accounts in question which were not referred to in or necessary to explain the items of charge which were admitted and read were properly rejected. The presumption that those entries are false is at least as strong as the presumption that the others are true." Cresswell J said "If the discharging part of the account be necessarily resorted to for the purpose of explaining the charging part it may be evidence." Waterford, 1 Y & C Ex R 283 291 293, The Suffolk, 82 L T 389 The following test is suggested by Prof Wigmore "Going back to the living principle, a more useful test appears to be this. All parts of the speech or entry may be admitted which appear to have been made while the declarant was in the trustworthy condition of mind which permitted him to state what was against his interest. Thus being the fundamental principle, any reference to collateral records which amounts to a repetition or an incorporation of them would make them a part of the admissible statement. Entries made at a subsequent occasion when the original entries are complete, are clearly excluded. Doe v Tyler 4 Moo & P 381, Knight v Waterford 4 Y & C Ex R 283 (294)

In Reg v Overseer of Birmingham, 1 B & S 763=31 L J M C 65, Coeburn J observed "I should be prepared to say that as soon as it is established, which it now is on the authority of Higham v Ridgway supra and the other cases that you may receive the declaration of the deceased person as showing not only something adverse to his interest, but all incidental facts contained in that declaration, so far as they are not foreign to it, it follows as a consequence that those collateral facts may be proved by the declaration." In Davies v Humphreys 6 M & W 153, Parle J (afterwards Baron Parle) said "The entry of a payment against the interest of the party making it has been held to have the effect of proving the truth of other statements contained in the same entry and connected with it. The statement of a deceased person, so far as it is against the pecuniary or proprietary interest of that person, is admissible under sub-section (3), section 32 Evidence Act, not only against that person but also against persons mentioned or referred to therein, provided that the reference to such third persons is not foreign to that portion of the statement which is against the interest of the declarant. Although in cases of the above kind the whole statement of a deceased person is admissible in evidence the value which the Court will attach to such evidence will depend in each case upon a variety of circumstances. If the statement happens to be recorded in a document it must naturally possess greater value than when it depends upon the evidence of a witness who purports to have heard it. The Court in each case will also have to consider whether or not the statement in question bears on its face the appearance of truth, also the circumstances under which it came to be made and whether or not the deceased person had a motive in making it or an object in naming the particular person whom he charges with complicity in the crime in question. Mohammad v Emperor, 89 Ind Cas 252

"It is now, however, well settled that declarations of deceased persons against their interest, pecuniary or proprietary, are receivable not only to prove so much contained in them as is adverse to the interest but to prove collateral facts stated in them at all events so far as relates to facts which are not foreign to the declarations and may be taken to have formed a substantial part of them, see per Coeburn CJ in Reg v Birmingham Overseers, 1 B & S 763 where a parol declaration by the deceased father of a pauper's husband as to his occupation of a tenement as tenant at a certain rent was held admissible to prove the pauper's statement per Pollock CB in Milne v Leister 7 H & N 786 (795), Smith's Leading Cases, Vol II, 12th Ed at p 316

A statement made by a Hindu widow in a prior suit that she had mortgaged a property for raising a loan in connection with the performance of her husband's shraddh and other necessary expenses was admitted in evidence under section 3 (3) in a suit by the reversioners to recover the property, which the mortgagee had purchased in execution of a decree obtained on the mortgage. Held the whole statement should be taken as one and not split up making the former part alone admissible. Sita Ram v Khubla, 5 Pat 163=94 Ind Cas 13=7 Pat L T 573=A I R 1926 Pat 255

When the statement must be against interest. The fact stated must of course have been against interest at the time of the statement else the influence for correctness would not operate. Middleton v Melton, 10 B & C 317. In that case Littledale J said Warren v Greenhill 2 Str 1129 Darby v Belbington, 4 T R 514 and Higham v Ridgway, 10 East 109 establish this general principle, that where a person has peculiar means of knowing a fact, and makes a

S 32. declaration or written entry of that fact, which is against his interest at the time, it is evidence of the fact as between third persons after his death " In the same case Parke J observed "This case however, falls within the exception necessarily engrafted upon the rule, viz, that an admission of a fact made by a deceased person, which is against the interest of a party making it at the time, is evidence of that fact as between third persons " See also Percival v Hanson 7 Ex 1, per Parke B, Lalor v Lalor, 4 L R Ire 691, Ex parte Edwards, 11 Tollemache 14 Q B D 415 416, Smith v Blalcy, L R 2 Q B 396, Massey v Allen, 13 Ch D 326 The chief application of this rule was to the creditor's endorsement of payment on bonds or notes before the claim was time-barred. The creditor's receipt of payment, in part or in whole, was a fact against his interest, hence his memorandum endorsing upon the instrument the fact of his receipt of payment would be a statement of fact against interest, the fact of payment thus evidenced, would be by implication an acknowledgment (for a new promise) by the debtor, and thus would at common law suffice to give a new beginning to the period of the statute of limitations Wignmore § 1166, Searle v Lord Barrington, 2 Stra 826 The reason of this rule was thus stated by Gibson C J in Addams v Seitzinger, 1 W & S 244 "It is impossible to conceive of a motive for fabricating such a memorandum while the right of action remains unimpaired To suppose that a creditor would set about the commission of what is at least a moral forgery, to obviate the anticipated consequences of his own apprehended supineness when he might by bringing immediate suit prevent the occurrence of these consequences altogether is absurd " But these endorsements cannot be properly admitted unless they are proved to have been written at a time when the effect of them was clearly in contradiction to the writer's interest " Per Lord Ellenborough in Rox v Bryant 2 Camp 322 In Briggs v Wilson 5 De G M & G 12, the leading case on the subject, it was held that endorsement made after the Statute had run was not evidence and that the note was barred by the Statute See also Turner v Crisp 2 Str 827, Glyn v East of England, 2 Ves 43 Short v Lee, 2 Jak & W 488, Gleadow v Atkins, 3 Trench 301, Neubold v Smith 29 Ch D 877

When the declarant could not have had the slightest idea that he was going to be prosecuted, and so the conditions in his mind that are contemplated by sub section (3) were not in existence the statement could not be admitted under clause 3 of section 32 Agar Po v King Emperor, 7 L B R 33=20 In l (a) 90=14 Cr L J 510

Statement to be made Ante Litem Motam ' It is sometimes said that the statement (as in other hearsay exceptions) must have been made before litigation began But this is only saying that the declarant's partisan attitude during litigation must be regarded as counterbalancing the interest prejudiced by the statement This however might not be so in a given instance, and each case must be judged on its merits Wignmore § 1167, see also Whaley v Messerne 3 Tr Jur N S Phip Ev 3rd Ed 243

Statement may be verbal as well as written A statement according to this section as well as under the English law may be verbal as well as written a verbal statement of fact against interest is admissible R v Birmingham 31 L J M C 63, Beuley v Allinson 13 Ch D 283 Farmingham v Le 1 Bernard, 2 Pick 532 Lawrence v Kimball 1 Mete 527 The doubt on the point in the English case of Faulson v Clogg 10 M & W 572 never had any foundation In R v Birmingham supra Blackburn J said "Lastly is there any distinction in this respect between a written entry and entry proved by parol? I can see a great difference between them in weight, for a parol statement has in many cases no weight at all But, when the fact of a parol statement having been made is satisfactorily proved I cannot see any distinction as regards admissibility, between it and a written one and so no distinction is taken in the cases See also Jagnot v Hay 12 Ind Jur N S 39 If the statement is in writing it is not necessary that it should have been signed if it can be shown either that the body of it was written by the person whom it purports to charge (Barry v Debbington 41 R 514, Eccler v Warren [1844] 6 Q R) or that it has been adopted by that person, in whose handwriting it is

be (Doe v. Hawkins 2 Q. B. 212), and in the latter case it is not necessary, to call the agent who wrote it. Hills Et 2nd Ed p. 190 191

Contemporaneousness of entry Declarations against interest are admissible even when they are not made contemporaneously with the facts. Doe v. Truford, 3 B. & Ad. 890, Smith v. Blaley L. R. 2 Q. B. 326, Whaley v. Masserene, 8 Ir. Jur. N. S. 281

Personal Knowledge The qualifications of the declarant with reference to testimonial knowledge of the fact need not be as those of the ordinary witness. Crease v. Barret, 1 C. M. & R. 919, Perceval v. Vanson 7 Lx. 1, Tay § 669, Phelp 3rd Ed. 242. In Crease v. Barret, it was held "that it was not necessary that the deceased person should have his own knowledge of the fact stated,—that if the entry charged himself, the whole of it became admissible against all persons,—and that the absence of such knowledge went to the weight, and not to the admissibility of the evidence." See also H. v. Hanman 1 B. 610. Although the above case refers to clause (2), yet the reasoning is applicable to this clause as well. But in England the rulings on this point are by no means uniform. Vide Doe v. Robson, 15 East 34, Short v. Lee, 2 Jac. & W. 488, Barker v. Ry, 2 Russ. 76, Middleton v. Melton, 10 B. & C. 317, Gleadow v. Hains, 3 Tyrw. 302, Marks v. Lahee 3 Bing. N. C. 420, Perceval v. Vanson, 7 Ex. 1. In the above cases it was held that the declarant must be shown to have had a competent if not a peculiar knowledge of the facts, which form the subject matter of the declaration. Tay § 669. But the statement must distinctly support the fact of which it is offered as an assertion. Wigmore § 1471. In Haddou v. Parry, 3 Trunt. 303, a bill of lading signed "contents unknown" was rejected as being in effect no declaration of what the chest contained. Similarly, in Doe v. Longfield, 16 M. & W. 514 the assertion of an estate 'by life interest' only was regarded as ambiguous and inadmissible. See also Plaxton v. Dare, 10 B. & C. 19, Doe v. Berton, 9 C. & P. 254.

Extrinsic Proof Extrinsic proof must be given of the declarant's death (unless it is presumable from the lapse of time) or other circumstances which necessitate the admission of such evidence. In cases of written entry it must be shown to have been executed by the person alleged to be the declarant. In Short v. Lee, 2 Jac. & W. 467, Plumer M. R. said. "In all these cases (of books by bulk, &c.) the first point is to prove the character of the individual who wrote them; if you fail in this they cannot be evidence." Wigmore § 1472, Phelp 3rd Ed. 243, see also Doe v. Lord Phelp, 10 Ex. 209, Mauby v. Curtis 1 Price 228, Bullen v. Michel 2 Price 427, Baron de Rutzen v. Fro 4 & E. 56, Doe v. Briss 7 C. B. 486. Either the signature or the body of the entry must be in the handwriting of the declarant, but it is not necessary that it should be in his handwriting as well as signed by him. Wigmore § 1472. In Barny v. Babbington 4 T. R. 514, Kennyon L. C. J. said. "If the entry be not in the handwriting of the steward, it must be signed by him; but here all these entries were written by the steward himself." See also Doe v. Stary 6 C. & P. 139. Where it is written by another on behalf of the declarant, it must be proved that it was authorized or adopted by the deceased. Lancum v. Lovell, 6 C. & P. 437, Bradley v. Jones 13 C. B. 822, Doe v. Hawkins, 2 Q. B. 812, Phelp 3rd Ed. 243. Where, however, the document is thirty years old and produced from proper custody, its authenticity is presumed. Wynne v. Tyrkett, 4 B. & Ald. 376. A declarant's death may be presumed after a lapse of the required number of years. Hart v. Moro 11 B. 89.

Moreover if the declarant purport to charge himself as the agent, steward or receiver of another, it is necessary in addition to give some proof that he really occupied an alleged position, except (i) where the agency is a public one or (ii) perhaps where the entries are ancient, produced from proper custody, and bear strong internal evidence of genuineness. (Tays 683, Phelp Et. 244)

Declarations against interest—Admissions Declarations against interest must not be confused with admissions or confessions. They are received upon totally different principles. As has already been stated, admission and confessions are waivers of proof. Declarations against interest, on the contrary, are admitted as direct evidence of the fact declared. They are the testimony possession of certain properties on the ground that she had no right to them, her husband having died an undivided member. The widow set up a division and relied inter alia, on a mortgage executed by her deceased husband and attested by the plaintiffs containing a receipt to the effect that the mortgagor was in possession of the properties. Held that the attestation by the co-shrivers was an acknowledgment that they had no right in the property alienated and that it was admissible in evidence as a statement against interest under s 32 of the Evidence Act. Gnanamuthu v Telu Kanda, 19 L W 191=79 Ind Cas 2= A I R 1924 Mad 542. A statement made by a deceased sapinda as to the circumstances under which he received a sum of money in connection with the adoption is admissible as made against his pecuniary or proprietary interest under s 32(3) of the Evidence Act. Danapati v Batsundara, 36 W 19=18 Ind Cas 989. The varanaprata in this case was admissible not only under section 32 clause (3) of the Indian Evidence Act, but also by declaration made by the widow against her proprietary interest, but also by reason of s 90 of the Act. Hari Chintaman v Moro Lal shman, 11 B 59. In a suit for account by the representations of a deceased, evidence was adduced of a document purporting to be a copy made by the deceased of an account furnished him by the defendant containing an entry of a payment of Rs. 5,000 by the deceased to the defendant, and the purchase by the defendant of the company's paper for the deceased. Held that by itself the document was inadmissible. But when further evidence was given by a witness that the deceased had stated to him that the document was a correct statement of his account with the defendant, held that such evidence was admissible and that with the addition of this evidence the document also was admissible as containing one entry by the defendant against his interest. Zaynub v Hadjee, 2 Ind Tur N S 54. Where the question, whether there was partition between the ancestors of the parties or not, is in issue, the statements made by the deceased ancestors of the parties that there was partition are admissible in evidence as they are statements against proprietary interest of the persons making them. Jairam v Aarollam, A I R 1929 Nag 131.

A landlord purchased the holding of this tenant at a sale in execution of a decree for money obtained by him against the tenant. In the sale certificate the area of the holding was 20 bighas in all. Held, that statement by the landlord that the tenant held under him 20 bighas of land was not a statement in his own favour but one against his proprietary interest within the meaning of this clause. Manil Bhusas v Maharaja Joginba Nath, 24 Ind Cas 283. When no other evidence is adduced in a case except the written admission in pleadings, which admissions are relevant under section 19 or section 32(3) of the Evidence Act, it is advisable that such record should be marked as exhibit and then referred to as evidence in the judgment of the Court. Ayyaru v Nanayappa, 20 Ind Cas 792=25 M L J 329. A road cess return filed by a Hindu widow is admissible in favour of the reversionary heir under section 32 clause (3). Lalram v Jagmohan, 18 C L J 633. A statement made by a deceased sapinda as to the circumstances under which he received a sum of money in connection with the adoption is admissible as made against his pecuniary or proprietary interest under s 32(3) of the Evidence Act. Danuloti v Batsundara, 36 M 19=18 Ind Cas 989.

Declarations held not admissible under this clause. An admission made by a bankrupt in his statement of affairs that a debt is due from him, is not after his death admissible in evidence against his assignee in bankruptcy of the estate of the debt, merely because it might turn out that there was a surplus after paying the creditors. Eduard Et parte, 14 Q B D 415. Revell Et parte, 13 Q B D 720. On a question relating to the rent paid for a particular property, a statement as to receipts from an agent, signed by a deceased principal is as being against interest, equally admissible in evidence with a statement by a deceased agent as to receipts from a tenant. But a rent roll signed by a deceased solicitor who was paid to audit the accounts by testing the arithmetic but not by examining with you as to the truth as to alleged payments, is not admissible in evidence either on the general ground of pecuniary interest, or on the general ground of the audit having been made in the ordinary course of business. Vivian v Moat, 44 L T 210. Entries made by a deceased attorney are not evidence of business done

The Lower Appellate Court enlarged the counter-claim. Held that neither the Will nor the memo was admissible under s 32, as as much as statements in the Will made by the deceased that he had spent a particular sum in effecting the repairs of the house was not a statement made against his pecuniary or proprietary interest and it could not be held that the memo was made in the ordinary course of business. Hari Vaidya v Ambabai 41 Bom 192 = 22 Bom L R 57 = 55 Ind C 316 The declaration of a deceased person to the effect that he had destroyed a Will which gave him a life interest in certain free hold property, was admitted as being prima facie against the presumption arising from his possession of it of his being the free-holder although on a full examination of all the facts it would appear that the declaration was actually to his advantage because apart from the existence of a Will, he in fact took interest in the property. Denton v Powell 91 L J P 209 = (1922) P 211 = 127 L T 528 A statement by a deceased landlord that there was a tenant in the land is a statement against the landlord's proprietary rights and is not admissible under cl 3 s 32. Abdul Aziz v Ebrahim 31 C 96 Where the question was whether certain properties in possession of the defendants were ancestral or self-acquired so as to be chargeable with the maintenance of the plaintiff, a statement by a person who gave the defendants a share in the properties in her possession on the ground that they also mixed their family properties with hers, is evidently against her interest and as such admissible under section 32 clause (3). Mandan v Mandan 11 Ind C 380 = 1911 M W 1 The evidence of a deceased person in a proceeding under the Land Revenue Act would be admissible in evidence under section 32 (3) where the statement was against the pecuniary or proprietary interest of the deponent even if the suit which related solely to a question of title. Shymanand v Rama A C 6 (Revised G A L J 374 = 9 C L J 497 P C) In a suit for possession of certain lands as plaintiff's nistar brahmatter on behalf of the plaintiff's Will of the purchaser of the title was produced showing the recital of the title. Held that the recital of brahmatter title in the Will was not sufficient

Statement as regards boundary. In Rajah Leelanand v. Mt. Lakhaputee, 22 W R 231, it was held that a mortgage deed is a statement against the proprietary interest of the person making it and therefore a statement in a mortgage deed that so much rent was payable on the property, was also a statement admissible in evidence. It is difficult to see how this argument could be founded on section 32, and possibly the learned Judges considered themselves governed by Act II of 1857. In Vingana v. Bharmappa 23 B 63 the above case was followed and it was held that a mortgage is against the proprietary interest of the executant, and therefore a statement of boundary in the mortgage was admissible. This view was dissented from by the Madras High Court in R. Puthipanni Narayana, (1910) M W N 668=8 Ind Cas 268=9 M L J 91 and S. Venkataraya v. Narasimha, (1911) M W N 779=26 Ind Cas 747. Under this clause it is the statement not the document which must be against the proprietary interest of the person making it. Parties making statements which are not in it rival to their interests have no occasion to be accurate. It is for this reason that statements to be admissible must be against the interest of the person making the same. It cannot be said that a statement of boundaries is against the proprietary interest of the person making it except on the assumption that every person must be presumed to own the universe until he makes a statement circumstriling his title. On the contrary a person may be presumed to own nothing until he brings into existence an effective deed with the boundaries stated therein and as such it is a document not against but in favour of his proprietary interest. Karuppanna v. Ilanga Suami, 107 Ind Cas 293=A I R 1928 Mad 105. But in different view was taken by the Calcutta High Court in recent cases. So according to that High Court where the executant of a document containing recitals of boundaries of other lands is dead, such documents are admissible under section 32. Sheikh Kelabuddin v. Nasar Chandra, A I R 1927 Cal 230=11 C L J 582=99 Ind Cas 907. In that case Mt. Justice B B Ghose said: "That such documents are admissible under s 32 of the Evidence Act has been held in a long line of cases in different Courts in India. There is a question whether under the English law a statement in such document would be admissible. It is unnecessary to cite any English case other than the leading case of Higham v. Hildgum, 2 Sm L C 307=10 Lnst 109. Whether such evidence is admissible under the Evidence Act was considered in favour of its admissibility in several cases the earliest of which is Leelanand Singh v. Mt. Lakhaputee, 22 W R 231. This case was elaborately discussed and followed in the case of Ningana v. Bharmappa, 23 B 63, which again was followed in the Bombay High Court in case of Haji Bibi v. H H San Sultan Mohamed Sha 11 Bom L R 409=2 Ind Cas 874, and in our Court in the case of Ibduallah v. Kunj Behary Lal, 16 C W N 252=14 C L J 467. The cases were followed in Allahabad in the case of Nattar v. Allur, 11 A L J 139=18 Ind Cas 752 and all these cases were subsequently followed in this Court in Innari Chaman v. Sirdhari Panley 15 C L J 7=13 Ind Cas 120=17 C W N 108 and in the case of Ambur Ali v. Lutfie Ali, 45 C 159=21 C W N 996=41 Ind Cas 116=25 C L J 619. It is contended however, by the learned advocate for the appellants that section 32 of the Evidence Act does not really apply to statements in such documents and his contention is supported by the case in Pramatha Nath Chaudhari v. Krishna Chandra, A I R 1924 Cal 1067=28 C W N 1092. The other cases cited by him do not really touch the question. In the case of Soraj Kumari Ichari v. Umed Ali A I R 1922 Cal 251 which is purported to have been followed in the case of Ladha Krishna v. Sarbeswar Naq A I R 1925 Cal 681 and in the case of Choom Lal v. Nilmadhab A I R 1925 Cal 1031, the question of admissibility of such a document under s 32 of the Evidence Act has not at all been considered. See also Iromotha Nath v. Rajah Bejoy Singh,

In Rajah Leelawund v. M. Lalipatie, 22 W R 231, the question before the Court was whether the rent payable to the zemindar by the Ghatual during a certain period was Rs 75 or Rs 175. The zemindar relied upon a statement prepared by the then zemindar many years previously, of the Ghatual villa. in the mehal, in which there was a recital against the name of the property in question that the original rent was so much and the increased rent was so much. Mr Justice Markby held that this statement was inadmissible. He said "I cannot bring it under any of the rules of evidence which allow a statement of a deceased person to be put in evidence. It does not appear to me to be a statement in any way detrimental to his interest. On the contrary so far as regard the rate of rent, of course it would be his interest to state it to be as high as possible." It is clear that the view of law taken by Mr Justice Markby, is consonant with the principle underlying this clause. There is absolutely no warrant to the trustworthiness of such a statement. Nevertheless on appeal Lord C J and Justice J, said "We cannot concur in the opinion of the learned Judge that this statement was not admissible in evidence. It is a statement in which the interest in the mehal of the person making it is reduced or affected. It is against his interest and against his proprietary right. The effect of it is to cut down the proprietary right, to subject it to the tenure or incumbrance which is mentioned. It is true that in one part of it there is what may be said to be in favour of his interest but in his favour, namely the amount of the original rent and increased rent payable by him. But when a document of this kind is introduced in evidence it is not to be divided into parts, and the part which is in favour of the person making it rejected and that which is against his interest accepted. The question is, whether taking the document as a whole, it is against the interest of the proprietary right of the person making it. In estimating the value of any particular part of it that may be looked at, but the principle upon which the admissibility of it is determined is whether it has been made under such circumstances as makes it reasonable to suppose that it was done bona fide and the statements are true. This judgment has already been criticised at the beginning of the part. To give this clause a proper interpretation, statements contained in a document must be distinguished from the document itself. Moreover as has been pointed out by Prof Wigmore in order to make a declaration admissible under this section the fact contained in a statement and not the statement for less the document containing the statement, must be against the interest of the declarant. The fact contained in the statement is that the rent is Rs 175 and not 75 which is not against the interest of the declarant but in his favour. In the circumstances there was nothing to impeach the judgment of Mr Justice Markby. The case reported in 22 W R 231 was followed in 23 B 63 and the latter in 11 Bom L R 409=2 Ind Cas 874 without any discussion on principle. But following the decision in 22 W R 231 a Bench of the Calcutta High Court consisting of Moorjerjee J. and Carnduff J. extended the rule even in the case of recitals of boundaries in the deeds of sales as well. Abdullah v. Amu Bhatti 1 C W N 252=12 Ind Cas 149=11 C L J 467. In delivering the judgment the Court observed "Now the statement in these deeds that the transfer was made of the land conveyed or mortgaged and that he was either extinguishing his interest in the land by an absolute sale or placing a restriction on it by way of a mortgage was undoubtedly one against the pecuniary or proprietary interest of the person making it. Consequently the statement as a whole would be admissible in evidence. In Natuar v. Alkhu 11 C L J 139=18 Ind Cas 722 the Court followed 23 B 63 and 16 C W N 252 without assigning any reason. In Chand Charmar v. Siddhar Pandey 17 C W N 108=15 C L J 7, it was held that a recital as to the boundary of a land in a lease was admissible in evidence if the person who was no party to that document. In Imbora v. Luffe 45 C 159=21 C W N 996=25 C L J 619 a new reason of such a statement being thus stated by Mr Justice Mookerjee. "The statement by the vendors that the land then conveyed was limited by certain boundaries was an admission that their proprietary interest did not extend over any land outside the boundaries."

mentioned. The entire statement was, consequently, admissible (Higham v. Ridgway, 10 E. L. 109; Conner v. Idjrali, 11 L. R. Ir. 106; Percival v. Nanson L. R. 2 Q. B. 326, and R. v. Fitter L. R. 4 Q. B. 341). The principle is that the statement is accepted not merely as to the specific fact against the interest, but also as to every fact contained in the statement." See also Kangali v. Bai 31 Ind. Cas. 534. But in Pramatha Nath Choudhury v. Krishna Chandra, 28 C. W. N. 1092 = A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 1067 Greaves J. dissenting from Abdullah v. Kuny Behari, 16 C. W. N. 252 observed: "But with great respect to that learned Judge (Mr. Justice Moolerjee) the reasoning by which he arrives at this view does not seem to me at all conclusive and I find great difficulty in seeing how a mere description of boundaries in a document between third parties can be said to be a statement against the proprietary interest of the person making it. It may well be that, for some ulterior purpose boundaries may not be correctly described in a document and if this is so, how a statement of that nature can be said to be against the proprietary interest of the person making it, it is some what difficult to ascertain." This view is supported by the following observation of Sir Richard Garth in Brojessuar v. Budhanudha, 6 C. 268, where the learned Chief Justice observed: "A recital in a deed or other instruments is in some cases conclusive, and in all cases evidence as against the parties who make it. But it is no more evidence as against third persons than any other statement would be." See also Brojomohan v. Gaya Prasad, 30 C. W. N. 761; Choom v. Nulmudhab, 41 C. L. J. 374; Radha v. Sonbeswar, 29 C. W. N. 469.

It has already been stated that any declaration made by one who is in possession of any description of hereditament tending to limit his interest therein to any less estate than the whole fee simple is admissible in evidence after his death as a statement against his proprietary interest. Wills Ev. 192. And a fortiori if it shows that he has no interest in the land whatever. Ibid. This is based on the well known rule of law, that a person in possession of land is presumed until the contrary appears, to be the owner thereof in fee simple. Grey v. Redman, 1 Q. B. D. 161; Grease v. Barrett 1 C. M. & R. 931. The rule therefore is not applicable where the declaration simply relates to the limits of the land occupied by the declarant, since there is nothing to show that it is more against his interest to deny his possession of one close than it is to assert his possession of another. Grease v. Barrett, 1 C. M. & R. 919; Wills Ev. 2nd Ed. 193; Phup Li 5rd Ed. 246. The view that such a statement made by a person cannot be made admissible in evidence against a stranger is supported by the principle of the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Shrinivas Das v. Meher Bai, 49 I. A. 36 = 41 B. 300 = 21 C. W. N. 558. So the statement by a person since dead that certain lands lie on the boundary of the land forming the subject matter of the document cannot be regarded as having been against the pecuniary or proprietary interest of the person making it within the meaning of section 32 (3) of the Evidence Act and is consequently inadmissible in evidence. Kumud Kumari v. Dilsool Roy, 101 Ind. Cas. 512 = 45 C. L. J. 138, see also Dandapani In re, 8 Ind. C. 258, contra Lalu Singh v. Sahadeo Singh, 36 Ind. Cas. 610.

CLAUSE IV

Principle. The grounds of admission of such evidence are (1) death or other inability (2) necessity, ancient facts being generally incapable of direct proof and (3) the guarantee of truth afforded by the public nature of the rights, which tends to preclude individual bias, and to render misstatements difficult by exposing them to constant contradiction. Phup Ev. 257.

Death or other inability. That such declarations are admissible in evidence in case of death is well established. In the Berkeley Peerage Case 4 Camp. 415, Mansfield C. J. said: "The declarations of deceased persons, who are supposed to have had a personal knowledge of the facts and to have stood quite disinterested, are received in evidence. In case of general rights, which depend upon immemorial usage, living witnesses can only speak of their own knowledge to what has passed in their own time, and to supply the deficiency, the law receives the declarations of those who are dead" Similarly in R v Bedfordshire, 4 E & B 535, Lord Campbell C J said "The admissibility of the declarations of deceased persons in such cases is sanctioned, because these rights and liabilities are generally of ancient and obscure origin, and may be acted on only at distant intervals of time, direct proof of their existence therefore ought not to be required"

The Necessity principle The necessity is here to be found in the general dearth of other satisfactory evidence of the desired fact, by reason of which they are thrown back upon reputation as a source of information. In the exception for land boundaries and customs this necessity is found to exist where the matter is an ancient one, and thus living witnesses are not to be had. Wigmore § 1508

Circumstantial guarantee of truth The third requisite is that such declarations must guarantee a fair degree of trustworthiness. In Wright v Tait, 47 A & E 358 on appeal 5 Cl & F 720, Coltman J asked "Where boundary is proved by reputation what is the guarantee for sincerity?" Mr Salk (counsel) answered "The publicity of the transaction and the general interest in the fact being rightly ascertained." Coltman J said "The principle on which I conceive the exception (of reputation as to public rights) to rest is this,—that the reputation can hardly exist without the concurrence of many parties interested to investigate the subject, and such concurrence is presumptive evidence of the existence of an ancient right, of which in most cases direct proof can no longer be given." In the same case Alderson B said "There are, no doubt, exceptions to this rule, in which hearsay evidence is admissible. One such exception is to be found in the case of public rights. There the general interest which belongs to the subject would lead to immediate contradiction from others, unless the statement proved were true, and the publicity of the nature of the right excludes the probability of individual bias and makes the sanction of an oath less necessary." This principle is very lucidly explained by Mr Justice Loomis in South West v Williams, 18 Conn 507, where he observed "The law does not dispense with the sanction of an oath and the tests of credibility examination is a prerequisite for the admission of verbal testimony, and it discovers in the nature of the case some other sanction or test deemed equivalent for ascertaining the truth. The matters included in the class under consideration are such that many persons are deemed cognizant of them and interested in their truth, so that there is neither the ability nor the temptation to misrepresent that exists in other cases, and the matters are presumably the subject of frequent discussion and criticism which accomplishes in a manner the purpose of cross-examination. After passing such an ordeal, it is reasonably safe to receive the result as an established fact." Wigmore § 158. So the guarantee of credibility consists in the concurrence of a large number of persons, all interested in it, and therefore, likely to ascertain the truth of an opinion which, if untrue, would be surely challenged. Will Es 2nd Ed 222 Wright v Doe, 7 A & F 313 in H L 4 Bing N C 459 R v Bedfordshire, 4 E & B 535

Origin of the Rule At the time of the definite emergence of the hearsay rule—that is by the end of the 1600s there remained in existence a more or less loose of receiving the reports of the community on various matters. At that time, the jury's traditional resort to common reputation as a source of its knowledge was still a rural practice. It can be seen that it was understood that the exclusion when offered in evidence of a reputation was otherwise known of it by the jury. The jury could in any case have considered the statement of a person as to the facts of the case. But with the growth of the Hearsay rule, the limits, and the doctrine that the statement of a person is not admissible as evidence in Court unless it is given by a person who is a party to the case, and the doctrine that the statement of a person is not admissible as evidence in Court unless it is given by a person who is a party to the case, the Courts clearly picked up their own reputation to be of value in the matter.

Scope of the Section "Evidence is to be admitted from old persons of what they have heard other persons, of the same neighbourhood, who are deceased say respecting the right Wechs v Sparks, 1 M & S 680 "The law of England lays down the rule that, on the trial of issues of fact before a jury hearsay evidence is to be excluded, as the jury might often be misled by it, but makes exceptions where a relaxation of the rule tends to the due investigation of truth and the attainment of justice. One of the questions relates to matters of public and general interest. But the relaxation has not been and ought not to be extended to questions relating to matters of mere private interest, for respecting these direct proof may be given, and no trustworthy reputation is likely to arise. We must remark, however, that although a private interest should be involved with a matter of public interest, the reputation respecting rights and liabilities affecting classes of the community cannot be excluded or this relaxation of the rule against the admission of hearsay evidence would often be found unavailing.

If the question were whether a bridge be a public bridge, which the public have a right to use and the country is bound to repair, there seems to be no doubt that evidence of reputation would be admissible, and there seems to be no reason for following a different course where the question is, whether the country or an individual is bound to repair. Here the private liability of the individual comes in but the question of the liability of the country remains' Per Lord Campbell C J in R v Bedfordshire, 4 E & B 535 "The exceptions to the general rule excluding hearsay evidence, which permit the introduction of reputation or tradition, or of declarations of persons deceased, as to matters of public or general interest, or questions of pedigree, do not extend to a question of private boundary, in which no considerable number of persons have a legal interest" Per Gray J in Hall v Mayo 97 Mass 416, Green v Chelsea 24 Pick 80, Dumarchen v Llewellyn 15 Q B 791, Quecn v Bedfordshire, 4 E & B 535

The best way to prove ancient rights is to prove particular acts and usages, as far back as living memory goes, and then adduce evidence of reputation in regard to the preceding time Anglesea v Hatherton, 10 M & W 218, 239. It is not however essential to the admissibility of reputation that there should be any evidence of modern user, the absence of it only affects the weight, not the admissibility of such evidence Cease v Barret, 1 C M & R 919, 930, Dumarchen v Llewellyn, 1 Q B 791 (804), Wills Ex 229

This clause permits proof to be given of a statement of a deceased person that in his family or in the subdivision of the estate to which he belonged such and such a custom obtained of the existence of which that person would have been likely to be aware but it does not seem to permit evidence to be given of a statement by such a person that on a particular occasion the custom was followed Parbati v Chandra Pal 8 O C 94 (104). It is admissible evidence for a witness to give his opinion on the existence of a family custom, and to state, as the grounds of that opinion information derived from deceased persons. But, it must be the expression of an independent opinion based on hearsay and not mere repetition of hearsay Gururu Ithaya v Suparamduaya, 23 A. 37=10 M L J (P C) 267=5 C W N 33=27 I A 238=2 Bom L R 831

Statement Such statements may come in the shape of individual assertions, provided they genuinely purport to represent reputation, and many other forms are to be recognized in the precedents. For example the official return of an assembly of the tenants of a manor rehearsing customs, fees, and the like was always regarded as equivalent to a reputation among the tenants, and as such is always receivable Goodwin v Spray, 1 F R 473, Bubee v Parker 5 T R 14. So also maps of parish boundaries prepared from information of old men are also receivable R v Milton 1 C & K 62, Wignmore § 1592 see also Alcock v Cool, cited 1 Ph Ev 251 N 1 but see Pollard v Scott Pea R 19. The same rule is applicable in the case of old surveys Bullen v Michel, 4 Dow 297, Smith v Earl Brownlow L R 2 Eq 252, Pouke v Berrington (1914) 2 Ch 308. Map prepared by or by the direction of persons interested in the matter may also be received Hammond v Bradstreet 10 Ex 390 Pipe v Fulcher, 1 E & E 111. Copies of Court rolls can also be admitted under this section Plaxton v Dare, 10 B & C 17. So also deeds and leases, between private

S. 32. persons may, in a given case just effectually be the vehicle of reputation. Duke of Newcastle v Brontoue, 5 B & Ald 273, Sasser v Harring, 3 Dev L 312, White v Leslie, 1 Modd 223, Cooms v Coethen, 1 M & M 399, Brett v Beale 1 M & M 418. The verdict of a jury may also amount to a reputation. In Reed v Jackson, 1 East 357 Lawrence J said "Reputation would have been evidence as to the right of way in this case, a fortiori, therefore, the finding of twelve men upon their oaths." But now there is no justification of admission of such verdict on the ground of reputation in as much as it is 'relic of the time when a jury's verdict was a conclusion upon their own knowledge' Thayer Case 1st Ed 422, Wigmore § 1593. Similarly in Pim v Curell 6 M & W 234 Alderson B said "That was when the jury was summoned de vicineto and their functions were less limited than at present." In Brisco v Lomax, 8 A & E 211 Littledale J said "It is not reputation, but it is as good evidence as reputation." So also Patterson J said "Now it is certainly difficult to say that a verdict can be received merely as evidence of reputation for a jury are summoned from the country at large, and are not themselves likely to know of the matter." Yet where the matter has been before a jury, the verdict is generally given in evidence as a sort of reputation. See also Neill v Duke of Devonshire, L R 8 App Cas 147, Wigmore § 1593. Similarly judgments, decrees, and orders of Courts and similar bodies, if final, are admissible as evidence of reputation. Step Day Ex At 30. But here also the persons acting as Judges had no knowledge of the fact except what they derived in the course of that proceeding. Rogers v Wood 2 B & Ald 256 Evans v Rees 10 A & E 155 but see Duke of Newcastle v Brontoue, 4 B & Ald 279. Under this section a statement may be either written or verbal. The absence of reputation is the fact that no one in the region had ever heard of this right, custom, or boundary being as alleged should be admissible as a negative reputation. Drinl water v Porter, 2 C- & K 182, Angley v Hatherton, 10 M & W 239, Wigmore § 1595.

Declarations as to public or general interest. In proof of public or general rights or customs or matters of public or general interest statements made by deceased persons of competent knowledge as to existence of such rights, etc. and as to the general reputation thereof in the neighbourhood if made ante litem motam are admissible. Such statements are known as declarations as to public and general rights. Cockle Cas 213. In Weels v Sparke, 1 M & S 690 Bayly J said "I take it that where the term 'public right' is used, it does not mean 'public' in the literal sense, but is synonymous with general,—that is what concerns a multitude of persons." In the same case Dampier J said "In public rights it is not disputed that reputation is admissible, and that it has been extended to other rights which cannot be strictly called public such as manors, parishes and a modus, which comes the nearest to this case. That strictly speaking is a private right, but has been considered as public as regards the admissibility of this species of evidence, because it affects a large number of occupiers within a district. The above case is generally taken as the leading case, which for the first time laid down the law clearly although it has been disapproved of on the point whether the right in question was public or private. Cockle Cas 213. "Sometimes the word 'public' means the public at large some times it means a section of the public such as tenants of a manor, or the conventional tenants in the district of Cornwall mentioned in Rouge v Benton 8 B & C 77." Per Vaughan Williams L J in Mercer v Denne, (1905) 2 Ch 638 at p 641. Public rights are those in which all the subjects of the King are interested, as for instance rights of highway (Read v Jackson 1 East 355 R v Bliss 7 A & E 550) of taking tolls on the highway (Brett v Beale, M & M 416) of landing ships on river bank (Drinl water v Porter 7 C & P 181), of using ports (Sailing Ship v Hickie 15 Q. B D nt p 595) ferries and the like. General rights are those in which some class of the community has a common interest, as for example those which are based on the customs of manors (Doe v Session 12 East, 62, Crease v Barrett 1 C M & R 919) parishes (Berry v Banner Per 156, Evans v Mathew [1899] 1 Ch 241) or cities (Layborn v Crisp 4 M & W 320) or which are connected with the boundaries of countries (Evans v Rees, 10 A & E 111) hamlets (Thomas v Julius 6 A & E 525) and manors and ancient districts of manors (Burnes v Maunson, 1 M & S 77), Wills Ex 2nd Ed 222.

The question next arises, about what sorts of matters my reputation be received as trustworthy. The principle already examined prescribes the answer, —that the matter must be in its nature one about which a trustworthy common reputation could fairly arise, about which an active, constant and intelligent discussion by the members of a community would result in a residuum of fairly trustworthy conclusions. As a rough and ready test we must say that the matter should be one of public or general or public and general interest and this is the common phrasing, though it varies loosely. But this is still only a rule of thumb. To decide difficult cases it is necessary still to seek the living principle and ask anew whether the matter is of such general interest to the community that by the thorough sifting of active, constant and intelligent discussion a fairly trustworthy reputation is likely to arise. Wigmore 1586, see also R v Antioch 2 A & E 793, R v Bedfordshire, 4 E & B 535. Declarations made ante litem motam by persons who are now dead in respect of a question relating to a matter of general or public interest even if they be no more than evidence of reputation or hearsay evidence, are admissible. Busold v Neufay, A I R 1929 Ctl 533.

Interest "The term 'interest' here does not mean that which is interesting, from gratifying curiosity or a love of information or amusement but that in which a class of the community have a pecuniary interest or some interest by which their legal rights or liabilities are affected." Per Lord Campbell, C J in Queen v Bedfordshire, 4 E & B 535.

Opinion What is offered must be in effect a reputation not the mere assertion of an individual. But reputation includes and is often learned through the assertions of individuals, it is therefore constantly necessary to distinguish between (a) assertions involving mere individual credit and (b) assertions involving a community reputation. The common form of question put to a reputation witness was "What have you heard old men, now deceased, say as to the reputation on this subject?" Thus, though in form the information may be merely what deceased persons have been heard to say about a custom yet in effect it comes or ought to come from them as a statement of reputation. Wigmore § 1584, see also Davies v Morgan, 1 C & J 590, Drinkwater v Porter, 2 C & K 182, Earl of Camarion v Villebois, 13 M & W 332, Brochebaul v Thompson, (1903) 2 Ch 344, 352. The Judges constantly speak of "reputation from deceased persons." But 'reputation' is no other than the hearsay of those who may be supposed to have been acquainted with the fact braded down from one to another. Higham v Ridgway 10 East 120. So in such a case it is usual to 'admit the evidence what old persons who are deceased have been heard to say on those occasions.' Per Le Blanc J in Weeks v Sparke, 1 M & E 679. In Uxter v Dene (1904) 2 Ch 534, the suit was for enforcing fishing right. In that case depositions taken in 1639 under an information by the Attorney General stating the point to which the sea extended was excluded. In rejecting the evidence Farwell J observed at p 543 "I am of opinion that these depositions are not admissible. I will assume that this was in the nature of a public right which the Crown was attempting to enforce. The question is whether the depositions of witnesses taken in that suit are admissible in the present case on the question to what point the sea extended. The depositions of deceased witnesses in other actions are admissible against strangers amongst other cases if they relate to a custom where reputation would be evidence, but then those depositions must be depositions of matters of reputation and not of matters of fact. It appears to me to be well settled by authorities that reputation as to the existence of particular facts is rejected," see also Ireland v Pouell, cited in Reg v Bliss 7 Ad & E 555. In Ireland v Pouell, supra, the question was whether a turnpike stood within limits of a town and though evidence of reputation was received to show that the town extended to a certain point yet declarations by old people since dead that those houses formerly stood where none any longer remained were rejected on the ground that those statements were evidence of a particular fact. In Mercer v Denne (1905) 2 Ch 338 on appeal from (1904) 2 Ch 344 352 the decision of Farwell J was affirmed, see also Att Gen v Horner, (1913) 2 Ch 140 (152), Fourke v Berington (1914) 2 Ch 308. So the reputation must be general. So the hearsay statement "I know the right and custom to be such and such" is not receivable, but I

S. 32. understand the general acceptance of the custom by the community to be such and such" is admissible. The deceased individual declarant is merely the mouthpiece of the reputation. Whenever, therefore, individual declarations are offered they must appear to be in the words of Baron Wood, "the result of a received reputation." Wigmore § 1584. In Moseley v Davies 11 Price 150, Wood B said: "It must be proved that the declaration establishing the reputation and the acts done (by the community) in consequence were the result of a received reputation." The principle use of evidence of this sort is to show that the act done or declaration made was not a new thought adopted to serve some particular occasion, but the consequence of a received notion of the existence of a custom requiring the performance of the act, and accounting for or explaining it by such declaration. Such evidence should always be general. In R v Bliss 7 A & E 550 Coleridge J said: "It is a rule that evidence of reputation must be confined to general matters and not touch particular facts." In the same case Denman, L C J said: "He does not assert that he has heard old people say what was the public road, but he plants a tree and asserts that the boundary of the road is at that point. It is the mere allegation of a fact by an individual. That is he knew it to be so from what he had himself observed, and not from reputation." So if the declaration should merely express the declarant's own opinion it would obviously not comply with the definition of reputation. In order to do this it should not only be a declaration of one of the members of that body whose common opinion makes the reputation current in their day but should also express the current opinion of himself and all others who are similarly interested. But if the declarant's circumstances were such that he was apparently competent to testify as to what the common report upon the subject was, it will be presumed, till the contrary is shown, that his utterance was an expression of opinion common both to himself and others. Not only the declaration reports the common report as opposed to individual opinion, but this common report or reputation must assert not particular or individual facts tending to prove or disprove the right, but a general conclusion as to the existence of the right itself. It must be, so to speak, a general verdict not only of all the persons, but also to general effect of all the facts. Wills Ev 2nd Ed pp 224, 225. Berkeley Perry v Case 4 Cym 411, 415. See also Crease v Barrett, 1 C M & R 925, Drinkwater v Porter 7 C & P 181. But in Barraclough v Johnson, 8 A & E 99, Lord Denman C J said: "I do not agree that it is necessary for persons giving an opinion as to the publicity of a way to state that they found themelves on reputation, although these statements ought in reality to be founded on some reputation. The statement of each of the deceased persons was reputation to some extent." In R v Berger, (1891) 1 Q B 823, Cave J said: "The authorities establish that, although hearsay evidence is good evidence of reputation in matters of public interest it is not good evidence of particular facts from which an inference of fact may be drawn in respect of individual rights."

Opinion must be of competent person. The reputation to be admissible must obviously have been formed among a class of persons who were in a position to have sound sources of information and to constitute intelligently the formation of the reputation. Wigmore § 1591. In Weeks v Sparks 1 M & S 698 Le Blanc J said: "And the only evidence of reputation which was received was that from persons connected with the district. The rule is generally adopted upon questions either of prescription or custom is that, after a foundation is once laid of the right of proving acts of ownership, the evidence of reputation becomes admissible such evidence being confined to what old persons who were in a situation to know what these rights are, have been heard to say concerning them." "Evidence of reputation upon general points is receivable, because all mankind being interested therein, it is as probable that they would discourse together about them, having all the same means of information." Per Lord Kenyon in Morewood v Wood 14 East 329. The rule is thus laid down by Parke B in Crease v Barrett 1 C M & R 928. "In cases of rights or customs which are not properly speaking, public but of a general nature and concern a multitude of persons it seems that Hearsay evidence is not admissible unless it is derived from persons conversant with the neighbourhood. But where the right is really public—a claim of highway it same situation, touching the matter in contest, with the party relying on the declaration (Monlton v Att Gen, 2 Russ & My 160) Pouell Et 343 Declaration made in the obvious interest of the declarant will, generally speaking, be rejected (Brockelbank v Thompson, (1903) 2 Ch 344, 352), though, if no dispute has arisen, or no claim has been contemplated, the mere fact that the declaration might tend to support the declarant's own title will not of itself be sufficient to exclude them Doe v Davies, 10 Q B, 314 Halsbury Vol 13 p 469 'there must be, not merely facts which lead to a dispute, but a lis moti, or suit or controversy preparatory to a suit, actually commenced, or dispute arising, and that upon the very same pedigree or subject matter which constitute the question in litigation' Per Lord Denman in Davies v Loundes, 7 Scott N R 714 715-o Staney v Wade, 1 Myl & Cr, 338, Butler v Mountgarret, 7 H L Ca 633, Fredenel v Att Gen 14 L J Pr & M 1

Statement admissible under clause (4) Where a Hajib ulur bore the signature of the settlement officer and there was internal evidence that it was prepared on the information furnished to the settlement officer by the Zamindar of the village it was held that entries in it were admissible under section 35 of the Evidence Act Boy Nath v R. Singh, 12 O L J 571=2 O W N 872=L R 6 O 101 Neither clause (4) nor clause (5) of section 32 of the Evidence Act justifies the admission of hearsay evidence upon the question whether a particular person survived another or upon the question whether a man was at the time of his death joint with or separated from other members of his family, nor can the grounds of opinion of a deceased person as to the existence of a custom, even if stated to a witness, be admitted under that section Musammatt Parbatu v Ram Chandrapal 8 O C 91

CLAUSES V AND VI

Scope of clause (5) Clause 5 in fact, re-enacts section 47 of Act II of 1859. By the English law these declarations are not admissible unless made by members of the family Johnson v Lawson 1 Bing 86 But according to clause 5 of Act II of 1855 as well as by this section declarations of any person on any special means of knowledge would be admitted Oriental G S Co v Varasani 25 M 183 Thus, in India the declarations of servants, etc. are admissible Mohuna Chunder v Mithora Nath, 9 W R 151 Evidence of statements made by a deceased family priest as to the relationship of the members of the family may be given under this clause which is wide enough to include family priest Shamlat v Radha, 4 C L R 173, Anandul v Anandul 45 A P So also where the question was as to the existence of relationship of the father of a person (since deceased) employed as mulhtar by certain members of the family which appeared to have been made simply from his knowledge of the family from his being instructed as such mulhtar, he not having been a member of the family, nor intimately connected with it nor having had any special means of knowing it concerns was held inadmissible under sub-section 5 of section 32 of the Evidence Act Sangram Singh v Rajan Bahu 12 C 219=12 I A 131 (1) But this clause does not cover statements of facts made by interested persons declared in the course of litigation, of pedigrees set up by the opposite parties Varain v Chandi, 9 A 167=A W N 1887, 118 The statement of a person to be relevant by the 5th clause, is a statement relating to the existence of a relationship between persons alive or dead (the language imposes no restriction as to who a relationship the person making the statement has special means of knowledge) Fidd Et 6th Ed 179 It has been held by the Calcutta High Courts that this clause is not limited, as in the corresponding clause in England (Humes v Guthrie, 13 Q B D 818) to cases in which the question in dispute is the existence of a particular relationship between certain persons but applies also to cases in which the question is when such relationship terminated I in Chandara v Jyeguar, 29 C 78 Dhanmull v I in Chandara 14 I A 104 Oriental G S Company v Varasani 25 M 183 Varasani v Varasani 25 M 183 Quith & Lect (1902) 26, But it has never been held that this clause justifies the admission of what for the sake of brevity we will call 'hearsay' upon the question whether a particular person survived another, and it is of no use to say that clause does not justify the admission of hearsay upon the question whether a

S 32 knowledge" But this clause nowhere mentions that special knowledge is necessary. The scope of the section is thus stated by Mr Field in his Evidence Act "The statement provided for by the sixth clause is a statement relating to the existence of relationship between deceased persons only. It is not necessary that it should have been made by a person who had special means of knowledge, but it must be contained in a will or deed relating to the affairs of the family to which any such deceased person belonged, or in a family pedigree, or upon a tombstone, family portrait or other thing on which such statements are usually made" Field Ev 6th Ed p 139

Pedigrees which did not constitute ancient family records handed down from generation to generation and added to as a new member of the family died or was born, but were drawn upon a particular occasion for a specific purpose by members of the family—must be treated as mere declarations made by the persons who respectively drew up them or adopted them. Such of them as were made post litem motam are inadmissible in evidence. But in order to make such a statement inadmissible on this ground, the same thing must be shown to have been in controversy before and after the statement was made. Kalka Pershad v Mathura Prasad, 13 C W N 1=10 Bom L R 1038=8 C L J 447=1 Ind Cas 175. The word marriage in clause (5), Indian Evidence Act, will include a muta marriage, as such a marriage is recognised as lawful by the law governing the Shia sect of Mahomedans. Anjuman v Sadik Ali, 2 O C 115

English Law Declarations relating to pedigrees are allowed where they were made, before the commencement of the suit, by a deceased person provided the person making them was related by blood to the person to whom they refer or was the husband or wife of such person. McKelvey's Ev 271, see also Shrewsbury Peerage Case, 7 H L Cas at p 26. Under the term "Pedigree" are embraced, not only general questions of descent and relationship, but when forming part of the then genealogical fact, the particular ones of birth, marriage, and death, and their dates, either absolutely or relatively to some others or some other event, as well as that of a failure of issue. Goodie's Ev 447

Difference between English and Indian Law as regards pedigree It is necessary to observe that the English law with regard to evidence on matters of pedigree differs in some respects from the Indian law which is contained in clauses (5) and (6) of section 32 and in section 50 of the Evidence Act. Only such evidence in this case will be admissible which consists of (1) statements by a deceased person regarding relationship who had special means of knowledge when the statements were made before the question in dispute was raised, and (2) like statement in a deed or will relating to the affairs of the family or in any family pedigree etc, when made before the question in dispute was raised. Section 50 provides that when the Court has to form an opinion as to relationship of one person to another the opinion expressed by conduct as to the existence of such relationship of any person who, is a member of the family or otherwise has special means of knowledge on the subject is relevant. Per Mullick J in Bibi Fatma v Abdul Kasim, A I R 1928 Pat 539=110 Ind Cas 428. In India it is difficult to prove such facts as the date of birth after the lapse of many years, and it would be unreasonable to demand such a class of evidence as would justly be demanded in England. But the evidence must be such as to carry conviction to the mind. Naval Sha Ara Begam v Vish Begam, 11 C W N 130 (P C)=1 M L T 429

Necessity principle The Necessity principle is here satisfied by the general difficulty in obtaining any other than traditional evidence in matters of family history. Wigmore § 1431. In Foules v Young, 13 Ves 140 Erst L C said "Courts of law are obliged in cases of this kind to depart from ordinary rules of evidence as it would be impossible to establish descent according to the strict rules by which contracts are established and subjects of property regulated (by) requiring the facts from the mouth of the witnesses who have the knowledge of them. In cases of pedigree, therefore, recourse is had to a secondary sort of evidence—the best the nature of the subject will admit of—listing the descent from the only sources that can be had. In Perce's Peerage Case, 1 Camp 403 Mansfield C J said "In matters of pedigree" relating to the existence of relationship between deceased persons only. It is not necessary that it should have been made by a person who had special means of knowledge, but it must be contained in a will or deed relating to the affairs of the family to which any such deceased person belonged, or in a family pedigree, or upon tombstone, family portrait or other thing on which such statements are usually made. Field's Evidence 6th Ed p 139, Norton Et 185

Statement in clause (5) According to the general testimonial principle the testimonial statement may be in any form. It may be oral or written, it may consist in words or in conduct, it may be made by the declarant's own writing or by assenting to or adopting the writing of another. This is equally true, whether the statement offered be an individual's assertion or the family reputation. More § 1495, see also Colbert's Estate, 51 Mont 455, Young v State, 36 Or 411

Relations by blood, marriage, etc whose declarations are admissible. As to persons—whose declarations are received, and the limits of admissible relation there was much more uncertainty in England than now. In 1743 in the case of Craig & Annesley v Earl of Aglesea, 17 How St Tr 1166 1149, 111 which involved the question of pedigree, the general reputation in the neighbourhood was called for and given in evidence. In Morewood v Wood 14 East 330, which was decided in 1791 Mr Justice Grose said "I remember the case of a pedigree tried at Winchester where there was a strong reputation throughout the country one way and a great number of persons were examined to it." Mr Justice Grose joined the bar in 1766. In R v Erisuell (1790) 3 T R 25, Lord Kenyon said "I admit that declarations of the members of a family—perhaps of others living in habits of intimacy with them are received in evidence as to pedigree." In Walker v Winsfield, (1812) 18 Ves p 416, Lord Ellenborough said "The question whether a physician or a servant who has attended the family can be admitted as one of the family has not I conceive been decided." In Johnson v Lauson, (1821) 2 Bing 86, it was held that declarations of a servant and intimate acquaintances are not admissible. In Davies v Llewellyn, 7 B & N R P 189, Baron Parke remarked, during the argument, that as to blood relations there was no limit, but as to a connection by affinity the rule did not seem to go farther than the husband not including the wife. But in Shrewsbury Peerage Case (1857) 7 H L C pp 23, 26 while Lord Wensleydale repeated the intimation, it was thought by Lord Brougham that the declarations of a wife had been held receivable and by Lord St Leonards with the concurrence of both the other Lords that clearly they should be received. Thayer Cas Fr 407. In the case of Randall, 2 M & P 20, it was held that the declaration of a deceased woman's statements made by her former husband that his estate would go to J F and then to J F's heir, were admissible to show the relationship of the latter to the plaintiff to J F. In delivering his judgment Best C J said "Consanguinity or affinity by blood, therefore is not necessary and for this obvious reason: the party by marriage is more likely to be informed of the state of the family in which he is to become a member than a relation who is distantly connected by blood—as by frequent conversations, the former may hear the particular characters of branches of the family long since dead. The declarations of deceased persons must be taken with all their imperfections and if they appear to have been made honestly and fairly, they are receivable. If however, they are made post mortem they are not admissible, as the party making them cannot be presumed to have an interest, and not to have expressed a perfectly unbiased opinion. See also Doe v Henry Ry & Moo 297, Laurie v Ry 13 Ves 149. In England, wife & relatives are not competent to make declarations as to husband & family, for the reason that (except in the case of a wife & wife) the relation here must be a blood relationship. Shrewsbury Peerage Case 7 H L C 23, 26. Similarly the declarations of those who are connected by alliance—ties with the family to which the declaration relates are also inadmissible on the ground that a husband is in law plus nullius (Doe v Ry 13 Ves 297 & Moore & Holt 28). Similarly in Craig v Blyth 3 B & T 412, Lord Ellenborough observed "I can well understand that where a person is likely to be disinterested and well known in a family a member of the family will be allowed to give evidence of it—but in this case the plaintiff is not a member of the family."

own account, is plus nullus by our law. The question is, whether a declaration by one brother may be admitted as to another brother having had intercourse with a woman and having had a child by her, I think it ought to be excluded. But under clause (5) the declaration of an illegitimate member of the family would be receivable, if, for instance, he lived with and was treated as a member of the family, aliter, if he was kept apart from the family, and his existence and connection ignored or kept secret. Vort F 149. The peculiar state of India, however, and more particularly that of its native inhabitancy, has given rise to the adoption of a different principle there and the Indian Evidence Act enacts that in cases of pedigree, the declarations of illegitimate members of the family, and also of persons who though not related by blood or marriage to the family, were intimately acquainted with its members and state, shall be admissible in evidence after the death of the declarant, in the same manner and to the same extent as those of deceased members of the family. Goodale F 419.

The law presumes against vice and immorality and on this ground precludes strongly in favour of marriage. It will be very hard if strict proof of the marriage ceremony is invariably insisted upon years after it took place without any regard to the class to which the parties belong. The law therefore relaxes the rules of evidence and in the absence of evidence to the contrary considers it safe to presume marriage on proof of repute and conduct as may be indicated by reliable statements of persons most favourably situated for knowing the relationship the behaviour of the couple towards each other, and the treatment accorded to them and their general repute. It is these principles that underlie s 32 (5) and (6) and s 50 of the Evidence Act. Chandrasekara v Sannaputta 6 Mys L J 163.

Statement must be made before the dispute arises. Declarations made during the course of a controversy are to be regarded as lacking in the guarantees of truthworthiness. In the traditional phrase, the declarations, to be receivable, must have been made ante litem motam. Wignore § 1153. In Berkeley Peccage Case 1 Camp 401, Minsfield C J said: "In the Inglesea Cause many declarations of deceased persons were given in evidence but after an attentive examination I can not find that any of these had been made after the dispute had occurred."

I am not aware of any other authority upon this subject in our law, but the distinction of declarations ante litem motam and post litem motam is clearly taken in a foreign treatise of great learning, entitled De Probationibus.

I have now only to notice the observation that to exclude declarations you must show that the lis mota was known to the person who made them. There is no such rule. The line of distinction is, the origin of controversy and not the commencement of the suit. After the controversy has originated all declarations are to be excluded, whether it was or was not known to the witness. If an enquiry were to be instituted in each instance whether the existence of the controversy was or was not known at the time of the declaration much time would be wasted, and great confusion would be produced. For these reasons I conceive that the deposition now offered in evidence is not admissible. In the same case, the reason for the exclusion is thus stated by Heath J: "When the contest has originated, people take part on one side or the other, their minds are in a ferment, and if they were disposed to speak the truth, facts are seen by them through a false medium. It would hold out an invitation to fabricated testimony if declarations could be received in evidence which have been made when the contest was actually begun."

Similarly in Bonkton v Ath Gen 2 Russ & M 160 Brougham L C observed: "If there be lis mota, or anything which has precisely the same effect upon a person's mind with litis contestata that person's declaration ceases to be admissible in evidence. It is no longer what Lord Eldon calls a natural effusion of the mind. It is subject to a strong suspicion that the party was in the act of making evidence for himself. If he be in such circumstances that what he says is said, not because it is true, not because he believes it but because he feels it to be profitable or that it may thereafter become evidence for him or for those in whom he takes an interest after his death it is excluded."

The question then always will be, Was the evidence in the particular circumstances manufactured or was it spontaneous and natural? Wignore § 1483. So where declarations are made post litem motam, they are not admissible, is the party making them must be presumed to have an interest,

S 32 and not to have expressed an unprejudiced or unbiassed opinion Per Best C J in Doe v Randall, 3 M & P 20

This rule of evidence was familiar in the Roman law, but the term lis mota was there applied strictly to the commencement of the action, and was not referred to any earlier period of dispute. But in our law the term lis is taken in the classical and larger sense of the controversy, and by this lis is understood the commencement of the controversy, and not the commencement of the suit. Tay § 692, see also Berkeley Peerage Case, 4 Camp 417, Montrose v Att Gen 2 Russ & My 161 Gee v Ward, 7 E & B 509. The ground on which evidence of this description is excluded is the supposition that, when a controversy had once arisen, parties would be likely to range themselves passively, if not actively, either on one side or the other, or to have imbibed their impressions from those who had, and thus the testimony would become tainted at its very source. Goodrich Ev 457. In Berkeley Peerage Case, 4 Camp 417 Mr Justice Lawrence said "We know that passion, prejudice, party, and even good will, tempt many who preserve a fair character with the world, to deviate from the truth in the laxity of conversation. Can it be presumed that a man stands perfectly indifferent, upon an existing dispute respecting a hundred? His declarations post litem motam—not merely after the commencement of the law suit, but after the dispute has arisen, for that is the primary meaning of the word lis—are evidently more likely to mislead the jury than to direct them to a right conclusion, and therefore ought not to be received in evidence." In defining the meaning of the word lis Willse J in Butler v Mountgarret 6 H L C 641, observed "The lis would surely have dated at least from the time when the parties had respectively assumed a hostile attitude. Similarly Broughman L C in Monkton v Att Gen 2 Russ & My 160, observed "Prove that the person concocting or making the declaration took part in the controversy. Show me even that there was a cocontemplation of the proceeding, with a view to which the pedigree was manufactured, and I hold that it comes within the rule which rejects evidence fabricated for a purpose by a man who has an interest of his own to serve."

It was once said by Baron Alderson in Walker v Beauchamp, 6 C & P 30, that it was sufficient if at the time of the declaration the state of facts existed (for example the birth of a child) as to which the controversy afterwards arose. This, however, obviously cannot be sound, for it is to the controversy, and to nothing else, that the bias is to be attributed. Although the dictum of Baron Alderson was upheld by Lord Cottenham in Davies v Lowndes 7 Scott 199, has since been overruled Tay § 629, see also Shedden v Att Gen 1 L J P & M 217. In Railly v Fitzgerald 6 Ir Eq 344, Sugden L C said "The point of enquiry respecting the admissibility of such evidence is, not the existence of a state of facts out of which a claim has arisen, but the existence of a controversy or dispute respecting the claim." Similarly in Davies v Lowndes, supra Lord Denman also observed "There must be not merely a state of facts, but a lis mota, or suit, or controversy preparatory to a suit actually commenced or dispute arisen, and that upon the very pedigree or subject matter which constitutes the question in litigation." Berkeley Peerage Case 4 Camp 401, Stanely v Wade 1 Myl & Cr 335, Butler v Mountgarret, 7 H L Cas 633, Friedel v Att Gen 44 L J P & M 11. In Bahadur Singh v Mohar Singh 24 A 91 (107) P C, the principal oral evidence consisted of statements made by the plaintiffs to their descent, the information to which they had received from their ancestors. Objection was taken that some of these statements as were made since 1847 were inadmissible in evidence under clauses 5 and 6 of section 32 of the Evidence Act (I of 1872) as being received. The Judicial Committee held that they were admissible, the hearsay of the then claimants not being really in dispute.

There seems to be no doubt that the principle of exclusion would not apply to what was done in prevention of dispute, even were it in support of the declarant, and although in the belief that his title would be affected by the same circumstances as the party seeking to avail himself of the declaration. Thus in Goodright v Voss Cowper 591, Lord Mansfield in receiving evidence said "I have known advice given to a father and mother to pre-

S 32. be evidence, because you cannot be sure, that in admitting the depositions of witnesses, selected and brought forward on a particular side of the question who embarked to a certain degree with the feelings and prejudices belonging to that particular side you are drawing evidence from perfectly unpoluted source. But where the point in controversy is foreign to that which was before controvcrted, there never has been, a lis mota, and consequently the objection does not apply.

Personal knowledge It is not necessary according to English law that the declaration should contain only matters within the personal knowledge of the declarant Wills Ev 218 In Monkton v The Att Gen 2 Ru & V 147, Lord Brougham said "Another restriction was a good deal pressed on you cannot mount, as it were a hearsay upon a hearsay, but that what is given in evidence as hearsay must only be of the first degree, so to speak, in other words, that after connecting A with the family, it is competent, after his death to give in evidence declarations made by A as to what came within his own personal knowledge, but no declarations as to what he had heard respecting the family from others. There is no warrant, however, for any such distinction. The declarations tendered in evidence may either refer to what the party knew of his own personal knowledge, or as is much more frequently the case to what he heard from others to whom he gave credit, for they are only adduced as evidence of reputation in the family, and that is the only mode in which the tradition in a family can be proved, and the subject matter of that tradition can be perpetuated in testimony." So declarations may be based on statements made to him by a relative who has such personal knowledge (Doe v Davies, 10 Q B 311) or they may be based on tradition involving any number of degrees of hearsay so long as it is the tradition of deceased members of the family and not of strangers Goodright v Moss 2 Cowp 591 (594) Whitelock v Baker 13 Ves 511 (514), Shedden v Att Gen 30 L J P & M 217. But if in tend of being found on family hearsay or tradition, the declaration is extracted solely from different documents which are not produced it will be admissible, since it is no more than a reproduction of documents which might indeed be good evidence of reputation themselves but ought for that purpose, to be produced in Court. Davies v Lowndes, 6 M & G 471, Wills Ev 218. But the declaration of a deceased widow, respecting a statement which her husband has made to her as to who his cousins were,—as also the declaration of a relative, in which he asserts generally that he has heard what he states—have been received. If this were not so the main object of relaxing the ordinary rules of evidence would be frustrated, since it seldom happens that the declarations of deceased relatives embrace matters within their personal knowledge. Tay § 639, see also Doe v Baker 2 M & P 20 Stanley v Wade 7 Sim 611, Robson v Att Gen 10 Cl & Fin 500. So also proof by one of a family that many years before a young brother of the person last seized had gone abroad, that the reputation in the family was that he had died there and that the witness had never heard in the family of his having been married, is presumptive evidence of his death with issue. Doe v Banniny v Griffin, 15 Enst 293.

Declarant's means of knowledge The ordinary principle applicable to the situation would be that the declarant must appear to have had fair knowledge or fair opportunities for acquiring knowledge on the subject testified to. In England 'the tradition must be from persons having such a connection with the party to whom it relates, that it is natural and likely, from their domestic habits and connection, that they are speaking the truth, and that they could not be mistaken,' (per Lord Eldon in Whitlock v Baker, 13 Ves. 514) so that it is not necessary that the declarant should have had personal knowledge of the facts stated. It is not that they have, each and all, a knowledge by personal observation but that they at least know the facts as accepted by family understanding and tradition, and that this understanding, based as it was originally on observation is prima facie trustworthy. Wigmore § 1486. Personal knowledge of facts is therefore necessary. Monkton v Att Gen 2 Russ & M 165, Barkley v Jones Case 4 Camp 416. The difficulties, then that arise are concerned with drawing the line between declarants that may fairly be supposed to be qualified and those that may not. The question here are of two general sorts. First, the be admissible in evidence under 32(5) Anandi v. Nand Lal, 22 A L J 604 46 A 665 Unless it is shown that the person who files a pedigree in Court has special means of knowing relationship between the parties the pedigree cannot be received in evidence and it cannot be accepted as evidence that he had knowledge Proof of special source of knowledge is a pre-requisite to the admission of the document in evidence and until the document is received in evidence no presumption can be made from the statement contained in it Bhima v. Sender, 9 O L J 186=4 U P L R (O C) 79

Qualifications of the declarant Upon the general principle of testimonial knowledge, the qualifications of the deceased declarant—his relationship, or whatever is relied upon as equipping him with information—must be shown in advance Banbury Peerage Case, 2 Selw N P 764, see also Taylor § 640, W & E 213 214 In India the existence of special means of knowledge in the declarant is pre requisite for admitting such declarations In Sangram Singh v. Rangan Bahu, 12 C 219=12 I A 183, a deceased mukhtar's statement was admitted to prove the relationship amongst members of his client's family In disallowing the evidence Sir R R Collier said "It has been objected that the mukhtar has no special means of knowledge, and therefore he does not come within the description of persons mentioned in this section It no where appears that he had any other knowledge than as mukhtar acting for these ladies. He is not shown to have been a member of the family, to have been intimately connected with it, or to have any special means of knowledge of the family concerns Therefore in their Lordship's opinion he does not come within the description of a person having special means of knowledge" See also Bahadur v. Bhupendrar Bahadur, 17 A 456 P C So it must be shown that the declarant has sufficient acquaintance with the family to know what that reputation is Wigmore § 1490 Evidence of statements made by a deceased family priest as to the relationship of the members of the family may be given under clause 5 of section 32, which is wide enough to include the family priest Lal v. Radha Bibee 4 C L R 173 So also the pedigree produced in a settlement Court is admissible in evidence under s. 32, cl 5 of the Evidence Act upon proof that the person making the statement contained in the pedigree was dead and had a special means of knowledge Kashi Singh v. Balraj Singh 11 Ind Cas 199 The statement in a pedigree, made by a deceased member of a branch of a family, regarding the descendants of another branch thereof, if any dispute arose as to the latter is relevant and admissible in evidence Syamanand v. Rama Kanta, 32 C 6 So also a statement relating to any relationship contained in a document signed by several persons, some only of whom are dead, is admissible in evidence under cl (5) of section 32 Chandra Nath v. Ailmadhab, 26 C 236=3 C W N 89 A pedigree filed at the time of a regular settlement and accepted by the Settlement Court is not admissible in evidence, unless it is proved how the pedigree was prepared whether it was based upon the statement of a person since deceased and whether such person had special means of knowledge Mohammad v. Bryraj, 8 Ind Cas 723 On the death of one H n Mahomedan lady, the question arose whether S and W were the legitimate children of Z n predeceased son of H and so were H's children Certain documents bearing dates from 1860 to 1890 were produced from W asika officer, in which H then living has described S and W as her daughters and their mothers as the mutta wives of her son Held that these documents were admissible in evidence as containing statements by one who had the best means of knowledge made at times when the present controversy was not in question Baker Ali Khan v. Anyuman Ara Begum 25 A 236=7 C W N 111 See also in Kedar Nath v. Mathumal 10 C 555 (P C) Mathumal on the death of Munna the second wife of his maternal grandfather Dishan Lal, in a suit as the next of her husband to set aside an alienation made by him in favour of Kidarnath Kularnath denied the relationship of Munna with Dishan Lal Mathumal produced a will made by the widow five years after the death of Dishan Lal in which she stated, "I have no issue or any near relative related to me as a daughter's son and Aharats Lal as my husband's brother These are my relatives on the husband's side" In answer to the evidence Lord Shaw observed "In this situation their Lordships are opinion that in the most solemn form, this lady had declared facts which must have been within the scope of her own knowledge, and, if her version of the facts he found there can in their Lordship's view, be no doubt that the judgment appealed from is correct" Statements as to the date of birth of a person contained in his deposition and in affidavits filed by him are inadmissible in evidence under section 21 (1) read with section 32 (5) of the Evidence Act, if made by a person having special means of knowledge whether personal or hearsay. Ram Athany Muni Goppa, 33 Ind Cas 969. Where the Courts below had rejected the evidence of certain witnesses on the ground that it was hearsay only and had not conformed with section 32 of the Evidence Act, and on the face of the evidence it was sometimes uncertain whether the witnesses were speaking from their own personal knowledge or from information derived from others, but the Courts had considered it from both points of view and held it inadmissible, the Judicial Committee saw no reason to differ from the estimate which the Courts formed as to the credibility of the witnesses in the former case, nor, in the latter case to question the manner in which the Courts had applied the provisions of section 32. Safignunissa v Shaban 26 A 581=9 C W N 105 P C. So where the witness is speaking from hearsay he must show that his knowledge is derived from the person whose statement is admissible under this section. Vide Jagatpal Singh v Jageshar Singh, 25 A 43=7 C W N 209.

Statements are admissible to prove the facts contained in the statement on any issue. In England declarations are deemed to be relevant only in cases in which the pedigree to which they relate is in issue, and not to cases in which it is only relevant to the issue. Steph Dig Et Al 31. So evidence of this kind is only admissible in England when questions of pedigree are directly in issue, not where they arise incidentally in the course of an action. Thus in an action for goods sold and delivered where the defendant pleaded infancy it was sought to prove the plea by a statement contained in an affidavit made by the defendant's deceased father in a chancery suit to which the plaintiff was not a party, but it was held that there being no question of pedigree in the action the evidence was not admissible. Haines v Guthrie, 13 Q B D 818. See also Figg v Wedderburne, 11 L J Q B 46. This rule thus interpreted, says that declarations, otherwise satisfactory, can never the less be used in those cases only where the issue involves as material a question of pedigree, or genealogy—chiefly therefore inheritance cases. Wigmore § 1503. This view seems to have its origin in the observation of Lord Ellenborough, C J in R v Erith 8 East 539, where he observed "This was a case in which the question was, whether the declaration of the father of a bastard child as to the place of his the bastard's birth, was competent of that fact? The only doubt which has been introduced into this case has arisen from improperly considering it as a question of pedigree. The controversy was not as in a case of pedigree from what parents the child has derived its birth, but in what place an undisputed birth, derived from known and acknowledged parents has happened. The point thus stated turns on a single fact, involving no question but of locality and therefore not falling within the principle of or governed by the rules applicable to cases of pedigree, and is to be proved therefore, as other facts generally are proved according to the ordinary course of common law, that is by evidence to which the objection of hearsay does not apply." In deciding this case Lord Ellenborough appears to have gone directly against the previous practice. Vide R v Greenwich, Burr Sett Cas I, 343, R v Nutley Burr Sett Cas II 701, R v Holy Trinity Cald Just Perce (Settl Cas 141 cited in Wigmore § 1502 (note 1). In Harbert v Tuckal, T Raym 84 where the question was as regards the capacity of a devisor to make a will, his father's entry of age in almanac was admitted. Historically these declarations were first customarily (though not exclusively) used in England in inheritance cases where the pedigree or genealogy of a claimant was directly a part of the issue. But on principle, the kind of issue involved in the litigation ought to have no bearing on the admission of these class of declarations. A deceased father's entry in a family Bible is equally trustworthy, or untrustworthy, whether the issue subsequently arising happens to be framed upon a claim to an inheritance, a plea of infancy to a promissory note or an application to appoint a guardian. Wigmore § 1503. In the majority of American jurisdiction.

5. 32. — this limitation is ignored. So the declarations are now admitted: whatever the general nature of the issue, and whether or not the issue is one of general pedigree, or descent, Wigmore § 1503. In Inhabitants of North Brookfield v. Inhabitants of Warren, 16 Gray (Mass) 171, the rule is thus laid down: "Some of the authorities seem to limit the competency of this species of proof to cases where the main subject of inquiry relates to pedigree, and when the incidents of birth, marriage and death, and the times when those events happened, are directly put in issue. But, upon principle, we can see no reason for such a limitation. If this evidence is admissible to prove such facts of all it is equally so in all cases, whenever they become legitimate subjects of judicial investigation." Similarly in the colonies the rule laid down in Haines v. Guthrie L.R. 13 Q. B. D. 818 was not followed. In Mahomed Syedol Arifin v. Yeoh Ooi Gark, (1916) 2 A. C. 575 = 21 C. W. N. 202 a plea of infancy was set up in a suit for mortgage. But evidence of entry of date of defendant's birth made by his deceased father in a book containing family records of births, deaths and marriages was held admissible, under Straits Settlements Evidence Ordinance, 1893. So also under section 32(b) of the Indian Evidence Act evidence is admissible. In Dhanumal v. Ram Chander, 1 C. W. N. 270 = 24 C. 265, a plaintiff in a former suit, verified by a deceased member of a family and as such having special knowledge, was held admissible under section 32(5) of the Evidence Act, to prove the order in which certain persons were born and their ages. In delivering the judgment of the Court, Petharam C. J. said: "It was contended on the part of the plaintiff on the authority of the English cases that as the question at issue in this case did not relate to the existence of any relationship by blood, marriage or adoption the section did not apply and the statements were excluded by the ordinary rules of evidence. I think that on this point the law in India under the Evidence Act is different from the law of England and that the effect of the section is to make a statement made by such a person, relating to the existence of such relationship, admissible to prove the facts contained in the statement on any issue, and that the plaintiff was admissible here to prove the order in which the sons of Sumbh were born, and their ages, and when admitted, to my mind, satisfactorily proved that the defendant was the son who was born on the 6th June 1868." Bhambhani v. Ram Chandra v. Jogeswar, 20 C. 758, for the purpose of the defence, of a question of limitation, it was necessary to prove the date of the plaintiff's birth. The plaintiff and one of his witnesses each spoke to statements made to him by relations of the plaintiff who were since deceased relating to the date of the plaintiff's birth. The defendant objected to such evidence on the authority of Haines v. Guthrie L.R. 13 Q. B. D. 818. In delivering the judgment the Court observed: "In the discussion which arose on the point of limitation it was strongly urged for the appellant that the statements of deceased persons made to the date of the plaintiff's birth were not admissible as evidence under section 32 of the Indian Evidence Act, and in support of that contention the case of Haines v. Guthrie was referred to. It was further asserted that the law of England, in this respect is the same as the law of India, but in dealing with the point we must bear in mind that when the Evidence Act was passed in this country this question of hearsay evidence was not then so definitely settled as it is now. Some of the text-books supported the contention, that hearsay evidence was inadmissible to prove the date of birth, and looking at illustrations (k. 1. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. date of birth, marriage, and death, and the fact and degree of relationship—ns' has always been conceded. But there has been more or less fluctuation and uncertainty about the exact limits to be applied, and upon certain classes or facts some doubt still unnecessarily exists. Wigmore § 1500. In Grimwade v Stephens Kent Assizes, 1697, Bull N P 294, ns to what are questions of pedigree, it has been said "Hearsay is good evidence to prove who is my grand father, when he married, and what children he had, etc., of which it is not reasonable to presume I have better evidence. So to prove my father, mother, cousin, or other relations, beyond the ser, dead, and the common reputation and belief of it in the family gives credit to such evidence." On the authority of R v Erith, 8 East 539, the place of birth or death—something more than the fact of birth or death—has by some Courts been thought to be inadmissible. But the question was finally settled in England in Sheilds v Boucher, 1 Dig & Sm 53, where Knight Bruce said "If the place of birth in Rex v Erith had been a genealogical fact as it was not—had been material, namely, for any genealogical purpose, which it was not, Lord Ellenborough and the Court of King's Bench might possibly have dealt with the evidence differently." See also Lord Brougham L C in Manhton v Att Gen 2 Russ & M. 156, where he observed "but declarations of the nature of pedigree, that is to say, of who was related to whom, by what links the relationship was made out, whether it was a relationship of consanguinity or of affinity only, when the parties died, or whether they are actually dead, every thing in short, which is, etricly speaking, matter of pedigree, may be proved as matter relating to the condition of the family, by the declarations of deceased persons who, by evidence de hors those declarations, have been previously connected with the family, respecting which their declarations are tendered." Moreover since the proof of a particular relationship often depends on the proof of some specific fact, such as birth, marriage or death, or the date or place of such event or some incident connected therewith, or the place of residence of some particular person of family, or other matters of family history, these facts are also regarded as matters of pedigree within the meaning of the rule when they thus tend to prove a relationship which is in question. Wills, Et 17. A statement as to the age of a member of a family, made by his sister is no doubt admissible after her death under section 32, clause (3), illustration (e). The principle of the decision in my opinion is that time of one's birth relates to the commencement of one's relationship by blood and a statement therefore, of one's age made by a deceased person having special means of knowledge relates the existence of relationship within the meaning of section 32, cl 5. Oriental Government Security L A Co v Narasimha Chari, 25 M 183, 209, 210, see also Ram Chandra v Jogeswar Narain, 20 C 758, Bipinbehari v Sridam, 13 C 42.

Contemporaneity of the Statement. It is not necessary to show that the declarations were contemporaneous with the events to which they relate, for as Lord Brougham has well observed, such a restriction "would defeat the purpose for which hearsay in pedigree is let in by preventing it from going back beyond the lifetime of the person whose declaration is to be adduced in evidence, and to use a homely illustration—it would render inadmissible the statement of a deceased person as to the maiden name of his own grandmother." Manhton v Att Gen 2 Russ & M. 157, 158, Tay Et § 639.

Hearsay of the family as to particular facts is not excluded. "In cases of general rights, which depend upon immemorial usage, living witnesses can only speak of their own knowledge to what has passed in their own time, and to supply the deficiency, the law receives the declarations of persons who are dead. Here, however the witness is only allowed to speak to what he has heard the dead man say respecting the reputation of the right of way or of common, or the like. A declaration with regard to a particular fact, which would support or negative the right, is inadmissible. In matters of pedigree it being impossible to prove by living witnesses the relationship of past generations, the declarations of deceased members of the family are admitted, but here as the reputation must proceed on particular facts, such as marriages, births, and the like, from the necessity of the thing the hearsay of the family as to these

S. 32. particular facts is not excluded. General rights are naturally talked of in the neighbourhood, and family transactions among the relations of the parties. Therefore, what is thus dropped in conversation upon such subjects may be presumed to be true. Per Lord Mansfield in Berkeley Peerage Case, 4 Camp 401.

Cases under clause (5). Very liberal interpretation should be given to the words "when the statement relates to the existence of any relationship by blood relations." Statements made by deceased members of the family about certain facts of family history and statements regarding the seniority of members of the family are admissible in evidence under clause (5). Krishna Lal v Raj Kaur, 104 Ind Cas 299=1 Luck C 97=A. I. R. 1927 Oudh 278. A statement as to the existence of a relationship is admissible even though it was made in a previous suit in which the issue was the same as in the present suit. Gokuldas v Baldeo Sukul, 105 Ind Cas 26. Oral evidence was given by a person about the relationship between two parties and he based his information on a pedigree prepared by his father. The pedigree was not put in evidence, nor any foundation laid for letting in secondary evidence. Held it was inadmissible. Sesham mal v Kuppannyangar, 91 Ind Cas 462=A. I. R. 1926 Mad 475. The statement as to relationship made by an attorney in the discharge of his duty and within the scope of his authority is admissible under this clause. Chandrasekar v Bisheswar, 5 P. 777. Inam statements concerning a family made by a person who is neither a member of the family nor connected with it by marriage himself nor having any special means of knowledge are inadmissible. Kanda lam Krishnamachari v Sathuluri, 1925 M. W. N. 117=22 L. W. 73=88 Ind Cas 646=A. I. R. 1925 Mad 823=48 M. L. J. 467. Entries in Khewat based on pedigree and attested by all co-sharers are admissible under this clause. Baynath v Raja Singh, 12 O. L. J. 571=2 O. W. N. 872. Declaration of a person as to his parentage is admissible under s. 32 (1) (k). Santu v Tara, 60 Ind Cas 407=A. I. R. 1925 Oudh 537.

A statement by a person in a mortgage deed as regards his paternity before any dispute arose is admissible in evidence under this clause in as much as the person when he grew up would have had means of knowledge that his father was a particular person. Santu v Tara, 10 O. & A. L. R. 1226. Before a pedigree is admitted in evidence it must be shown that they were made by a person having special means of knowledge of the relationship. Where it is based on an old genealogical tree which no longer exists the person who was responsible for the old document must be indicated. Jhobal v Sahni, 1923 Pat 266=1923 P. 585. A recital as to the date of birth in a guardianship application by a person having special knowledge is admissible in evidence where other conditions are fulfilled. Prohlad v Ramsaran, 38 C. L. J. 213. A statement relating to his own relationships made by a person in a will or mortgage executed by him is admissible in evidence under s. 32 (5) of the Evidence Act, and cannot be objected to because it related to his own relationship. Such a construction would make illustration (h) to the section wrong. Mullany Venkata v M. Vento, 13 M. L. T. 515=19 Ind Cas 740=25 M. L. J. 373. A statement made by a deceased sapinda as to the circumstances under which he received a sum of money in connection with the adoption is admissible under this clause as it relates to the existence of relationship by adoption. Danakoti v Balasundara, 36 M. 19=18 Ind Cas 989. A pedigree filed in a Settlement Court for the preparation of Khewat cannot be put in evidence as a family pedigree under s. 32 (6). It can be admitted only under s. 32 (5) for which purpose it must be proved that the document represents a statement as to the existence of a certain relationship by blood or marriage made by a person who had special means of knowledge in respect of the matters thus stated and made before the question now in dispute was raised. Mathura v Bhulan, 15 O. C. 364, see also Saraybah v Tilok Chand, 36 Ind Cas 66. A statement in a will made by the father describing his adopted son, aged so and so as the sole beneficiary is admissible to prove the age of the boy under s. 32 cl. 5 and 6 of the Evidence Act. Krishnamachariar v Veeravalli, (1913) M. W. N. 355=13 M. L. T. 33=14 M. L. J. 517=19 Ind Cas 472. The question for decision was whether the respondent was the legitimate daughter of one K. and R. The respondent contended that R. was not the legally married wife of K., and in proof of it produced a compromise and a decree between R and another person by which R obtained only a small amount as maintenance. He also relied upon a statement made by R on a certain occasion admitting that she was the concubine and not the married wife of K. It was held that the statement of R was admissible in evidence under section 32, clauses (3) and (5). Parbat v Maharaj Singh 10 Ind Cas 188. A statement made by a person before a public officer as to his son's age is admissible in evidence under s 32, to prove his son's age. Bappa Raja v Kondu Raja, 9 Ind Cas 324=9 M L T 220. The statement of the deceased maternal grandfather of the testator is admissible in evidence to prove the latter's age. Deberam v Somanick, (1911) 2 M W N 383. A pedigree produced in a Settlement Court is admissible in evidence under section 32 clause 5 upon proof that the person making the statement contained in the pedigree was dead and had a special means of knowledge. Kashi Singh v Balraj Singh, 10 Ind Cas 199. Hearsay evidence is not admissible under section 32 clause (5) of the Evidence Act, to prove the case of fosterage, in as much as, even if it be assumed that connection by fosterage can amount to relationship in any sense of the term the relationship is not by blood, marriage or adoption. Prince Mirza v Nouab Qudria, 24 Ind Cas 643. The term 'adoption' in clause (5) of section 32 of the Evidence Act is not to be interpreted in a restricted sense. The relationship between a mohant and his chela is a relationship by adoption within the meaning of that clause. A statement in a will that A has one chela B and has no other chela, is one relating to existence of that relationship within the meaning of clause (5) of section 32. Achyutananda v Jagannath, 21 C L J 96=27 Ind Cas 739=20 C W N 122. Statements contained in the plaint in a previous suit as to the existence of relationship is a statement within the meaning of section 32 of the Evidence Act and having been made by a person having special knowledge of such relationship and before the litigation in the subsequent case arose, it is admissible under clause 5. Maulad Khan v Abdul Sailor, 15 A L J 349=39 A 426. Where the question is whether A born on a certain date is of age an entry in a book containing the record of births deaths and marriages in the family kept by his father who is dead, that he was born on a particular date, is admissible under this clause. Mohamed Syedol v Yeo Oor Gark, 21 C W N 257=(1917) M W N 162=19 Bom L R, 157=39 Ind Cas 401 (P C). A statement by a Muzumdar that the estate should be handed over to X, as the sole wife of a Zamindar is admissible under s 32, as made by a person having special means of knowledge. Krishna Thevar v Ramasami (1917) M, W N 201=33 M L J 277=40 M 871.

In Achyutananda Das v Jagannath Das, 20 C W N 123=21 C L J 96=27 Ind Cas 739 one Raghabananda Das was the Mohant of a muth known as the Khumkukul Muth. He was succeeded by his Chela Sriram Das. After the death of Sriram Das, Jagannath Das the plaintiff claimed to be his lawful successor as his gurubhai. The defendant resisted the claim on the allegation that he had been adopted by Sriram Das as his chela. The plaintiff proved by satisfactory oral evidence that Raghabananda Das had two chelas, the senior Jagannath and the junior Sriram. Against this view the evidence brought forward by the defendant is the recital in the will of Raghabananda that he had no one else as his chela except Sriram Das. The question is whether the statement is admissible under section 32 clause (5). In delivering the judgment Mr Justice Mookerjee observed. On behalf of the plaintiff it has been argued that the section should be strictly construed and that the statement in question should be excluded, first because it relates not to the existence, but to the non-existence of a relationship, and, secondly, because the relationship between a Mohant and his chela is not a relationship by adoption. On behalf of the defendant, it has been argued that the section should be liberally construed, and that it is only by a liberal construction that the view taken in the cases of Ram Chandra v Jogeshwar, 20 C 758. 23 I A 37=23 C 670 (P C) and Dhannumull v Ramchandra, 24 C 265=1 C W N 270, can be defended. In answer it has been contended by the plaintiff that the view taken in these cases, viz that a statement as to date of birth or marriage of a person is admissible as a statement relating to the existence of relationship though in accord with illustrations (f) and (m) of section 32 is opposed to the view taken in Bepin Behary v Sudam,

S. 32. 13 C 42; Satish Chandra v. Mohendra Lal, 17 C 849 and Ram Krishna v. Mamandra Mohun, 20 C L. J. 302. It is not necessary for our present purpose to determine whether the fluctuation of judicial opinion indicated in the two sets of decisions mentioned is more apparent than real, and whether they may not be reconciled by a recognition of the principle that a statement as to the time of commencement of relationship is so indissolubly associated with the existence of itself of the relationship, that it may be rightly regarded, without undue stretch of language, as a statement which relates to the existence of that relationship. Oriental etc. Co. Ltd v. Narasimha, 25 M 183 and Palamoor Kuru v. Roman 21 Ind Cas 519. But whatever view may be adopted upon that question, it does not directly affect the point raised before us for consideration, i.e. first, is the relationship between a Mohunt and his chela a relationship by adoption, and, secondly, is a statement that A has one chela B and has no other chela, a statement relating to the existence of a relationship? We are of opinion that both these questions should be answered in the affirmative. In the first place, there is no reason why the term 'adoption' should be interpreted in a restricted sense, that the expression that A has adopted B as his chela is found in judicial decisions of the highest authority. In the second place, the expression 'relates to the existence' is obviously very comprehensive and need not be construed in the narrow sense suggested by the plaintiff. This view is in accord with the decision of the Judicial Committee in Mohunt Bhagwan v. Mohunt Raghunandan, 22 I A 91-22 C 813 P. C. In that case the contest for the office of Mohunt lay between one Raghunandan, who claimed to be the Gurubhu of deceased Mohunt Hoggrib (both of them chelas of Chaturbhuy) and Bhagwan who claimed to be the chela of Hoggrib. The plaintiff contended that the defendant was not the chelo of Hoggrib, while the defendant asserted that the plaintiff was not the chela of Chaturbhuy and, consequently not the gurubhu of Hoggrib. A petition by Chaturbhuy was adduced in evidence, containing the statement that he had no other chela or heir besides Hoggrib, and this was sought to be used to disprove the allegation of Raghunandan that he also was chela of Chaturbhuy. The statement was treated as admissible in evidence but was held not to be conclusive. "So also statements, made by a deceased person are admissible in evidence under s 32, clause (5) of the Evidence Act not only to prove 'relationship by blood, marriage or adoption,' but also date of birth on the same principle. A document containing a statement of a deceased person as to the mode of succession obtaining in a particular family is also admissible in evidence." Palamoor Kuru v. Roman 21 Ind Cas 519. see also Shro Lal v. Gour Narain, 7 Ind Cas 218.

Where on the death of one H, a Mahomedan Lady, the question arose whether S and W were the legitimate children of Z, a predeceased son of H, and so were H's heirs certain documents having dates from 1860 to 1890 which were produced from the Wasika office and in which H, then living had described S and W as her heirs and their mothers as the mulat wives of her son were held admissible in evidence as containing statements by one who had the best means of knowledge made at times when the present dispute was not in contemplation and further, a petition presented to the Wasika office by S and W conjointly with F a son of Z, since deceased whose legitimacy was not questioned, describing H's husband, who had recently died, as their grandfather, and proving that the Wasika allowed to him, he allotted to them, was also held admissible as a statement made by F against his own interest, and as going to prove that their title to legitimate heirs as good as F's. Baker Ali v. Anyuman, 7 C W N 465 (P.C.) 25 A 236-5 Bom L R 410-30 I A 94. The legal presumption as to paternity raised by s 112 of the Evidence Act is applicable only to the off spring of a married couple. A person claiming as an illegitimate son must establish his alleged paternity like any other disputed question of relationship, and can of course rely upon statements of deceased persons under s 32, clause (5), upon opinion expressed by conduct under s 50 of the Evidence Act, and also upon such presumption of fact as may be warranted by the evidence. Gopalswami v. Arima Chellam-27 M 32. Hearsay evidence though to be received with caution is not inadmissible in questions of pedigree, and by the Mahomedan law is held to be good respecting death descent and marriage. In India, in cases of such description the declarations of illegitimate members of the family and also of persons who, though not related by blood or marriage to the family, are intimately acquainted with its members and state, is admissible in evidence after the death of the declarant, in the same manner and to the same extent as those of the deceased members of the family Ghurreb Hossain v Usumonnisa, 1 Hay 528 Where the question is as to the age of a person, the entry of his date of birth in the school register based on the statements of his deceased father is admissible under s 32(5) and also under section 35 Munna Lal v Kameshary, A I R 1929 Oudh 113 A settlement of pedigree is admissible in evidence either under s 32 cl (5) if it be shown that it amounts to the statements of deceased persons, who were members of the family and as such had special means of knowledge and further that these statements were made before there was any controversy as to the point, which is sought to be established by the said pedigree Saifaraz v Rajana, A I R 1929 Oudh 129

A register of baptism, while evidence of that fact and of the date of it, furnishes even if it states the date of a person's birth, no proof of the age of that person further than that, at the date of such ceremony, the person referred to was already born Evidence regarding the date of a man's birth has been held under certain circumstances to be admissible under s 32 (5) of the Evidence Act, but, in the case of an entry in the register in question, there is nothing to show by whom the statement entered was made, much less that the person making the statement had any special means of knowledge Ab Collier v Mrs L Baran 2 N L R 34 In an application for letters of administration, the rights of the applicants to be considered the next heirs of the deceased depended on proof that the relationship between their great great-grand father and the great-great-grand mother of the deceased was that of full brother and sister To prove this a Kurishnama or genealogical table, made by the ancestors of the deceased "by the pen of a gomosta and alleged to have been filed by her in 1804 in a suit to establish the same fact, and a certified copy of an evanama, or deed of exchange, dated the 17th January, 1782 and corroborating the Kurishnama as to the relationship were produced by the applicants The Kurishnama was held admissible in evidence Sharada v Secretary of State for India, 31 C 1059 P C

Cases under clause (6) Entries made by a parent or relation in Bibles, prayer books, miscals, almanacs, or indeed in any other books or in any document or paper, stating the fact and date of the birth marriage or death of a child, or other relation, are also received as the written declarations of the deceased persons who respectively made them Tay Et § 650 These statements may be made by the declarant's own writing, or by assenting to or adopting the writing of another This is also equally true whether the statement offered be the individual's assertion or the family repute Wigmore § 1495 In Goodnight v Moss, Cowp 594, Lord Mansfield C J said "An entry in a father's family Bible an inscription on a tombstone, or pedigree hung up in a family mansion (as the Duke of Buckingham's was) are all good evidence Similarly in Toules v Young, 13 Ves 140, Ervine L C said "Inscriptions upon tombstones are admitted, as it must be supposed the relations of the family would not permit an inscription without foundation to remain So engravings upon rings are admitted upon the presumption that a person would not wear a ring with an error upon it' That the document containing the assertion is a formal one—a deed or will—does not make the assertion inadmissible Murray v Milner L R 12 Ch D 845 Doe v Pembroke 11 East 504 Smith v Tebbit L R 1 P & D 351 "Such statements" says Lord Blackburn in Sturla v Freccia, L R 5 App Cas 641, "by deceased members of the family may be proved not only by showing that they actually made the statements but by showing that they acted upon them or assented to them or did anything that amounts to showing that they recognized them "A pedigree, whether in the shape of a genealogical tree or map, or contained in a book, or mural or monumental inscription if recognised by a deceased member of the same family, is admissible, however early the period from which it purports to have been deduced On what ground is this admitted? It may be that the simple act of recognition of the document, and consequent acknowledgment of the relationship stated in it, by members of the family, is

S. 32. some evidence of that relationship, from whatever sources his information have been derived, because he was likely from his situation, to enquire into the truth of such matters, and from his means of knowledge, to ascertain it the reason why a pedigree, when made or recognised by a member of a family is admissible may be, that it is presumably made or recognised by him in consequence of his personal knowledge of the individuals therein stated to be related or of information received by him from some deceased member of what latter knew, or heard from other members who lived before his time. And it may well be contended, that, if, the facts rebut that presumption, and so that no part of the pedigree was derived from proper sources of information then the whole of it ought to be rejected, and so also if there be some but uncertain and undefined part, derived from improper sources. But when a framer speaks of individuals, whom he describes as living, we think the reasonable presumption is that he knew them and spoke of his own personal knowledge and not from reference to registers, wills, monumental inscriptions, and family records or history, and consequently, to that extent the statements in a pedigree are derived from a proper source, and are good evidence of the relationship of these persons." Per Lord Denman in Davies v Loundes, 7 Scott N 211-213 = 6 M & Gr 725. When a statement is made in a will of a deceased person in his own interest or in view of a litigation, it should not receive much weight. But when a certain person is described in the testator's will as an adopted son, that statement is a strong evidence of the former's relationship to the testator. Chandressuar v Bishesuar, 5 P 777. Entries made in family books regarding the relationship of parties are admissible under this clause. Amrit Sana v Prabhu Dyal, 89 Ind Cas 939.

Will or deed. Written declarations contained in wills or deeds are admissible to prove relationship. Murray v Milner 12 Ch D 845, Smith v Tabbell, R 1 P & D 354. Such declarations are admitted on the principle that they are the natural effusions of a party who must know the truth, and who speaks up on an occasion when the mind stands in an even position, without any temptation to exceed or fall short of it. Per Lord Eldon, in Whitelocke v Baker, 13 F 514, Higham v Ridgway, 10 East 109. Berkeley Peerage Case, 4 Camp 419. Evidence of the relationship stated in the wills or deeds in order to become admissible must be between deceased persons. Ram Narain v Monee, 9 C 613, 614. A written agreement is admissible as evidence of pedigree even when it has been set aside by a competent Court on other grounds. Tinima v Daramma, 10 M 307. Also section 17, clause (b) of the Registration Act (III of 1877) does not render a passage in a will inadmissible in evidence if the words of it do not purport to operate to extinguish an interest in the present or in future but states only facts. Such a statement would, if proved be admissible also under section 6, clause (6) of the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872). Chamanbee v Mullan Chaudhary, 20 B 562. But the incidental recital of a child's age in a will does not prove the exact age of the child. Nilmoni v Zaharunissa, 8 W R 371. But when the recital is not incidental it is admissible in evidence. Krishna machannarayana Feerabali, 38 M 166 = 19 Ind Cas 452, see also Oriental Government v Anand Sinha, 38 M 183 (207), Ram Chander v Jogannar 20 C 758, Subramanian Doraisinga 16 Ind Cas 935 = 24 M L J 49.

The recital in a family conveyance by a trustee is evidence of parentage. Slaney v Wade 7 Sim 611. So also an old and cancelled will has been allowed as evidence of the existence and relative ages of certain deceased members of the family from whom both parties derived title. Doe v Pembroke 11 East, 62. The probate of a will is not a primary evidence for this purpose. Doe v Ormerod, 1 M & R 466. Duke v Pollhill 1 Ld Raym 741. The will itself, the signature of the testator must be proved unless the age of the document or other circumstances dispense with such proof. It is said, however, that the "testamentary book" or "original roll" of Ecclesiastical Court, containing an enrolment of the will, are admissible in evidence to prove relationship. Bull N P 390, Ex parte Bull N P 46. So recitals of descent and description of parties in deeds or other family instruments, will be received, provided the deeds come from the proper custody, and are proved or may from hence be presumed, to have been executed by some member of the family to which the statements refer. Marmyn v Perce

Family pedigree A pedigree which has long been hung up in a family mansion is good evidence to prove relationship Goodright v Moss, 2 Cowp 594 The words "family pedigree" in clause 6 should not be construed according to the standard adopted by the Courts of England in regard to the pedigrees of English families Peoples of England widely differ in their habits of thought modes of expression and indeed in their entire system of family life Jang v Arjun, A I R 1928 Oudb 125 Where a pedigree brings one down from the remotest ancestor to the generations living contemporaneously with a person in whose time it is prepared, the document is a record of family traditions as to pedigree and of the existence of persons contemporaneously alive The authenticity of that part of the record which embraces the names of persons who existed before the living members, rests on the absence of anything showing directly or inferentially, that the pedigree was prepared with any motive other than the natural motive for preparing and preserving a record of family traditions relating to family pedigree Such pedigree is admissible in evidence Ibid In Kalla Prasad v Mathura Prasad, 30 A 510=35 I A 510=1 Ind Cas 175 the plaintiff gave in evidence three pedigrees The last one was ruled out of evidence as having been made post litem moto The second was admitted as a declaration made by a deceased member of a family touching the family reputation or tradition on the subject of his descent made ante litem moto The first pedigree was also admitted in evidence under the same conditions as the second As regards all three pedigrees Lord Atkinson observed at p 522 of 30 A "They are not ancient family records handed down from generation to generation and added to as a member of the family dies or is born, but documents drawn up on a particular occasion for a specific purpose by members of a family, and must accordingly be treated as mere declarations made by the person who respectively drew them up or adopted them" But in Jang Bahadur v Arjun Singh ubi supra, the Court observed "Nor do we think that the first portion of the observation of their Lordships is intended to lay down an exhaustive definition of 'family pedigree' as used in cl 6 s 32, Indian Evidence Act 1872 Those two words simply indicate the highest and the best type of family pedigree The decision does not show that a pedigree not conforming to that standard cannot be a family pedigree See also Nam Deo v Ganoba 86 Ind Cas 847=8 N L J 29 Where the relationship in a pedigree table is corroborated in material parts by the oral evidence and the table prima facie satisfies all the conditions prescribed by ss 32 (6) and 90 of the Evidence Act, a presumption should be made for its genuineness Jagdeo v Velhoba 105 Ind Cas 81 The mention of a certain common ancestor of the parties in the pedigree table recorded at the time of settlement indicates that the land in dispute was occupied by him Sandhu v Dani, 96 Ind Cas 349 Where in a pedigree table the common ancestor's name appears and the sons are found to be in joint possession of the property holding equal shares the presumption is that the common ancestor held the property Fateh Nur v Jwan, A I R 1923 Lah 964 A family pedigree may be a pedigree kept by a member of the family or by another person on its behalf and it can be admitted in evidence, if it is written by a family bard for the purpose of keeping a record of the family even for its use and the use of the family Such a record can be admitted even though not signed by the person making it Anand v Nand Lal, 22 A L J 637=16 A 665=A I R 1924 All 575, see also Mohansing v Dalpat Sing, 46 B 733=67 Ind Cas 235=24 Bom L R 289

S. 32. The words "family pedigree" in clause (6) of section 32, do not necessarily include such a pedigree as is in the possession of a member of the family concerned nor do they indicate that the actual possession of the record need be with the family concerned. In order that a "family pedigree" be admissible in evidence under this clause it is essential that all the writers of the pedigree should have special means of knowledge. Lahaun v Motiram, 63 Ind Cas 968.

It is valid to procure after the death of a person that a pedigree filed by his general agent in a suit to which the deceased was a party was filed under his instructions and such pedigree if other conditions be satisfied would be admissible in evidence in subsequent litigation. Balbhadr v Sripal 21 O C 231=43 Ind Cas 309. Where the plaintiffs filed the family pedigree extracted from a settlement Record and it was signed by some persons named in the pedigree it was held that the document might be treated not as a family pedigree admissible under section 32 clause (6) but as a statement made by deceased persons likely to be acquainted with the facts as to the existence of certain relationship. Bhupat v Khelat 21 Ind Cas 271. A pedigree was filed before the Settlement Court in the year 1871 after being signed by the patuaries and by two Lambardars of the village both of whom appeared in the pedigree itself and as to whom there was no reason to doubt that they were now dead, and was signed by the Settlement Officer having been attested or verified before him. Held that in view of the circumstances, under which it was prepared, the pedigree should be accepted as a public document within the meaning of the definition in the Evidence Act. Musarrat Sarju De v Ram Harakh, 18 Ind Cas 250. Entries in Panda's Register or note book are admissible in evidence upon a question of family pedigree, but they should be received with caution and subjected to severe scrutiny in order to guard against the possibility of fabrication. Collector of Farrukabad v Gulraj 16 Ind Cas 625. Although a presumption under section 90 of the Evidence Act may be made with respect to a pedigree filed at the time of the Regular Settlement of the Province and found on the settlement file on the ground that it was more than 30 years old and that it was produced from proper custody yet before such pedigree can be admitted in evidence it must be shown that it is admissible under clause 5 or clause 6 of section 32 of the Evidence Act. Mathura Prashad v Bhulan Singh, 14 Ind Cas 339. Where a pedigree put forward in the settlement proceedings was produced in evidence, and it was found that it had been by a person who was neither a member of the family nor an official bound to record such pedigree that there was not sufficient evidence that it had been signed by any member of the family, that its contents were adopted by the members of the family who were privy to its preparation and that upon that basis the entries in the Thumat made at the time of the settlement were recorded, it was held that the pedigree was relevant and admissible under section 32 (5) of the Evidence Act, though the entries in it were not of great value. Ram Din v Kayestha Patshala, 25 Ind Cas 823.

In a suit for possession based upon the rights of inheritance of the plaintiff as collateral heirs of the last male owner through a common ancestor a pedigree of the family was produced in evidence to show that the plaintiffs were such collateral heirs. The statements in the pedigree were held to be inadmissible in evidence on the ground that the persons by whom it was drawn up were not called as witnesses and no proof was given that they were within any of the descriptions in section 32 of the Indian Evidence Act. Sorjon v Sardar Singh, 23 A 72=2 Bom L R 492=5 C W N 49=27 I A 183 P C.

Horoscope—evidentiary value of. A horoscope may be tendered under clause 5 or clause 6 of section 32 or under ss 17, 18 of the Evidence Act. Under clause (6) of section 32, it cannot be admitted as it is not a statement relating to the existence of any relationship by blood marriage or adoption, between persons deceased. Where it only purports on the face of it to be a statement of relationship between a deceased person and a living person, this clause does not embrace such a case. Moreover to come within this clause it must be shown that the writer is dead or cannot be found or became incapable of giving evidence. Ram Narayan v Monce Bibee 9 C 613. In Satish Chandra v Mohendra Lal, 1 C 849, the question again arose whether a horoscope was evidence under this clause. In answering the question in the negative Petharam G J observed

* Then the next question is with reference to the horoscope. This horoscope has been admitted as coming within section 32 of the Evidence Act and within clause 6 of that section. That clause makes entries made by persons, evidence on questions of relationship by blood marriage, or adoption, when the deceased person had some special means of knowledge. As to that it is enough to say that it is not shown that the person who had made this horoscope had any special means of knowledge, and that the question which we have to decide is not one either of relationship by blood, or marriage, or adoption. But it is submitted that no special knowledge is required under clause (6) and if the horoscope has been tendered under clause (5), the case of Ramnarain v. Unce which it purports to follow, does not seem in point. As regards the meaning of the words "on questions of relationship" the interpretation is also not sound. Id. supra, see also A. & H. Evidence Act p. 356 F. Note. A horoscope is receivable in evidence under section 32, clause (5) of the Evidence Act and not under clause (2) or (6) of that section, but the party making it must have had special means of knowledge. Ram Nath v. Murugappa, 33 Ind. Cas. 969 = 1916 M. W. N. 208, see also Chuah Hori v. Khair 31 Ind. Cas. 637 = 19 C. W. N. 787 P. C. Jaitram bhai v. Chabildas 13 B. 7. In Bidya dhar v. Pran Gopal 5 C. W. N. 227, the Court admitted a horoscope, not qua horoscope, but as a statement under clause 5 made either as family astrologer or a statement adopted by the father. In Kumar Krishna chariar v. Perazelli, 19 Ind. Cas. 452 = 25 M. 161. Hute C. J. said: "An objection was taken to the evidence of this witness with reference to the horoscope on the ground that the witness was not the writer and that he had no personal knowledge of its correctness. The man who made the horoscope is not called. The learned Judge seems to think that this horoscope as a piece of evidence is worthless, and I think so too. Where a full horoscope prepared from a short horoscope was produced in evidence and the person who prepared it was examined as a witness it was held that so far as the date of birth and the parentage were concerned, the horoscope represented what had been stated to the witness who prepared it before the present dispute had arisen and could be used both as corroborative or rebutting evidence and for the purpose of refreshing memory. Harbahadur v. Chand Ray, 15 Ind. Cas. 400 = 21 O. C. 268. So a horoscope can be used to help in proving the date of birth stated in it only under section 159 or 160 of the Evidence Act, if the person who read it soon after it was written, is examined as a witness. Shankergu v. Chumung, 71 Ind. Cas. 140. A horoscope may be put in as an admission. Raja Goundan v. Jaya Goundan 17 M. 134.

In Amarjyal Singh v. Ilia Pershad Sahu 5 Pat. L. J. 605 = 11 P. L. T. 511 = 58 Ind. Cas. 72, a horoscope of Parbhu Dayal, purporting to be made by one Ram Andan Nam who was dead, was tendered in evidence, and proved by his son to be in his father's handwriting. The question was whether the horoscope could be admitted in evidence to prove the age of Parbhu Dayal. In admitting the horoscope Miller C. J. observed: "There is no dispute as to the relationship between any of the parties and but for the illustration (f) appended to the section, I should have taken the view that the horoscope is not admissible for the purpose for which it was tendered. I am constrained to hold that the document is admissible however by reason of the illustration. The question was also considered by Coxe and Beachcroft JJ. in Monindra Mohan Roy v. Ramkrishna, where earlier authorities were reviewed and it was decided that statements as to age made by deceased persons in the circumstances contemplated in the section were admissible. The horoscope however is merely evidence and is not conclusive and in face of the other conflicting evidence in the case I should have been inclined to remand the case for further consideration on this point had such a course been necessary. A statement about the date of the son's birth by a father at the time of preparing a horoscope is admissible in evidence under s. 32 cl. (5) as it was the date of commencement of a relationship. Sunamalai v. Sunamalai, 10 L. W. 68 = 50 Ind. Cas. 110.

Principle of authentication 3 The principle of authentication as applicable to proof of the execution or genuineness of a writing, is in general applicable to a writing offered under the present exception. Slaney v. Wade, 1 M. & Cr. 335, Frederic Perrage 10 O. & F. 161. No special consideration here.

S. 32. need attention, except as regards the necessity of proving the handwriting of entries in family Bibles or the like. The fundamental idea of authentication is to connect the writing with the person alleged to be its author. Now under the present exception the testimonial statement may be the assertion either of an individual member or of the family. Hence, it is not necessary, where a family Bible or family tree is offered as embodying the family repute to prove the entry to be that of an individual member, for its adoption by the family makes it a family assertion. Wigmore § 1496, see also Perth Peerage Case, 2 H L C 876; Hubbard v Lees, L R 1 Exch 258. The reason for the exception in the case of family tree is thus laid down by Bigelow C J in North Brookfield v Warren, 16 Gray 174: "They are in their nature public, openly exhibited, and well known to the family, and therefore may be presumed to possess that authenticity which is derived from the tacit and common assent of those interested in the fact which they record." But such public exposure of the writing is not needed when it contains the signature of a specific member of the family and his signature is authenticated. So a signed chart of a family was admitted. Monkton v Att Gen, 2 Russ & M 163. In admitting the signed chart Lord Brougham said: "It is urged that the principle of all those cases would exclude such a pedigree as this, which was not hung up or in any way made public. But why is it that publicity is relied upon in those cases? Why is it that family Bible the public wearing of ring, the public exposure of an inscription upon a tombstone and the public hanging up of the family pedigree in the manor are all relied upon in respect of their publicity? It is because in all those cases the publicity applies a defect, there existing but not here existing,—the want of connection between the pedigree, the tombstone, the ring, or the Bible with particular individual members of the family. The presumption is it would not be suffered to remain if the whole of the family did not more or less adopt it and thereby give it authenticity." So also in the case of family Bible there is no necessity of proving the handwriting of the entries. "Proof of the handwriting or authorship of the entries is not required when the book is shown to have been the family Bible or Testament for then the entries as evidence derive their weight not more from the fact that they were made by any particular person than that being in that place a family registry they are to be taken as assented to by those in whose custody the book has been kept." Alry J in Jones v Jones, 45 Md 160, Wigmore § 1496, Berkeley Peerage Case, 4 Camp 421 per Lords Ellenborough and Redesdale, Hubbard v Lees, 20 L J Ex 169, Goodright v Moss 2 Cowp 591, Slaney v Wade, 7 Sim 593, Shrewsbury Peerage, 7 H L 1.

Value of statements under clauses (5) and (6). Statements of the kind referred to in section 32, clause (5) of the Evidence Act may be evidence, but they must be received with great caution, since they are always open to the objection that the parties making them are not subject to any cross examination, the caution is all the more needed especially when the parties making them could not have had any certain knowledge of the matters regarding which they made the statement. Sangram Singh v Rajam Bai, D C R. Part V 63. "Courts of Justice lend a very unwilling ear to statements that a dead man has said," said Mr Justice Cotton of the United States Supreme Court. Lea v Fuller, County Copper Co 21 How (U S) 493, 504. It has been well said that testimony as to declarations of a deceased person should undoubtedly be disregarded upon the least conflict with the probabilities of the case. Matter of Berts, (Surrogate Court) 43 Mis C (N Y) 437. Testimony to declarations of deceased persons concerning matters of pedigree is notoriously unsafe fact for the same reasons that testimony to declarations of deceased persons on other subjects is weighed with great caution. Moore's Facts on the Weight and Value of Evidence §§ 1150, 1156, Matter of Williams, 128 Cal 533. Wood v Tallman, 65 N J Eq 310. Similarly in Smith v Cooper, 16 Beav 101. Sir J Romilly M R said: "It is a trite but just remark, that if one link in a pedigree be assumed any two persons may be proved to be related, and it is the usual observation in these cases, that the difficulty consists in properly weighing and considering the evidence relating to some one link, which connects the line of the claimant with that of the intestate. It is a rule of evidence in ped."

eases, that declarations post litem motam are not receivable in evidence. All this is evidence of declarations made before any question arose as to the succession to this property, but there is no trace that they were remembered or acted upon until after the contest had arisen. And though no complaint can justly be urged against persons for not giving the evidence before the occasion requires it yet it must always be borne in mind in judging of the evidence of this description, how extremely prone persons are to believe what they wish. And where persons are once persuaded of the truth of such a fact, as that a particular person was the uncle of their father, it is every day's experience that their imagination is apt to supply the evidence of that which they believe to be true. It is a matter of frequent observation, that persons dwelling for a long time on facts, which they believe must have occurred, and trying to remember whether they did so or not, come at last to persuade themselves that they actually recollect the occurrence of circumstances which, at first, they only begin by believing must have happened. What was originally the result of imagination becomes in time the result of recollection, and the judging of which, and drawing just inferences from which, is rendered much more difficult by the circumstance, that, in many cases, persons do really by attentive and careful recollection, recall the memory of facts which had faded away, and were not, when first questioned, present to the mind of the witness. Thus it is that a clue given or a note made at the time frequently recalls facts which had passed from the memory of the witness. I look, therefore, with great care and considerable jealousy on the evidence of witnesses of this description even when I believe them to be sincere and to be unable to derive any advantage from their testimony. Once impress the witness with the belief that Charles Crutch, the father of the intestate was the brother of their grandfather, and the further steps follow rapidly enough. In the course of a few years, by constant talk and discussion of the matter, and by endeavouring to remember past conversations, without imputing anything like wilful and corrupt perjury to witnesses of this description I believe that they may conscientiously bring themselves to believe that they remembered conversations and declarations which they had wholly forgotten in 1830, and that they may in truth bona fide believe, that they have heard and remember conversations and observations which in truth never existed but are the mere offspring of their imagination. It is also necessary to remember that in these cases from the nature of the evidence given, it is not subject to any worldly sanction, it being obviously impossible that any witness should be convicted of perjury for speaking of what he remembers to have been said in a conversation with a deceased person." Not Et 190

CLAUSE VII

Scope of the clause. The "transaction" spoken of in section 13, clause (a) is one by which any right or custom was created, etc. It applies to private as well as public rights. Customs also may be private as well as public, as for instance the custom of a particular family as to a particular order of succession (Rajah Rih Kissen Singh v Ramjoy 19 W. R. C. R. 8) but generally speaking customs are in their nature public or general. Reputation as to matters of general interests is not confined to oral declarations. It may be evidenced by recitals in deeds or "other documents" in the language of this clause. So it is clear the words "statements, written or verbal" at the beginning of this section do not govern this clause. Parol evidence of reputation as to matters of general interests or rights may be given under clause (4) and not under this clause. In England such records of private boundaries title or possession are not admissible in evidence. The law is thus laid down by Kenyon L. C. J. in Morewood v Wood, 14 East 329, where he said "Evidence of reputation upon general points is receivable because all mankind being interested it is natural to suppose that they may be conversant with the subjects and that they should discourse together about them having all the same means of information. But how can this apply to private titles? How is it possible for strangers to know anything of what concerns only these private titles?" In India under clause 7 of section 32 private rights as well as customs can be proved by deed, will or other documents if they relate to any such transact

S. 32. as is mentioned in section 13, clause (a) On principle there is nothing to object to the reception of such evidence. Under this clause private boundaries, titles or possession can be proved. "If such evidence may be offered to show customs and boundaries of a private minor, boundaries of a parish or duties (Stell v Prickett, 2 Stark 466, per Abbott C J) the principle may well cover any other property rights in which a number are interested in general inquiry and discussion, whether the right is in substantive law called a public or a private one." Wigmore § 1587. So in Weeks v Sparke, 1 M & S 691, the distinction between private and public rights have been repudiated and a new test of admissibility was laid down. In that case Bayley J said "I take it that where the term 'public right' is used, it does not mean public' in the literal sense but is synonymous with 'general'—that is what concerns a multitude of persons. In the same case Dampier J also added (Reputation evidence) has been extended to other rights which strictly cannot be called public, such as manors, parishes, and a modu, which comes the nearest to the case. That strictly speaking is a private right, but has been considered as public as regards the admissibility of this species of evidence, because it affects a large number of occupiers within a district." But in England this tendency of extending the admission of Reputation evidence to private rights was checked by Baron Parke in Dunraven v Llewellyn, 13 Q. B. 809 (1830) and an arbitrary distinction in this respect between public and private property rights was laid down. In that case he said "Reputation is not admissible in the case of such separate rights, each being private unless the proposition can be supported that because there are many such rights the rights have a public character. We think this position cannot be maintained. It is impossible to say in such a case where the dividing point is, what is the number of rights which is to cause their nature to be changed and to give them a public character? The number of these private rights does not make them to be of a public nature." R v Bedfordshire, 4 E & B 535, Doe v Thomas, 14 East 323.

But in America the result is otherwise. The earliest English practice had clearly been to admit reputation as to private titles, and it is therefore natural to find, on question of private boundary, that reputation was regularly admitted without question in the early American cases. Thayer Cas. Et. 471 note. Wigmore § 1587. But even in America this application of the principle is confined to reputation of boundaries. That the title cannot be so evidenced is conceded. Ibid.

Old maps and old surveys so far as they have been used and resorted to by the community in dealing with the land, may be taken as representing, after the test of use and criticism, the settled reputation of the community as to the correct tenor of the map or the survey. R v Milton, 1 C & K 62. Himmon v Brad Street, 10 Ex 390. Pipe v Fulcher 28 L J Q. B. 12, Daniel v Hildes, 7 Ex 429. Bullen v Michel, 4 Dow 297, Smith v Earl Brownlow, L R 2 E. 252, Fouke v Berrington (1914) 2 Ch 303, Freeman v Reed, 4 B & S 14. Badder v Bridges, 34 W R (Eng) 514. So also under this clause just as of private title, such as old deeds and leases may in a given case just as effectively be the vehicle of reputation. White v Lisle, 4 Madd 223, Coother 1 M & M 399, Plarton v Dine 10 B & C 19, Brett v Brett 1 M & M 418, Curzon v Iomar 5 Esp 60. Doe v Whitcomb 4 H L 425, Carnarion v Bellebois, 13 M & W 313, Beaufort v Smith 4 Ex 47. Wigmore § 1592.

In R v Milton, 1 C & K. 53 upon the trial of an indictment against a parish for the non repair of a highway, where, in order to show that the question was not within the parish, a map was produced which had been made some thirty years before by a surveyor from information derived from a parishioner who had pointed out to him the boundaries, Felme J held that proof could be given of the old man's death, the map would be admissible as evidence of reputation, though it came from the chest of the parish itself. Nort Fr 190.

Clause (7) of section 32 does not declare all reputation to be relevant, only that which consists of statements contained in a deed, will or other document relating to any transactions by which any right or custom was acquired or modified, recognised, asserted, or denied, or which was inconsistent with its existence. The clause therefore, does not provide for the admissibility of parol evidence of reputation in the case to which it applies. Of the documents which are admissible under this clause, judgment and decrees are not in the least important. Field Et 6th Ed p 144, Bansi Singh v Mir Amir Ali 11 C W N 703. But where the question was whether a tenant held lands under the Nahdi or Bhaoli system of rent, and the Court founded its decision upon a statement in a hebanama executed by a tenant's deceased grandfather, held that the hebanama was inadmissible in evidence under s 32 (7) read with section 13 (a) of the Evidence Act. Bansi v Mir Amir, 11 C W N 703.

Customs To prove or disprove a right or custom, it is not enough to adduce evidence of a transaction in which or in the course of which the right or custom was asserted or denied. The transaction will be relevant under section 13 (a) of the Evidence Act, if it be only by which the right or custom was asserted or denied. Bansi Singh v Mir Amir Ali, 11 C W N 703. In a suit to establish the existence of a family custom, a deed containing a recital of the custom as alleged in the plaint and a covenant to do nothing contrary to it, was tendered in evidence by the plaintiffs. The deed had been executed before suit by the present plaintiffs and by another plaintiff who had died after the institution of the suit. Held that the deed was admissible in evidence on the plaintiff's behalf, though they could themselves be called as witnesses but though the deed was admissible, the custom as against the defendants must be proved ali unde. Huronath v Nittanand 10 B L R 263.

Ancient possession. In England the rule has always been that private rights could not be proved by reputation, except by what was called evidence of ancient possession. Therefore ancient documents (provided they are proved to be genuine and come from the proper custody) were always receivable to prove even private rights. Nort Et 191. So ancient documents which purport to be part of the transactions to which they relate as distinct from a mere narrative of them and which are produced from a proper custody, not only prove themselves, but are received as evidence that those transactions actually occurred. This is so whether the rights in question be public or private provided the controversy refers to a time so remote as it is unreasonable to expect a higher species of evidence. Powell Et 285. In Roe v Harings 7 East 279, Lord Ellenborough thus laid down the reason of the rule: "Ancient deeds proved to have been found amongst deeds and evidences of law may be given in evidence, although the execution of them cannot be proved and the reason given is that it is hard to prove ancient things and the finding them in such a place is a presumption they were fairly and honestly obtained, and reserved for use, and are free from suspicion of dishonesty. This paper therefore having been found amongst the muniments of the family accredited and preserved we think that it was evidence to be left to the jury of the amount of ancient rent at the time it bears date." So ancient tithes are received to prove the amount of vicarial tithes. Pearson v Beek 8 Ex 452. see also Bishop of Meath v Marquis of Winchester, 3 Bing N C 183, Doe v Pulman, 3 Q B 622. In Malcolmson v O'Dea, 10 H L Cas 593, it was laid down that the true ground for admitting a lease is that it shows an act or acts of ownership. Thus the production from proper custody of an ancient lease granted by A is evidence of an act of ownership over the locus in quo by A at that date, and is presumptive evidence that he was then owner in fee simple of such land. Clarkson v Woodhouse 3 Doug 189, see also Blandy-Jelins v Earl of Dunraven (1899) 2 Ch 121, Powell Et 287. So to prove a personal prescriptive right of fishery, as appurtenant to a manor old licences on the Court rolls, granted by the lords of the manor, are admissible. Rogers v Allen, 1 Camp 309. Old rent rolls or Court rolls are received to prove rights to which they refer. Heath v Dane, (1907) 2 Ch 678. Entries in old parish books are admissible as evidence to prove who were the owners or occupiers of the property at a previous time. Smith v Andrews, (1891) 2 Ch 678, Powell p 287. So it is clear that the existence of a document of ownership of land (a deed, lease, or license) may be evidence that the maker of the document had possession of the land at the time of making it. It is occasionally said that, the

S. 32. documents themselves are acts of possession, but that is incorrect. These documents are merely evidence of possession. The rule is thus explained by Lord Cairns, L. C. in Bristow v Cormican, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641, 663, 688 "Old leases have always been considered to be admissible as being evidence of facts of ownership. I understand this to rest on the principle that when at a distant period as to which there is no more direct evidence available, you find a person claiming to be the owner of property, and willing to make himself responsible as lessor the title to it, and another person willing to agree to give rent for the property and to enter into a solemn engagement as a tenant of it, admitting his landlord's title, these circumstances, are of themselves admissible as evidence of title. They are real transactions between man and man, not intelligible except on the footing of title, or at least an honest belief in title. The payment of rent under such lease is a further and additional fact also admissible as evidence on the same principle." In the same case Lord Blackburn said "In as much as after long time all the witnesses who could prove such possession are dead, the law permits ancient documents, either with or without evidence of ancient payment of rent to be given as evidence from which the jury may properly draw an inference that there was such possession. For in the ordinary course of things men do not make leases unless they act on them, and lessees do not pay rent unless they are in possession, so that ancient payment of rent adds weight to the ancient indenture."

In Malcolmson v O Dea, 10 H. L. Cas. 593, the Court laid down the reason for the rule thus "The proof of ancient possession is always attended with difficulty. Time has removed the witnesses who could prove acts of ownership of the property by personal knowledge, and resort must necessarily be had to written evidence. In some cases written statements of title are admitted even when they amount to mere assertion, as in the case of a right affecting the public generally, but the entry now under consideration is admissible according to a rule equally applicable to a fishery in a private pond as to one in a public navigable river. That rule is, that ancient documents coming out of proper custody, and purporting upon the face of them to show exercise of ownership, such as a lease or a license, may be given in evidence without proof of possession or payment of rent under them as being in themselves acts of ownership and proof of possession. This rule is sometimes stated with the qualification, provided that possession is proved to have followed similar documents, or that there is some proof of actual enjoyment in accordance with the title to which the documents relate. And certainly in the case of property allowing of continuous enjoyment, without proof of actual exercise of the right any number of mere pieces of paper or parchment purporting to be leases or licenses ought to be of no avail. It may be a question whether the absence of proof of enjoyment consistent with such documents goes to the admissibility or only to the weight of the evidence. Probably the latter."

In Blandey Jenkins v Durnaven, (1899) 2 Ch. 121, an action to restrain alleged acts of trespass on unenclosed land in Wales, there was a question as to the admissibility of a document dated in 1659. In holding it admissible Lord Macnaghten said "I cannot bring myself to doubt the admissibility of the document. What it is worth is another thing. It is an ancient document and cannot tell whether an ancient document is admissible in evidence against any body till you look at it. You must look at it to see what it purports to contain. When you look at the document you find it contains a great deal. It bears upon the face of it that Jenkins must have been in possession, or else he would not have brought an action of trespass. He speaks of trespass. The words used in the document itself. It is not an act of ownership. I agree, but it is a document which shows that the person in possession is indicating that possession against some body by making him take off his cattle. To my mind it is evidence of an act of ownership. I do not say it is an act of ownership." This doctrine is now well settled in English Law and is applicable in proof of title by ancient possession in prior generations, where no evidence has survived except the documents themselves which embodied acts of claim of ownership. Clarkson v Woodhouse 5 T. R. 412, Rogers v Allen 1 Camp. 309, Doe v Askew 10 East 520, Coombs v Coethier, M. & M. 398 Doe v Putman, 3 Q. B. 622 Wymore v

Other cases A deed of mortgage containing an assertion of title as owner by the mortgagor is relevant under a 13 of the Evidence Act as evidence of the title asserted. Where the mortgagor is dead the recitals in the deed as to how he got the title are also evidence under s 32 cl (7) as statements made by a deceased person in document relating to a transaction mentioned in section 13. Nallaswami Mudaliar v Ravan Bibi, (1921) M W N 560=14 L W 327, see also Visalakshi v Dorasinga, 29 Ind Cas 974. Under section 32 of the Evidence Act a statement of boundaries in documents of title is legal evidence in a suit between third parties, if the third parties are dead or outside the jurisdiction of the Court. Lalu Singh v Sahadeo Singh, 36 Ind Cas 610. The case against this contention is Ningaua v Bhurmappa, 23 B 63 but this decision seems to have been dissented from in all the High Courts in India save that of Bombay. Vide Saripathi v Fota, 25 Ind Cas 747=(1914) M W N 779 (Madras), Abdullah v Kunia 12 Ind Cas 149=14 C L J 467=16 C W N 252 (Calcutta), Imrit v Sridhar Panday, 13 Ind Cas 120=15 C L J 7=17 C W N 108 (Cal). Natuary v Allhu, 18 Ind. Cas 752=11 A L J 139 (Allahabad). In all these cases it has been held that under section 32 of the Evidence Act a statement of boundaries in documents of title is legal evidence. The only case which expressed a contrary view was that of Abdul Ali v Syed Rejan Ali, 21 Ind Cas 618=19 C W N 468. But that case dealt only with documents prepared in the course of litigation and not with transactions affecting title. In a suit for recovery of possession of certain lands as niskar brahmattar the plaintiffs relied upon a recital of brahmattar title in the will of the father and a recital in a judgment in a claim case, which was not inter parties, to prove their title. Held that the recital in the will was not admissible in evidence under section 32 (7) of the Evidence Act read with section 13 (a) and that the recital in the judgment not inter parties was not evidence. Satindra v Krishna, 36 Ind Cas 882; Basu Nath v Jagat Kishore, 35 Ind Cas 298=23 C L J 583=20 C W N 643.

CLAUSE VII

Scope of the section The meaning of this clause is that when a number of persons assemble together to give vent to one common statement, which statement expresses the feelings or impressions made in their minds at the time of making it that statement may be repeated by the witnesses and is evidence. R v Ram Dutt, 23 W R Cr 35 (38). These statements are admissible on the general principle that they appear to be natural and sincere. Illustration (n) exemplifies this clause. This illustration is based on the case of Du Bos v Bresford 2 Camp 512. This was an action for destroying a picture, the impression produced upon the mind by the picture was allowed to be proved on the defence, by witnesses who swore to the exclamations and declarations of other spectators not being themselves put into the witness box. In that case the plaintiff's painter had painted the picture of the defendant's brother in law and his wife. The former was extremely plain and the latter very handsome. Some misunderstanding having arisen the defendant refused to receive the picture whereupon the plaintiff exhibited it in public with the title "Beauty and the Beast". The defendant cut the picture to pieces, and therefore the action was brought to recover damages. The defence was, that the picture was a libel, calculated to bring the defendant into public ridicule and that he was therefore justified in destroying it. To prove this, witnesses were called who swore to the impression produced by the picture on their own minds, viz that it was intended to be a representative of the defendant's brother in law and his wife, and to the statements of recognition by other spectators. The evidence was received by Lord Ellenborough, who held "that the declarations of the spectators while they looked at the picture in the exhibit room were evidence to show that the figures portrayed were meant [rather were understood] to represent the defendant's sister and brother in law." "What the witness said as to his own feelings was in the nature of original evidence. What he reported the bystanders to have said was in the nature of hearsay. Now the latter is receivable as relevant." Nort Et 192 193. But Prof Wigmore thinks such utterances should be admitted as evidence of knowledge or belief and not being obnoxious to Hearsay rule. "Conduct and word utterances" says

S 33 the learned writer "may betray knowledge or belief of the actor or speaker, in so far as the specific act or utterance is of a tenor which cannot well be supposed to have been willed without the minor existence of that knowledge or belief."

The important thing is that, so far as the evidential fact consists in an utterance of words, it is receivable for the present purpose as circumstantial evidence, and that so long as it is offered for that purpose only not as an assertion to be credited like testimony, it is not obnoxious to the Hearsay rule. For example, A's mention of X's insolvency is receivable as circumstantial evidence of A's knowledge, but not as testimonial evidence of X's insolvency. Wigmore § 266. It is submitted that when such utterances are offered to prove a testimonial fact it may well be considered as an exception to the Hearsay rule and this clause has its proper place under this section although the illustration (n) is misplaced. So also to prove that a libel referred to the plaintiff, evidence that he was publicly jeered at in consequence of the libel is admissible. Coo' v Ward M & P 99, Phip Ex 339. In Chase v Howell, 151 Mass 422 (Am) notice of the rottenness of a tree's root was in issue and to show knowledge by the city remarks of citizens were offered. In admitting the evidence Knoullon J said "The acts of persons in looking at the root were an important part of the evidence. From this it might be inferred that they noticed the decayed condition of the roots. The remarks made at the time rendered it certain that the view of the roots gave notice of the defect to those who then saw them. So also on a charge of conspiracy to procure crowds to assemble in order to excite terror in H M's subjects,—evidence by police of complaints of alarms and requests of military assistance made by several of the inhabitants is admissible without calling the declarants. R v Vincent, 9 C & P 275, Phip Ev 67. But the statement of a police officer based on the information collected from persons of different places and afterwards put in second hand before the Court cannot be received as evidence under the clause. Queen v Ram Dutt, 23 W R 30 Cr.

Illustration (n) Illustration (n) gives an instance of the sort of cases for which this clause is intended to provide. The object often is to ascertain not so much the feelings or expressions of individuals as the general feeling or impression of a crowd or other public body. This is to be gathered from the impressions used by individuals forming the crowd, and evidence of such expressions is admissible, though it is impossible to call the individuals themselves as witnesses. Cun Ev p 170. With regard to illustration (n) to section 32, I may observe that the case do not belong to section 32 at all. The evidence would be equally admissible, whether the bystanders could be called or not as witnesses. When the bystanders, on seeing a caricature, called out 'there is X,' and evidence is given of their words, what is relied on is not their statements, but the fact of recognition, the fact, that is, that the caricature at once recalls the person X to the minds of those who see it. Mark Ev p 34.

Condition of admissibility under clause (8) "It will be observed, in the sub clauses as in illustration, reference is made to a number or crowd of persons. If these persons were known to the witness and could be called, his statement could not be admitted under the section. If they were not known or could not be found, it is not easy to see how the fact that there were many of them is material. In the English cases it does not seem to have been proved that the persons who made the observations could not be called." Cun Ev 11th Ed p 8.

33 Evidence given by a witness in a judicial proceeding or before any person authorized by law to take it, is relevant for the purpose of proving, in a subsequent judicial proceeding, or in a later stage of the same judicial proceeding, the truth of the facts which it states, when the witness is dead or cannot be found, or is incapable of giving evidence, or is kept out of the way by the adverse party, or if his presence cannot be obtained without an amount of delay or ex pense which, under the circumstances of the case, the Court considers unreasonable S. 33.

Provided—

that the proceeding was between the same parties or their representatives in interest, that the adverse party in the first proceeding had the right and opportunity to cross-examine, that the questions in issue were substantially the same in the first as in the second proceeding

Explanation—A criminal trial or inquiry shall be deemed to be a proceeding between the prosecutor and the accused within the meaning of this section

Principle The securities which have been devised by municipal law for ensuring the veracity and completeness of the evidence given in Courts of Justice, vary, as might be expected, in different countries, and with systems of law to which they are attached. Best Ev § 54 In Anglo-Saxon Jurisprudence all depositions of witnesses must satisfy the following tests, namely (1) they must be taken under oath or solemn affirmation, and (2) when deposing the witness must be brought face to face to the party against whom he is deposing in open Court, so that he may be cross-examined by the latter. This security is termed by Betham as confrontation. Betham's Rationale of Judicial Evidence, Book III, Ch. XXX. This was established long ago. "The other side ought not to be deprived of the opportunity of confronting the witnesses and examining them publicly which has always been found the most effectual method of discovering truth." Duke of Dorset v Girdler, Fench's Pre Ch 531 (1720). The main and essential purpose of confrontation is to secure for the opponent the opportunity of cross-examination. The opponent demands confrontation, not for the idle purpose of gazing upon the witness, or of being gazed upon by him, but for the purpose of cross-examination which cannot be had except by the direct and personal putting of questions and obtaining of immediate answers. There is however a secondary advantage to be obtained by the personal appearance of the witness: the Judge and jury are enabled to obtain the elusive and incommunicable evidence of a witness's deportment while testifying, and a certain subjective moral effect is produced upon the witness. This secondary advantage, however, does not arise from the confrontation of the opponent and the witness, it is not the consequence of those two being brought face to face. It is the witness's presence before the tribunal that secures this secondary advantage—which might equally be obtained whether the opponent was or was not allowed to cross-examine. In other words this secondary advantage is a result accidentally associated with the process of confrontation, whose original and fundamental object is the opponent's cross-examination. Wigmore § 1395. Nevertheless the secondary advantage incidentally obtained for the tribunal by the witness's presence before it—the demeanour evidence—is an advantage to be insisted upon where it can be had. No one has doubted that it is highly desirable if it is only available. But it is merely desirable. Where it cannot be obtained it need not be required. It is no essential part of the notion of confrontation if it stands on no better footing than other evidence to which especial value is attached and just as the original of a document (§ 66) or a preferred witness (§ 69) may be dispensed with in cases of unavailability, so a demeanour-evidence may be dispensed with in necessity. Such necessity is established by the unavailability of demeanour witness by reason of death, illness, and the like. Wigmore § 1396. So when the unavailability of a witness is proved his evidence is admitted because "on a former trial he was under oath and subject to cross-examination by the other party." The main object of producing the witness upon the stand had been attained. Per Boenman J in U S v Reynolds, 1 Utah 322, Per Earle J in People v Fish, 125 N Y 160=2 N E 319.

In stating that this rule mainly depends on the right of cross-examination, care must be taken to guard against the error of imagining that, whenever a party has had the right of cross-examining a witness, he will be liable to have the statement of that witness adduced against him in any subsequent action. This will be so only in the event of his opponent being the same in both suits (Morgan v Nichol, 36 L J C P 86), because the right to use evidence, other than admissions, being co-extensive with the liability to be bound thereby, the adversary in the second suit has no power to offer evidence in his own favour, which had it been tendered against him would have been clearly inadmissible. Doe v Derby, 1 A & C 783, 786, Taylor § 469. The principle involved in requiring identity of the matter in issue is to secure that in the former proceeding the parties were not without the opportunity of examining and cross-examining on the very point upon which their evidence is adduced in the subsequent proceeding. And though separate proceedings may involve issues, of which some only are common to both, the evidence to those common issues given in the former proceeding may (on the conditions mentioned in section 33 arising) be given in the subsequent proceedings. In re Ram Reddi, 3 M 48 (52), Bal Gangadhar v Shrinivas, 39 B 441=19 C W N 729=42 I A 729 (P C).

Scope of the section. Declarations under oath are admissible (a) When the witness who made them is dead, (b) or is physically or mentally incapable of being present at the trial, (c) or is kept out of the way by the adverse party, (d) or if his presence cannot be obtained without an amount of delay or expense which, under the circumstances of the case, the Court considers unreasonable.

Provided the following conditions exist (a) The person against whom the evidence is to be given must have had the right and opportunity to cross-examine the witness when his examination was taken. (b) The question in issue must be the same as in the proceeding in which the testimony was taken. (c) The proceeding, if civil, must be between the same parties or their representatives in interest, if criminal, must relate to the same crime and be against the same person. Mc Kehys Ev § 164. The chief reason for the exclusion of hearsay evidence are the want of the sanction of an oath, and of any opportunity to cross-examine the witness. But where testimony is given under oath, in a judicial proceeding, in which the adverse litigant was a party and where he had the power to cross-examine, and was legally called upon so to do, the great and ordinary test of truth being no longer wanting, the testimony so given is admissible, after the decease of the witness in any subsequent suit between the same parties. Bull N P 239, 243, Mayor of Doncaster v Day 3 Taunt, 262, Glass v Beach, 5 Vt 172, Green Ev § 163. It is also received if the witness, though not dead, is out of the jurisdiction, or cannot be found after diligent search, or is insane or sick, and unable to testify, or has been summoned, but appears to have been kept away by the adverse party. Bull N P 239, 243, 1 Stark Evd 264, R v Eriswell, 3 T R 707, 721. But testimony thus offered is open to all the objections which might be taken if the witness were personally present. Wright v Tatham, 1 Ad & El 3, 21, Crary v Sprague, 12 Wm 41, Todd v E of Winchester, 3 C & P 387. "Section 33 of the Evidence Act gives the Court new powers, which require to be exercised with great caution. There is no doubt that it is still necessary (just as much as ever it was) to produce every witness at the trial unless it is proved to be either actually impossible to produce him, or to be so difficult to do so that it is, under the circumstances, unreasonable to insist on its production." Per Macpherson J in Queen v Mowjan 20 W R 69 Cr, R v Puyari, 4 C L R 511, R v Mullu 2 A 648. In England the law on the subject is thus stated. "Agreed in this case where a person has been examined in chancery, that in a cause at law between the same parties his deposition may be used in evidence, if it can be proved that the witness is dead, or by reason of sickness, etc., is not able to attend, or that he is out of the kingdom, or otherwise not amenable to the process of the Court. Fry v Wood (1737) 1 Atk 445. "In this case the deposition is the best that can possibly be had and that answers what the law requires." Gilbert Evidence 61. The deposition, if published could not be read at law unless it was proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the witness could not be examined at the trial. Per Lord Eldon in Andrews v Palmer, 1 Ves & R 2.

This section embodies the law as to depositions taken in a former proceeding being inadmissible upon a subsequent occasion. It specifies what evidence is receivable. This is whatever is delivered by a witness either in (a) judicial proceeding or (b) before any person authorized by law to take the evidence. Oral evidence therefore is as receivable as when it has been reduced to a formal deposition. Aort Ex 194

The deposition of a witness is not admissible under section 33 of the Evidence Act unless one or other of the requirements of the section is satisfied. The mere fact that the witness did not appear as a witness when cited on behalf of the defendant on one occasion but was not examined, will not be a ground of admitting the prior deposition. Brajaballav v Ahoy, 30 C W N 254=93 Ind Cas 115=A I R 1926 Cal 705, Ghulam Haider v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 542=30 P L R 192. It is impossible to lay down any hard and fast rule for the application of this section. Each case must depend upon its own facts and the matter is essentially one for the exercise of discretion on the part of the Court applying it. Jati Mali v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 765, Mahomed v Mussamat Fattan 12 P L R 1919. The power given by s 33 of the Evidence Act requires to be exercised with great care and caution and the Court must insist on a strict proof before holding that the requisite conditions have been satisfied. Nga Nyo v Emperor, 1 Rang 512=2 Bur L J, 205, per Oung J. It is far preferable and safer precaution that the Court should record its reasons for holding that the necessary conditions of this section have been complied with, prior to admitting such deposition into evidence. The section presupposes a consideration of the grounds prior to the admission of the evidence and if the reasons too are recorded prior to the admission the order would constitute a more convincing proof of the considered inadequacy of the grounds than a passage in the judgment subsequently written which may easily assume the appearance of a subsequent statement of excuses for a previous ill-considered action. Nga Nyo v Emperor, 1 Rang 512=2 Bur L J 205. Deposition in a civil suit is inadmissible in a criminal case between the parties where the witness is dead. Debi Singh v Emperor 52 Ind Cas 385=20 Cr L J 625. The application of s 33 of the Evidence Act, in criminal cases ought to be confined within the narrowest limits. Where a witness is material, justice requires that he should, if possible, be examined at the trial in the presence of the accused. Where the evidence of a witness is not material, there is no need to introduce it under s 33. It can only be in very extreme cases that it is right to make use of the evidence of an absent witness under s 33 in a criminal trial where the evidence, if true, would be extremely material. Emperor v Lakshman, 17 Bom L R 590.

In the absence of proof of circumstances specified in this section of the Evidence Act, the importing in bulk in a civil suit of depositions of witnesses recorded in a criminal trial was a serious irregularity. Bal Gangadhar Tilak v Shin Shrinubha Pandit 19 C W N 729=13 A L J 570=39 B 441=29 Ind Cas 639 P C. Admitting evidence given in a former judicial proceeding under section 33 Evidence Act, without explaining reason for so doing, is an irregularity. Empress v Fateh Ali, A W N 1881, 38, Queen Empress v Ram Sarup A W N 1898 22, Queen v Mewjan, 20 W R Or 69, Queen v Lakhun 21 W R Or 56. The copy of a deposition is inadmissible in evidence, under section 33 unless the deponent is dead or cannot be found or is incapable of giving evidence, or his presence cannot be obtained without an unreasonable amount of delay or expense, and, even then, only when the proceedings are between the same parties or their representatives in interest and the adverse party in the first proceeding had the right and opportunity to cross-examine and the questions in issue were substantially the same in the first as in the second proceedings. Chakauri Singh v Suraj Kuar 2 A L J 91. If that fact is a statement made by a person who is not called or cannot be called, the statement cannot be admitted unless it comes within the purview of subsequent sections of the Act, for example ss 32 and 33. Bela Ram v Mohabir Singh 9 A L J 351. To make a previous deposition relevant, three elements have to be established, namely first, that the proceeding was between the same parties or their representatives in interest, secondly, that the adverse party in the first proceeding had the opportunity and right to cross-examine, and, thirdly, that the questions in issue

S. 33. were substantially the same in the first as in the second proceeding Ray Kumari Nrutya Kali, 7 Ind Cas 892=12 C L J 434 Any statement which was not relevant evidence in the previous proceeding should not be admitted in the second proceeding Pellat v Fenars, 2 B & P 542 Small v Narain (1849) 13 Q B 840

Previous deposition can not be used in a subsequent suit merely to contradicting a person in such proceeding Bharamma v Ramanna, 78 Ind Cr 16

Affidavit An affidavit of a person who died subsequently and who had not been subjected to cross examination is not admissible under ss 37 and 33 of the Evidence Act Doraiswami v Balasundaram, 38 M L T (H C) 270=10 Ind Cas 243=A I R 1927 Mad 507=52 M L J 477, see also Mir Abd d Musst Bibi Sona, 8 Ind Crs 897

Admission of improper evidence by consent A and B were jointly tried. Prior to this, another criminal proceeding was going on between B and the present complainant. The Magistrate admitted depositions of three witnesses in the previous proceedings, in the present trial, although A was not a party to those proceedings at the request of the accused's counsel or at least with his consent. It was held that the evidence thus put in by consent was not really admissible as the conditions under which alone evidence of absent witnesses is admissible under s 33 of the Evidence Act had not been fulfilled Abdul Gaffar v Govind Prasad A I R 1928 Rang 284, Ghulam v Emperor, A I R 1934 Lah 542, Umar Hayi v Emperor, A I R 1923 Mad 32=46 M 117, Pattab Samu v Singaram, 41 M 731=34 M L J 526=46 Ind Cas 849, Koilar v Umar, 46 M 117. But in a civil case such deposition is allowed by consent. So evidence in a subsequent suit by consent of parties even though such witnesses are alive Lakshmi devarma v Krishniah 39 M L T 198=104 Ind Cas 519. An irregularity in the admission of such evidence is cured by consent of the parties Radha Kishen v Kidar Nath, 22 A L J 761=L R 5A 538=46A 815=50 Ind Cas 874=A I R 1924 All 845. The provisions of this section are intended for the benefit of a party to a suit and he may waive their benefit at any rate in a civil suit where no question of public policy is involved Jaimab Bibi v Hk. Raily 43M 609=38 M L J 582=28 M L T 23=56 Ind Crs 907=1931 M W N 360, see also Lakshman v Amrut Gopal 24 B 591=2 Bom L R 94

Previous deposition, how proved What the deceased witness testified may be proved by any person who will swear from his own memory, or from notes taken by any person who will swear to their accuracy Mayor of Doncaster v Day 3 Taunt 262 Chess v Chess, 17 Serg & R 409. It can be proved by the Judge's own notes Glassford on Evid 602, R v Gard, 8 C & P 21. "One mode of proof of such depositions is the production of the Judge's notes or the oath of some one who was present and heard the evidence delivered by the witness." Morgan, 6 Cox 107, R v Bird 5 Cox 11, Struett v Boringdon, 5 Esp 4, in Lord Palmerston's Case, the evidence was rejected, because the witness could give the effect only, and not the words. But it may be doubted whether such manner of particularity is requisite, for the very words could seldom be remembered after a lapse of time. Where a note has been made by a reporter or a shorthand writer he could of course use the note to refresh his memory, and from such a source a shorthand writer might be able to swear to the very words. See O'Connor's Case, A & T 275. Nort Et 194. It was formerly held, that the person called to prove what a deceased witness testified on in former trial must be required to repeat his precise words and that testimony merely to the effect that they were inadmissible R v Jolliffe, 4 T R 290. But this strictness is now insisted upon. It seems therefore, to be generally considered sufficient that the witness is able to state the substance of what was sworn on the former trial. Cornell v Green 10 Serg & R 14, 16. Miles v O'Hara, 4 Binn 108, Cox v Lenox 5 Randolph 31. R v Rowley 1 Mood Cr C 111, Chess v Chess 17 Serg & R 409, Jackson v Butley 2 Johns 17. But he must state in substance the substance of what was said on the particular subject which he is called to prove. It is not enough to state only what was said on that subject by the deceased, on his examination in chief without also giving the substance of what he said upon it in his cross examination it is inadmissible Wolf v Wyeth, 11 Serg & R 140. Where the depositions are written it may be proved either by office copy, or examined or certified copy Phip v Ath Ed p 409 The words descriptive of the witness put at the head of a deposition, form not part of it and are no evidence to prove the facts stated Magbula v Ahmad, 26 A 108 (P C)=31 I A 98=8 C W, N 241=6 Bom L R 238, Lalshman v Jalim, 39 C L J 90=80 Ind Cas 357, see also Mukhammad v Abdul 50 Ind Cas 431 Before admitting a certified copy of a previous deposition, the identity of the person who gave his evidence must be proved Bagaballa v Alshay, 30 C W N 254

Oral evidence The deposition may have been oral as in the common case of a via voce witness in a civil suit If that oral deposition can be proved to the satisfaction of the Judge, it is as admissible as a written deposition But it is of course open to much observation in as much as the memory is treacherous, while a written record of what is said embodies Later scripta manet Some forcible remarks on the superiority of written over oral testimony will be found in the case of Bumaree Lal v Mahawajah Hetunain, 7 M I A 156 Nori Lr 194

Judicial Proceeding The evidence taken in the ejectment proceedings before the revenue authorities cannot be legally relied upon in a suit in Civil Court to recover possession by persons ejected in consequence of the proceedings in the Revenue Court Saru Khan v Jan Mahmud 106 Ind Cas 313=A I R 1923 Lah 43 Where certain proceedings were conducted before a Magistrate who had no jurisdiction to conduct it, the evidence of witnesses examined in such a proceeding is inadmissible on a retrial before a competent Court Bula Singh v Goun, 27 P L R 447=7 Lah 398=97 Ind Cas 752=27 Cr L J 1168=A I R 1926 Lah 592 The evidence taken in the summary cases is no doubt admissible upon the conditions and for the purposes described in the Evidence Act, et q under section 33 previous evidence is relevant under certain circumstances where, for instance, the person gave the evidence in the previous proceedings and cannot be found Nga Sen v Nga Pu 22 Ind Cas 676=U B R (1913) I, 181

Before any person authorised by law It is not necessary that the evidence should have been given in a judicial proceeding Any deposition taken by a Magistrate in his ministerial capacity could be receivable, if not excluded on any one of the grounds mentioned in the section So a deposition taken before a Coroner (R v Rig 4 F & T 1935, State v Campbell 1 Rich 124, R v Butcher, 64 J P 608 but see R v Coule, 71 J P 152) a British consul of Zanzibar (Empress v Dossay, 3 B 334) a Special Registrar (Jeheto v Jayanessa, 18 C W N 605, Jekale v Jayanessa, 20 Ind Cas 661) an arbitrator (R v Amanulla, 12 B L R App 15) or a Commissioner appointed under Civil Procedure Code to take down evidence (Civil Pro Code Order XXVI) is admissible in a subsequent case In earlier Cutch cases it was held that deposition taken by the Commissioner should be formally tendered in evidence (Astarum v Vundo, 3 C W N 239, Kusum v Satyram 30 C 999, Hemanta v Banu 9 C W N 794) but in Dhanu Ram v Murl 36 C 567 a contrary view was taken The evidences of witnesses examined in an enquiry held by a Sub Registrar under s 41(2) of the Registration Act as to the genuineness of a will is admissible in evidence in a subsequent suit between the same parties raising an issue as to the genuineness of the will if it is to be proved that the witnesses were dead at the time of the suit and that the adverse party at the enquiry before the Sub Registrar had an opportunity of cross examining the witnesses Lanka Lakshmanna v Lanka Vaidhan, 35 M L J 657=(1918) M W N 931

Previous deposition should have been recorded in accordance with law In a trial the deposition of a witness must be recorded in accordance with law In criminal cases such law is laid down by sections 263 264, Chapter XXV and ss 503 509 and 512 of the Criminal Procedure Code Order XVIII rules 4 17 of Civil Procedure Code lay down the rules which must be observed in taking down depositions in civil cases When any deposition is taken in accordance with law the Court shall presume that the document is genuine (Ides 80 of the Evidence Act)

In what proceeding it can be used. Either in an entirely new judicial proceeding, or in a subsequent stage of the same proceeding such previous deposition may be used if other conditions are satisfied. A trial before a Magistrate or Court is a continuation or subsequent stage of the proceedings in which a Magistrate first took up the inquiry which led to the trial. A deposition taken upon one charge in a criminal proceeding may be used in another criminal proceeding arising out of the same transaction, when the deponent is dead, etc. at the time of the second proceeding. Thus deposition taken on a charge of assault and robbery have been admitted on a charge of murder, when death ensued from the violence used to perpetrate the robbery. R v Smith, 1 R & R 330, Ant. Ev 195. In Rangaswami v Sundarajulu, 35 Ind Cas 52=31 M L J 412, it was contended in second appeal for the first time that the evidence taken in the suit, before a defendant was newly made a party, should not have been used against him and section 33 of the Evidence was relied upon. Held that the new defendant was not entitled to take that objection in second appeal and a 33 of the Evidence Act has no application to this case.

When the witness is dead. Evidence given by a witness in a previous action is relevant for the purpose of proving the matter stated in a subsequent proceeding or in a later stage of the same proceeding, when the witness is dead. Steph Dig Li Art 32, Mayor of Doncaster v Day, 3 Taunt 267. When a deceased witness, or one who from other causes has become incapacitated to give evidence, has sworn upon a former trial, it is admitted on the principle that it is the best of which the case admits. Pet Johnson J in State v Hill, 2 Hill 518. So death has always been the typical and acknowledged cause of unavailability, and is equally conceded to suffice for depositions and for former testimony. Wigmore § 1403, Gilbert's Ev 60, Lord Moileys Case, Kelying 55, Fry v Wood, 1 Atk 444. R v Castro (Trichborne Case), charge of Chief Justice, 11 305. Such depositions cannot be admitted in the subsequent suit when the witnesses are living and their evidence is procurable. Hursh v Tara Choud, 2 B L R App 4, Chalam v Suraj 3 A L J 91, Bhoobun Moyee v Ambica, 23 W R 343. Mahomed v Fatan, 12 P L R 1919. The evidence of witness, one of them being dead and the other absconding, given before a Magistrate, was held admissible at the Sessions trial even though fresh charges have been added. Empress v Roeha 8 C L R 273.

Absence. The absence of the witness from the jurisdiction, out of the reach of the Court's process, ought also to be sufficient, and is so treated by the great majority of cases. Fry v Wood 1 Atk 415, Roe v Jones, 3 Low Can 11.

Mere absence, however, may not be sufficient and it is usually said that a residence or an absence for a prolonged or uncertain time is necessary. Greenl Tr § 163(g). It is not necessary to try and take the witness's deposition if he secures his voluntary personal attendance. Mann M Co v R (3), Minn 14 315, contra Shusser v Burlington 47 Ia 302. The deposition by a person where he denied on oath that he had presented a certain petition in Court which purported to be from him is held to be inadmissible as evidence when such person might have been brought into Court but was not. Bhoobun Moyee v Ambica, 23 W R 343.

Illness. Illness, by causing inability to attend, has the same effect as death. Fry v Wood, 1 Atk 415. R v Jones, 3 Low Can 11. C & P 113, Rogers v Roborg 2 G & I 60, contra Doe v Evans 3 C & P 221.

The phrase usually employed as a test is "so ill as to be unable to travel". The application of this principle should be left to the trial Court's discretion. Thornnton v Britton 144 Pa 130. Greenl Tr § 163(g). The duration of the illness need only be in probability such that with regard to the importance of the testimony the trial cannot be postponed. Wigmore § 1406. The question of illness is a question for the determination of the presiding Judge. Ant. Ev 195 (1916) 1 K B 581. R v Stephenson L & C 165. "As to the degree of illness so ill as not to be able to travel sufficiently indicates the requirement of common sense and the ability is to be considered with reference to the nature of path or danger to the witness. That the illness should be such as to make it impracticable to take the witness's deposition at his home has been said by the Court to be the correct limitation (Berney v Mitchell, 31 N J L 341, Smith v Moore, 149 N C 185), but this is certainly incorrect, for a deposition obtained from a person during illness could not be any better than his former cross examined testimony, or deposition, and would probably be much less trustworthy. Mathews J in Miller v Russel, 7 Mart N S La 268. Wigmore § 1406. See also Fry v Wood, 1 Atk 445, R v Savage 5 C & P 143, R v Harris 4 Cox C C 440, R v Harney, 4 Cox C C 441, R v Ullner, 4 Cox Cr 441, R v Stephenson 9 Cox Cr 156, R v Bull 12 Cox Cr 31, R v Welton 9 Cox Cr 296, R v Parrel, 12 Cox Cr 606, R v Thompson 13 Cox Cr 182, R v Heeson, 14 Cox Cr 42, R v Wellings, L R 3 Q B D 428, R v Prunty, 16 Cox Cr 344. So where a witness is 87 years of age and is 'in such a great state of nervous excitement that it would be attended with great risk to her life to bring her into Court to give evidence' or where it might bring in an attack of apoplexy there was no actual disease or illness, only a predisposition to it, his previous deposition was not admitted. R v Thompson, 13 Cox Cr 182, R v Farrell, 12 Cox Cr 606. The degree of illness in every case is to be decided by the Court. R v Noals, (1917) 1 K B 581.

Cannot be found. Inability to find the witness is an equally sufficient reason for non production, by the better opinion (Oates Trial, 10 How St Tr 1285, Anon Godbolt 236, Gilbert Evidence, 60, Buller N P 239, Thompson v State 106 Ala 67, Vitchell v State 114 Id 1, Shall elford v State, 33 Ark 539, Sneed v State, 47 Ark 539), though there are contrary precedents (Lord Morley's Case Kelyng 55, R v Hagan, 8 C & P 169, R v Scaife, 8 Q B 243, Cray v Sprague 12 Wend 45) the sufficiency of the search is usually and properly left to the trial Court's discretion. Greenl Ev § 163(g). If the witness has disappeared from observation, he is in effect unavailable for the purpose of compelling his attendance. Such a disappearance is shown by the party's inability to find him after diligent search. The only objection to recognizing this ground of unavailability is the possibility of collusion between party and witness but supposing the Court to be satisfied that there has been no collusion and that the search has been bona fide, this objection loses its force. Wigmore § 1405. "If a party cannot find a witness, then he is as if were dead to him" Anon Godbolt, 326. This principle has also been accepted by Jeffreys L C J in Oates Trial, 10 How St Tr 1227, on the assurance of Oates to the effect "My lord it has cost a great deal of money to search him out, but I cannot any where meet with him, and that makes my case so much worse that I cannot when I have done all that man can do to get my witnesses together".

The complainants in a criminal case were not examined and instead the deposition of one of the complainants in a prior case in which another accused had been charged with a similar offence were put in evidence. A police constable gave evidence that an attempt was made to produce the witness but she could not be found. Held, that the evidence in the former case should have been admitted as evidence in this case and a further attempt should be made to enforce the attendance of the witness. Duarka v Emperor 25 O C 142=1922 Oudh 204, see also Emperor v Dost, 2 Cr L J 518, Queen v Lakhu 24 W R Cr 18, Khem Singh v Emperor 88 Ind Cas 30=A I R 1925 Lah 319, Emperor v Kangal 41 C 601. But when it is proved that the witness could not be found his previous deposition is admissible. Ajodhya v Emperor, 56 Ind Cas 582=16 N L R 30.

Insanity. Insanity equally renders the witness unavailable. R v Liswell 3 T R 707, Morley v State 67 Ala 62, Thompson v State, 106 Ala 67. A witness who has become insane is no longer qualified his testimony in Court is no longer available and by universal concession his former testimony or deposition may be used. Wigmore § 1403, R v Marshall Car & M 147. "There is no real or practical difference between the death of the mind and the death of the body" Morley v State, 67 Ala 62, per Somerille J. Even temporary insanity makes a witness unavailable. R v Marshall, Car & M 147.

Loss of memory etc. Loss of memory by disease or old age also renders the witness unavailable. R v Wilson 8 Cox Cr C 453, Rothrock v Gallagher, 91 Pa 112, Cent R Co v Murray, 97 Gr 326, Ewing v Diehl, 76 Pa 373,

S 33. Drayton v Wells, 1 Nott & M 217 Loss of memory by lapse of time will also have the same effect as loss of memory by disease or old age Jack v Woods, 26 Pa 378, contra, Robinson v Gilman, 34 N H 297, Velott v Lewis, 102 Pa 326, Greenl Lb 163 (g) But the Court must be satisfied of the fact of the loss The difficulty is that the witness must be called in order that this fact may appear, so that in practical application there would be no dispensation of his presence, more over he might in some cases be able to use the deposition or report the testimony as a record of past recollection Wigmore § 1409 State v N O Water Works Co 107 La 1, Jack v Woods, 26 Pa 378, contra, Cool v Stout, 47 Ill 531, Stearns Lumber Co v Houlett, 131 Vt 217

Loss of faculties necessary for testimony Like insanity also the loss of any one of the faculties necessary for testimony furnishes an equal reason, whether the loss occurs through disease or through senility This may be the case where the lost faculty is that of speech R v Coolburn, 7 Cox Cr 260 Blindness may also render a witness unavailable for certain kinds of testimony Houston v Blythe, 69 Tex 509, Wigmore § 1408 So where a witness has become blind his deposition in Chancery was used for those parts of his testimony which depended on his consultation of documents Kinsman v Crooke, 2 Id Raym 1166, Houston v Blythe, 60 Tex 509 (512) Where evidence was given before a committing Magistrate but in the Sessions Court the witness proves by and speechless, this section does not apply to the case and the evidence cannot in fact be treated as evidence at the Sessions Moti Ram v Emperor, 10 Ind Ca 152=24 Cr L J 904

Incapable of giving evidence The capacity to give evidence mentioned in section 33 of the Evidence Act need not be a permanent one something short of permanent incapacity might satisfy the words of the section incapable of giving evidence In the matter of the petition of Asgur Hossein, 6 C 11=8 C L R 121, but see In the matter of Pyari Lal where it was held that the word "incapable of giving evidence" in section 33, Evidence Act, denotes an incapacity of a permanent kind The Court has no discretion under section 33 as to admitting a deposition, when the witness is found to be "incapable of giving evidence" But where the absence of the witness is due to temporary causes the Court has a discretion to admit the deposition of a witness if it is proved to be either actually impossible to produce him, or to be so difficult to do so or if it is unreasonable to insist on his production In the matter of Pyari Lal, supra

Kept out of the way by the adverse party If the witness has been by the opponent procured to absent himself this ought of itself to justify the use of his deposition or former testimony—where the offering party has or has not searched for him whether he is within jurisdiction or not, whether his place of abode is secret or open, for any tampering with a witness should once for all estop the tamperer from making any objection based on the result of his own chicanery Wigmore § 1405 (4) This rule is based on the broad principle of justice, which will not permit a party to take advantage of his own wrong In a case where three prisoners were indicted for felony, and a witness for the prosecution was proved to be absent through the procurement of one of them the Court held that his deposition might be read in evidence as against the man who had kept him out of the way but that it could not be received against the other two men R v Scarfe 2 Den 281=17 Q B 233=5 Cox 243 S C, see also Lord Morley's Case, 6 How St 1r 770, R v Harrison 12 How St Tr 841 Grove v Gateward N P 213 R v Guttridge 9 C & P 473, Taylor § 414 The proposition that if a witness be kept out of the way by the adversary, his former statements on oath will be admissible rests partly on the authority of several decisions both in civil and criminal Courts Taylor § 178, Greenl Fr § 11 (g) U v Reynolds, 1 Utah 322

absence or non-residence replies received during the search ought to be admissible, whether or not they are testimony themselves they serve as circumstances indicating due diligence of the party seeking the witness. Wignore § 1114. Where the witness is available for testifying his deposition is not usable. "The very meaning of the phrase de bene esse implied that it was conditional and that the witness must be re-examined if capable. Per Dr. Lushington in Weguelin v. Weguelin 2 Curt. Doel 263. So also when the deposition of a witness was allowed to be read when he was present in Court, this was also illegal. Campbell J in Dunn v. Dunn, 11 Mich. 292. So not if a witness is within the reach of the process of the Court his previous deposition is inadmissible. Iron 2 Salk 691, Blagrate v. Blagrate 1 Deg & Sim 252, 259. Under this section, the evidence of an absent witness taken in the Magistrate's Court cannot be received in the Sessions Court without proof of the circumstances which make it admissible. Such circumstances should be proved like any other fact by the evidence of witnesses and a mere report that a witness is dead or absent is not sufficient. Queen Empress v. Aga Po L B R (1872-1892) 134. Khem Singh v. Emperor, 88 Ind. Cas. 30=7 Lah. L. J 107=26 Cr. L. J 1086. That it is absolutely necessary to examine a qualified medical practitioner before evidence of witness too ill to attend can be admitted under section 33 of the Evidence Act cannot be laid down as a proposition of law. Facilities for obtaining qualified doctors in England are very different from those in India and an argument based on the analogous English law would not apply here. Ryan v. King Emperor, 31 C W N 908=103 Ind. Cas. 846=28 Cr. L. J 766=A I R 1927 Crd 679, R v. Noakes, (1917) 1 K B 581 but see R v. Cohen, 34 L J 623. A previous deposition can be admitted in evidence only under the provisions of s 33 of the Evidence Act, but before it can be placed on record of a criminal trial the Court must decide judicially that a proper effort had been made on behalf of the prosecution to secure the presence of the witness that in spite of that effort he had not been traced and could not be found out, or that he was incapable of giving evidence, or was kept out of the way by the adverse party or his presence could not be obtained without an amount of delay or expense which, under the circumstances of the case the Court considers unreasonable. Ghulam v. Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 542. Annari v. Emperor, 39 M 449=28 Ind. Cas. 518, Umar Hayee v. Emperor A I R 1929 Mad 32=46 M 117, Sayan Singh v. Emperor 6 Lah 437=A I R 1925 Lah 418. Emperor v. Kangal Mah 41 C 601=26 Ind. Cas. 161=15 Cr. L. J 713. Falconer v. Hanson 1 Camp 171, Wiedeman v. Walpole, 1891 Times, June 15.

Presence cannot be obtained without an amount of delay or expense etc. It is only in extreme cases of expense or delay that the personal attendance of a witness should be dispensed with. Empress v. Mulu, 2 A 616. "The prisoner certainly had a right to expect that the witnesses should be brought to give their testimony in voce before the Sessions Court, and any expense or delay that might be necessary for that purpose must, in the absence of special facts be taken as reasonable rather than unreasonable. Per Phear J in Queen v. Lukhun, 21 W R 56 Cr. Inconvenience to witness is no ground allowed under this section. Empress v. T. Burke, 6 A 224. What delay or expense is reasonable or unreasonable depends upon the circumstances of each case. Of the circumstances of the case, one of the chief which the Judge has and ought to weigh, is the nature and importance of the statements contained in the deposition. It would be unreasonable to incur much delay and expense when the facts spoken to in the deposition are of the nature of formal evidence for prosecution, or supply something in the case for prosecution, as to which little or no dispute exists or are facts to which other witnesses speak besides the deponent, and which witnesses are produced at the trial. Per White J in In the matter of Pyari Lall 4 C L R 501 (509-510). But where the absence of the witness is due to temporary causes, his previous deposition cannot be admitted. Ibid. The mere fact that a witness changed his lodgings after giving mochulel for appearance in the Sessions Court and much delay would be involved in searching him are no grounds for admitting his deposition in the lower Court. In such a case it must be shown that such a witness could not have been found if reasonable exertion had been made to find him. Queen v. Luchhy, 24 W R Cr 18. Noshi v. Empress, 5 C 938=6 C L R 353, Empress v. Dabee Prasad, 6 C 532, Queen Empress v.

S. 33. Jacob, 19 C 113 Section 33 of the Evidence Act does not justify a Master when proceeding under s 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code, in using evidence taken in a previous criminal trial in supersession of evidence given in the presence of the accused. Queen v Prosonno, 22 W R 36 Cr The Court has a discretion to admit the deposition of a witness, if it is proved to be either actually impossible to produce him, or to be so difficult to do so or if it is unreasonable to insist on his production. In the matter of Piyari Lall, 4 C L R 534, see also Ashtar Steam Navigation v Bengal Coal Co, 35 C 751, Nga Ba v Emperor, 104 Ind Cas 637 = A I R 1927 Rang 248, R v Hogg, 6 C & P 176, Beaufort v Crayshay, 1 L R 1 C P 699 Empress v Ramu Reddi, 3 M 45 So where a witness is procurable his subsequent deposition is not admissible. Bhooobay v Emperor, 23 W R 313, Emperor v Nanlu, 2 A L J 599 The whole notion of taking depositions is that they are a provision in advance for obtaining testimony from one who will not be available at the time of the trial, i.e., in the traditional phrase, they are taken de bene esse, conditionally. If the witness is in fact available at the time of the trial, the principle of confrontation requires that he should be examined in a voce on the stand. This principle is consistently indicated. Greene v U.S. § 163 (1) In certain States of the United States of America, such deposition is admitted where the personal attendance of witnesses would involve them in great pecuniary loss and involve a sacrifice of their personal interest without any personal advantage. Atkinson v Newbern & R Co v Bussen, [95 Ga 534 But this rule is not sustainable on principle. The notion that any citizen's private interest should be allowed to override his duty to the community is a false one. The principle that the whole community and every member of it, should join in rendering all possible aid to the establishment of truth and justice is a fundamental one in civilized society. Wagmore 1407

Proviso—Para (1) At common law testimony given by a witness in a civil or criminal proceeding is inadmissible in a subsequent, or in a later stage of the same trial in proof of the facts stated provided that the proceedings are between the same parties or their privies. Phip Es 4th Ed p 496 A party offering a deposition or an answer in evidence against a person not a party to the original suit, Munsfield L C J said 'That cannot be done for this reason because such person has it not in his power to cross examine.' Goodright v Moss Cowper 592 So 'examinations upon oath, except in exceptional cases are of no avail unless they are made in a cause or proceeding depending between the parties to be affected by them and where each has an opportunity of cross-examining the witness' Per Lord Kenyon, L C J in R v Eriswell, 3 T R 707 The law on this subject is thus summarised by Chief Baron Gilbert

When you give in evidence any matter sworn at a former trial, it must be between the same parties because otherwise you dispossess your adversary of his liberty to cross examine. Gilbert Ev 68 So a deposition can not be given in evidence against any person that was not a party to the suit, and the reason is because he had not liberty to cross-examine the witness and it is against natural justice that a man should be concluded by proofs in a cause to which he was not a party. Buller J Trial at Nisi Prius, 239 The words used in this paragraph are 'The proceedings must be one between the same parties or their representatives in interest' This refers to the former proceeding the language would have been more accurate if it had been "those whom they represent in interest" Here used as representatives in interest. In fact they are privies. Chenier v Bishwanar, 8 Pit L T 510 = 101 Ind Cas 289 = A I R 1927 Pat 61 In Morgan v Nicholl 2 L R C P 117, Willes J said "By persons privies to former parties is really meant persons claiming under them" So where a trial was a trial between different parties having different rights and with whom the plaintiff had no privity and as he had no opportunity to examine or cross-examine the witness it would be contrary to the first principle of justice to bind or in any way affect his interests by the evidence given on that occasion. Per Hannan C J in Lane v Brainerd, 30 Cox 579 The real reason of the parties being the same is thus laid down by Gulchrist J in Bailey v Woods, 17 H N 372 (Am) 1 the testimony be given under oath in a judicial proceeding, in which the same litigant was a party and where he had right to cross examine and was legally called upon to do so, the great and ordinary tests of truth being no longer wanting the testimony so given is admitted in any subsequent suit between the parties. It seems to depend rather upon the right to cross examine them than upon the pre use nominal identity of the parties. See also Summons v State, 5 Oh St 343. Where there are two or more charges arising out of the same allegations made by an accused, the testimony of a deceased witness in a previous proceeding against the accused is admissible in evidence in a subsequent proceeding against the same accused, although the prosecutor in the second case is the widow of the prosecutor in the first. Queen Empress v Bhabhutgar, Rat Un Cr C 347=Cr Rg 38 of 1887. To satisfy the requirements of this section the two suits must be brought by or against the same parties or their representative in interest, at the time when the suits are proceeding and the evidence is given. Sita Nath v Mohesh Chunder, 12 C 627, Queen v Ishri, 8 A 672=A W N 1886, 257.

Where the parties of the present suit were not parties or representatives of the parties of the previous suit, in such a case, a deposition made in the former suit is not admissible in evidence in the present suit. Mirmoyee v Bhooban Moyee 15 B L R 1=23 W R 42, Queen Empress v Ishri, 8 A 672=A W N 1886 257, Queen v Rana 3 M 45, Emperor v Vaman, 5 Bom L R 599 (601). This section does not apply to the deposition of a witness in a former suit when the witness is himself a defendant in a subsequent suit and the deposition is sought to be used against him not as evidence given between parties one of whom called him as a witness but as an admission as against himself. Soogan Bibi v Achmut 14 B L R App 3=21 W R 414. The parties may be differently marshalled that is, the plaintiff in former suit may be defendant in the latter and vice versa. Wright v Tatham, 1 A & E 8.

In Wright v Tatham supra one T claimed against W as heir of J M while W claimed under a will of J M. T first filed a bill in Chancery against W and three others and evidence was taken on an issue framed at law in which W was plaintiff. Then T brought an ejectment suit against W in which John Doe was the nominal plaintiff. It was held, when the testimony of a deceased witness B at the former trial was offered in the second action, that (1) the nominal difference in the parties on T's side, and (2) the addition of three new parties on W's side, could not prevent the use of the testimony as between T and W. In admitting such deposition Tindal C J, said "Mr T the lessor of the plaintiff in this action, had precisely the same power of objecting to the competency of B, the same right of cross-examination and of calling witnesses to discredit or contradict his testimony, on the former trial, as he would have had it if Mr W had been the sole plaintiff in that suit or as he would have had now if B had been alive and subpoenaed as a witness." Wignore § 1388. It is further well settled that the former testimony is receivable if the then party opponent, though a different person had the same property interest that the present opponent has. Ibid.

The parties are deemed to be the same when those between whom the evidence is offered were on opposite sides in the former case and a judgment or other determination could in that case have been made between them alone though other parties were joined with both or either. California Civ Pro Code § 1910. Aside from the provisions of the Code, it is well settled that depositions taken in an action between two parties are admissible in actions between their successors in interest. Greenleaf Et §§ 164 553. It is not an unsafe rule. For while the successor in interest may not have an opportunity to cross-examine the witness yet the person in whose shoes he stands had, and this is sufficient for every practical purpose. Briggs v Briggs, 80 Cal 253 (Am). But such depositions taken in other actions are not to be received in evidence, unless the parties are the same or in privity, and unless the issues are substantially the same. Thus, where husband and wife were each injured on a ferry boat at the same time and by the same cause, the deposition of the husband taken in an action by the wife against the ferry company for an injury to herself, in which he was plaintiff only by reason of being her husband, was not received in an action by the wife as his administratrix, against the company for the injury to him. Fearn v.

S 33. West Jersey Ferry Co, 143 Pa 122 Where a plaintiff brought two actions against obligors on the same bond, a deposition taken at the instance of one defendant could not be used by the defendant in the other action. It could not be used by the plaintiff in the other action, and therefore for want of mutuality could not be used by the defendant therein, "no man who cannot be prejudiced by deposition or proceeding in a suit shall never receive any advantage from it" Gibb Ev 55, Brown v Johnson, 13 Gratt 614, Burr Jones § 683

In seeing whether a person is the legal representative of another or not for the purpose of rendering evidence admissible under section 33 regard must be had to the state of affairs when the evidence is sought to be admitted. When the defendant in a subsequent suit was the natural son of the plaintiff in previous suit and claimed in the subsequent suit not as the natural son of the plaintiff but as adopted son of a third person. Held that the deposition in the previous suit was not admissible. Sri Raja Ravi v Raja of Puttur, 51 M 893=28 L R 122=A I R 1928 Mad 994=55 M L J 894 (F B). The words "representative in interest" mean that the parties in the second proceedings in which evidence is tendered must be the representatives in interest of the parties in the first proceeding, or in other words should be persons who derive their title through or claim under them, or shortly are their privies. Section 33 cannot be applied without any reference to the subject matter of the two suits. The interest involved in each case must be the same or similar. Doe v Earl of Derby, 1 Ad & El 783. Arishna Rao v Raja of Puttur, 102 Ind Cas 713=A I R 1914 Mad 733. The wording of this proviso is perhaps a little defective. In view of the words "their representative in interest" the words should have been "those whom they represent in interest" or the word "is" should have been used instead of "was" so that the proceeding may be read as the second proceeding. Ibid. At common law depositions taken in a judicial proceeding are admissible in evidence in a subsequent judicial proceeding in proof of the facts stated therein provided the proceedings are between the same parties or their privies. Halsbury Vol XIII, p 546. The rule limiting the admission of such deposition is thus laid down by Lord Cottenham in Humphreys v Pensam, 1 My & Cr 507. "Deposition can only be read for or against those who are parties or privies to the suit in which the depositions were taken, and they cannot be read for a party unless they can be read against him." So evidence taken on the first trial is admissible in a second trial if although the two trials be not between the same parties the second trial is between persons who generally represent the former parties or are their privies in estate. Taylor on Evidence, 11th Ed § 46. The vague expression "representatives in interest" has not been defined in the Evidence Act but whatever scope may be given to those words they must at least include privies in estate. Partners and joint contractors are each other's privies for the purpose of making admissions against each other in relation to partnership transactions or joint contracts and must be regarded as privies in estate so as to render their statement admissible under the proviso s 33 of the Evidence Act. Chandreswar v Bisheswar, 5 P 777.

A forged receipt was filed in a civil case by the defendant. The accused was tried for having abetted the forgery. Before the trial K, the person whose signature was forged, died and could not be examined in this case. Held that the deposition of K in the civil suit was not admissible in evidence against the accused who appeared only as a witness in that case. Kadhe Nil v Emperor 42 A 24=17 A L J 893=52 Ind Cas 394=20 Cr L J 634.

For the purposes of this section a purchaser of the equity of redemption is a representative in interest of the mortgagor. Mashue v Mgh Im, 10 Ind Cas 111=8 Bnr L R 104. A Hindu widow in possession of the estate of her husband completely represents the estate and consequently a reversioner can be said to be the representative of the party (i.e. the widow) within the meaning of section 33 of the Evidence Act. Raj Kumar v Nitya Kali 12 C L J 44. In delivering the judgment in that case Mookerjee J said "Prima facie, therefore, it would be difficult to hold that the two proceedings are between the same parties or their representatives in interest. But it has been argued that Monmohini, a Hindu widow in possession of the estate of her husband, completely represents that estate, and consequently the position is the same as if she was a party to the suit as a full owner, because a decree was against her in a contested litigation would bind the inheritance. Katama v. Rajah of Simgunga, 9 M I A 539, Perlabarain v. Triloknath, 11 C 186=11 I A 197. Reference may in this connection be also made to the observations in the case of Mun Moyee v. Bhubun Moyee, 23 W R 42=15 B L R 15, in which Couch C J expressed the view that possibly upon the principle of the rule of the English law of evidence by which when there are several remainders limited by the deed, a judgment for or against one of them is evidence for or against the next in succession, may justify the use under section 33 of the Evidence Act, of a deposition in a suit brought against a widow before any adoption in a subsequent litigation against the adopted son. Pyke v. Crouch, 1 Ld Ryms 730, Doe v. Passingham, 2 C & P 446. There are obviously weighty considerations, and though we do not fully decide the point, our present inclination is not to hold the previous deposition inadmissible on the ground that the first element (i.e. that the proceeding was between the same parties or their representatives in interest, has not been established. A party is liable to have a deposition in a previous proceeding used against him in a subsequent proceeding, only if his opponent is substantially the same in both the proceedings. Morgan v. Nichol, L R 2 C P 117.

Proviso—Para (2) The rule of common law is strict in this that no evidence shall be admitted, but what is or might have been under examination of both parties. Buller v. Pitts, 240. The opportunity to attend and to cross-examine is all that is necessary, and if it is not availed of the principle has still been satisfied. Moore v. Triplett, Va, 23 S E 69. So the general principle is that in all cases where the party has without his own fault or concurrence irrecoverably lost the power of producing the witness again, he should be dispensed from doing so, if there is at hand his testimony already subjected to cross-examination and this general notion underlies all the cases of dispensation. Green v. 163 (f). The doctrine requiring a testing of testimonial statements by cross-examination has always been understood as requiring not necessarily an actual cross-examination but merely an opportunity to exercise the right to cross-examine if desired. The reason is that, wherever the opponent has declined to avail himself of the offered opportunity, it must be supposed to have been because he believed that the testimony could not or need not be disputed at all or he shaken by cross-examination. In having the opportunity and still declining, he has had all the benefit that could be expected from the cross-examination of that witness. Wigmore § 1371, Starke Fr 97. "The rule of the common law is that no evidence shall be admitted but what is or might be under the examination of both parties. But if the adverse party has had liberty to cross-examine and has not chosen to exercise it, the case is then the same in effect as if he had cross-examined. Here then the question is whether the defendant had an opportunity of cross-examining." Per Ellenborough J C J in Cavenore v. Vaughan 1 M & S 6.

A deposition is considered a partial representation of facts, as to all person who have no opportunity of bearing out the whole truth by cross-examination. Per Lawrence J in Bekeley Peerage Case, 4 Camp 412, see also Lord v. Colvin, 3 Dr 222. Allen v. Allen, (1894) P 248. Since the competency of the deposition taken in former suit depends upon the fact that the adverse party or those in privity with him, had the opportunity, to cross-examine the witness, if it appears that the deposition was taken without authority, or without the sanction of an oath, or without such chance of cross-examination it should not be received although if due notice was given, it is not necessary that any cross-examination should have been actually made. Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald, 3 Swab & T 397, see also Lawrence v. Maule 4 Dr 472. Macomb v. Wilson 6 M & G 27. In a warrant case until the stage provided for in s 256 Cr Pro Code is reached the accused has no right to cross-examine and consequently the evidence of a witness given before framing of the charge is not admissible under s 33. Empey v. Mathews A I R 1929 Cal 822. In that case Camming J said "The prosecution now desires to put in as evidence under s. 33, Evidence Act the statement of Mi Wine before the Police Magistrate. S 33, provides that in certain circumstances evidence given in one judicial proceeding is relevant in a subsequent judicial proceeding provided that the adverse party in the first proceeding had the right

S 33. and opportunity to cross-examine That the accused had the opportunity of cross-examining this witness, is I think quite clear. He was asked to do so but he refused to do so. But I think it is also clear that at the stage at which the case had arrived he had no right to cross-examine. Now as far as I can see the accused in a warrant case has no right to cross-examine the prosecution witness until after the charge is framed. No doubt s 256 (Cr Pro Code) does not prohibit cross-examination at a previous stage but that is not the same as saying that the accused has any right to cross-examine. I am of opinion that until the stage of the case provided for in s 256 is reached the accused has no right to cross-examine. That being so in the present case the accused had no right to cross-examine and so the evidence of Mr Althe is not admissible in evidence under s 33. But in Mangal Sen v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lahore 840 a witness was examined by prosecution but no cross-examination was put to him and after the charge it was discovered that he was too ill to attend the Court and was unable to answer the interrogatories. The result was not that he was never subjected to cross-examination. It was contended that the statement being incomplete his evidence could not be considered. It was held that such evidence was admissible but the weight to be attached to it depended upon the circumstances of each case. See also Maharajah of Kallapur v Sundaram Iyer, A I R 1925 Mad 497 = 48 M 1. This section does not apply where it is obvious that there was no opportunity for cross-examination. Emperor v Phagunma Bhanu, 89 Ind Cas 1043 = 20 Cr L J 1475. Emperor v Balur Saheb, 18 Bom L R 284 = 34 Ind Cas 269 = 17 Cr L J 249, Queen Empress v Burke, 6 A 224 = A W N 1894 20.

A deposition taken in an ex parte proceeding cannot be used under this section in a subsequent contested proceeding between the same parties even where other conditions of the section are satisfied. Ry Mangal v Mathura 13 A L J 881.

The words "opportunity to cross-examine" include the method of cross-interrogatories, which, for many years were the chief mode of cross-examination in the Courts of Equity and the Admiralty Courts of England, and for which provision is made in the Common Law Procedure Acts. An opportunity to administer cross-interrogatories under a commission is sufficient to render the evidence elicited by the cross-interrogatories relevant under s 33 of the Evidence Act. The words do not imply that the actual presence of the cross-examining party or his agent before the tribunal taking evidence is necessary. To require a presence would be to put a strain on the words of s 33 and lead to inconvenience, and much difficulty would be found in getting evidence under this enabling section, where a party is in police custody. The fact that an accused person had full opportunity of cross-examining if not admitted, must be proved before evidence can be admitted under section 33. The deposition of a witness obtained by a commission issued by a committing Magistrate and forming part of the record of the enquiry is admissible under s 33 of the Evidence Act provided the requirements of that section are satisfied. Queen Empress v Rama Chandra, 19 B 749, see also Queen Empress v Bastanta 20 B 16 = 2 Bom L R 761.

In an enquiry under Chapter XVIII of the Criminal Procedure Code a witness was examined by the prosecution but he was not cross-examined by the accused, in the Sessions trial the witness having died his deposition was put in under s 33, Evidence Act. Held—it is doubtful whether the evidence is admissible under section 33 of the Evidence Act, even if it is admissible as evidentiary value is very small indeed. Having regard to the practice at Sessions enquiries not to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses unless at the conclusion of the enquiry when the charge is drawn up, the accused thinks it worth while to defend him self in the first Court it would hardly be said that the accused had the opportunity to cross-examine a witness examined by the prosecution, where the accused did not cross-examine any of the prosecution witnesses and was not asked by the enquiring Magistrate to exercise his right of cross-examination. Abraham v King Emperor, 17 C W N 250 = 17 Ind Cas 106 = 14 Cr L J 70, see also 2 Weir 755. Deposition of a witness can be taken in the absence of an accused who has absconded. When such a deposition is to be used in a subsequent case, it is necessary to establish that the witness deposition was taken, the accused had absconded, and after due pursuit could not be arrested. Queen v. Fluaree, 21 W R Cr 12, Queen Empress v. Sahib Singh, A W N 1896, 182

Failure of cross examination There may have been an adequate opportunity of cross-examination, so far as depends upon the nature of the tribunal or the state of issues and parties, yet the required opportunity may nevertheless practically have failed through circumstances connected with the conduct of the examination. These circumstances may be distinguished under six heads, (1) the death or illness of the witness intervening to prevent or curtail cross-examination, (2) the witness's refusal to answer on cross-examination or the party's prevention of his answer, (3) the witness's answering the direct examination "non responsively", i.e. without dealing with the subject of the question, (4) the framing of the direct examination so as to prevent adequate cross-examination, (5) the lack of interpretation of testimony of an alien etc., (6) sundry circumstances preventing adequate cross-examination. Wigmore § 1390

Witness's death or illness—In case of death of a witness before cross-examination his testimony is inadmissible, if any delay is caused by the laches of the party offering it. Kemble v. Lyons 184 Fa 804. The same result would follow if his illness was temporary and the offering party could have produced him before the end of the trial. Clements v. Benjamin, 12 Johns N Y 299. But where death or illness prevents cross-examinations under such circumstances that no responsibility of any sort can be attributed to either the witness or the party according to Prof. Wigmore it seems harsh measure to strike out all that has been obtained on the direct examination. But he admits that on principle such examination should be rejected. Wigmore § 1390. According to this section such deposition is clearly not admissible. In England the case law on the subject is not uniform. Ides Jones v. Fort, 1 M & M 196. R v. Hagan 1 Jebb Cr C 127. R v. Mitchell 17 Cox Cr 503. Where, however, the failure to obtain cross-examination is due to the default of the cross-examiner such lack of cross-examination does vitiate the former deposition. R v. Hyde 3 Cox Cr 90. Parnell Commission's Proceedings, 7th day, Times Rep pt 2 p 66 (1888), Wigmore § 1390. This is according to the principle that he had an opportunity though waived the same. Ibid

Where a witness died after the examination in chief and part of the cross-examination was finished. Held that her deposition could not be admitted in evidence under this section because the evidence was not concluded. For it might be argued that a subsequent cross-examination would have destroyed to a great extent the effect of the evidence in chief. Narsing Das v. Gokul Prasad 25 A L J 775. Such evidence should not be ordinarily acted upon. Rex v. Vadala 7 M L T 41=5 Ind Crs 512. But where the statement of a witness was recorded by the committing Magistrate and the accused did not exercise the right to cross-examine him and the witness died subsequently before the case was tried by the Sessions Judge, held that the statement was admissible in evidence under section 33 of the Indian Evidence Act. Azimuddin v. Emperor 31 C W N 410=101 Ind Crs 661=28 Cr L J 485=A I R 1927 Cil 398.

Through the witness's refusal to answer or the fault of the party offering him—Where a witness after his examination in chief declined to answer the questions put in cross-examination, his examination in chief is not admissible in evidence. Smith v. Griffith, 3 Hill N Y 333. But such a result does not follow when he evaded one or two questions. Gibson v. Goldthwaite 7 Ala 281, 294. The law on the subject is thus laid down by Chief Justice Shaw in Savage v. Blanchard 20 Pick 167, 172. "So far as objection goes upon the assumption that a deposition must be rejected because some of the questions of the adverse party are not answered, as a general rule it is untenable. (But) cases may be supposed where if a witness is manifestly favourable to the party taking the deposition and declines answering pertinent and material questions to facts apparently within his knowledge it would be a good ground for excluding the deposition altogether. It would show that the witness had violated his duty and his oath in not telling the whole truth, and the deposition could in effect be taken ex parte." Wigmore § 1391.

S. 33.

Non responsive answers This objection is obviously applicable to written interrogatories only. Murray v. H. et al. 1 Colo. 2, 6, Wigmore § 1392

Through lack of interpretation for a witness alien, deaf and dumb, etc. Where the cross-examination could not be conducted for want of a competent interpreter because evidence is given in foreign language, the party against whom the evidence is given is denied the right of cross-examination. The modern English practice is thus lucidly stated by Lord Reading C. J. in R. v. Lee Kim, (1916) 1 K. B. 337, 339. "When a foreigner who is ignorant of the English language is on trial on an indictment for a criminal offence and is undefended, the evidence given at the trial must be translated. If he does not understand the English language, he cannot waive compliance with the rule that the evidence must be translated, he cannot dispense with it by express or implied consent, and it matters not that no application is made by him for the assistance of an interpreter. It is for the Court to see that the necessary means are adopted to convey the evidence to his intelligence, notwithstanding that, either through ignorance or timidity or disregard of his own interests, he makes no application to the Court. The reason is that the trial of a person for a criminal offence is not a contest of private interests in which the rights of parties can be waived at pleasure. We have come to the conclusion that the safer, and therefore the wiser, course when the foreigner accused is defended by counsel is that the evidence should be interpreted to him except when he or counsel on his behalf expresses a wish to dispense with the translation and the Judge thinks fit to permit the omission. The right to interpretation being conceded this right is satisfied if somehow an understanding is attained, either by his own or by counsel's knowledge of the language or by the help of an interpreter." Third person and the precise method of attaining it is immaterial. Moreover the opponent is also entitled to cross-examine the interpreter so as to test the correctness of the translation, and to call other witnesses to verify the interpretation. Wigmore § 1393

Whether the deposition of a witness who cannot be cross-examined on account of some organic defect, such as defects of speech hearing or the like should be admitted in evidence it is for the trial Judge to decide. Quinn v. Halbert 55 Vt. 228. The same principle also applies when the accused is deaf or dumb or blind. Felts v. Merphy, 201 U. S. 123. Wigmore § 1393

Sundry insufficiencies of cross examination Where a party is absent from the Court at the time of the cross-examination, but his counsel is present, he can hardly be said to have no opportunity of cross-examining a witness. Still in some cases it has been held to be so. Croue v. Peters 63 Mo. 429, 433. But such objection is not at all tenable where the deposition of a witness taken in his absence is read over to him and liberty is given to him to cross-examine the witness. R. v. Smith R. & R. 339. R. v. Forbes Holt, 699. In R. v. Hoke 1 Cox Cr. 226. Earle J. said: "The reading of it in the prisoner's presence is equivalent to the taking of it in his presence. The object is to afford to the party charged an opportunity for cross-examination. Such an opportunity has been held to be afforded by a reading over of the deposition where there is one prisoner only. The object is not less secured because there are many prisoners. But mere reading over to the accused a deposition already taken is not enough; but liberty must be given to him to cross-examine." R. v. Day 6 Cox Cr. 55. Wigmore § 1394. This principle also applies where the Judge limits the time of cross-examination, and thereby deprives the party of his right to cross-examine. Ibid. Under section 256, Cr. P. Code the Magistrate is bound to produce the witnesses whom the accused desires to cross-examine. Where a witness leaves the country after the charge and he can not be produced without undue delay and expense his deposition before the charge can be admitted in evidence under this section. Nga Da On v. Emperor 104 Ind. Cas. 637=28 Cr. L. J. 861=6 Bur. L. J. 114=A. I. R. 1927 Rang. 94

Section 33 whether controlled by s. 350 The general provisions of section 33 of the Indian Evidence Act are not in any way affected by section 350 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Lal v. Crown 101 Ind. Cas. 483=29 P. L. R. 199=28 Cr. L. J. 451=A. I. R. 1927 Lah. 332=8 Lah. 370

Proviso, Para (3) Although the section, by using the word "questions" in the plural seems to imply that it is essential that all the questions shall be the same in both the proceedings to render the evidence admissible, that is not the intention of the law. The principle involved in enquiring identity of the matter in issue is to secure that in the former proceedings the parties were not without an opportunity of examining and cross-examining on the very point on which their evidence is adduced in the subsequent proceeding. Though separate proceedings may involve issues, of which some only are common to both the evidence of those common issues given in the former proceedings may, on the conditions mentioned in s 33 arising be given in the subsequent proceedings. Ram Reddi v Seshu Reddi, 3 M 48=2 Weir 756=2 Weir 455. Unless the issues were then the same as they are when the former deposition is offered, the cross-examination would not have been directed to the same material points of investigation, and therefore could not have been an adequate test for exposing inaccuracies, and falsehoods. Wigmore § 1386. It is absolutely necessary that the former statement was sufficiently tested by cross-examination upon the point now in issue. It is sufficient if the issues were the same or substantially the same for the purpose. Empress v Rochia, 7 C 42=8 C L R 273. Wigmore § 1387. The general rule in this shape is nowhere disputed. Taylor § 464, Chakauri Singh v Su aj Kuar, 2 A L J 91 (96), Foolkshori v Nobin 23 C 441. Phap Ei 4th Ed p 407. But there is naturally much variance shown in the strictness of its application in specific cases. Vide R v Smith, R & R 339, Doe v Foster 1 A & E 791, R v Ledbetter 3 C & K 108. R v Dilmore, 6 Cox Cr 53. R v Beeston 6 Cox Cr 425. R v Lee, 4 F & F 63. R v Castro, Trichborne Case Brown v Hute, 24 W R 456, Edmunds Case, (1909) 2 Cr App 257. Wigmore § 1387.

In R v Beeston 6 Cox Cr 425, deposition of a witness on a charge of felonious wounding with intent to do bodily harm, was admitted on a trial for murder, the not being the same. In admitting the deposition Jarvis C J said: "The presiding Judge must determine in each case whether the prisoner has had full opportunity of cross examination, and if the charges were entirely different, he would not decide that there had been that opportunity but where it is the same case and only some technical difference in the charge, the accused generally have had full opportunity of cross-examining." In the same case Alderson B said: "The question really is whether the deposition was taken under such circumstances that the accused had full opportunity of cross examination." "The situation" says Prof Wigmore "is one that calls for common sense and liberality in the application of the rule and not a narrow and pedantic illiberality. On the whole the judicial rulings show a liberal inclination to receive testimony already adequately tested, but there is yet room for much improvement." Wigmore § 1387. In deciding whether the questions in issue are substantially the same it is always a useful test to see whether the same evidence will prove the affirmative of the issue in both. Field Ei 6th Ed 149, Woodroffe Ei 8th Ed 356. R v Rochia Mohata 7 C 42=8 C L R 273. Doe v Foster 1 A & E 791.

Depositions of deceased persons are not admissible under s 33 of the Evidence Act unless the subject matter of the dispute in the two suits is the same and also the subsequent suit is between the same parties or their representatives in interest. Raghubhushana v Vidya Parulhi 34 Ind Cas 575. In a suit under s 9 Act I of 1877, for possession of a certain house evidence given at a former case for criminal trespass, in respect of the same house by a person since dead is admissible in evidence under s 33—Foolkshori v Nobin Chunder, 23 C 441.

Explanation This explanation is inserted for the purpose of excluding the objection which arises when the depositions are taken in criminal case, that it cannot be used on a subsequent proceeding for want of mutuality or reciprocity because the Queen is the prosecutor in all criminal proceedings. Nort Ei 198. The effect of the explanation would appear to be that a deposition taken in criminal proceedings may be used in a civil suit, and conversely provided that the conditions of the section are observed. Field Ei 6th Ed 145, see also Marby Ev p 33. A prosecution was instituted by S against A at the instance and on behalf of F for criminal trespass in respect of a certain house, and on his own behalf for assault and insult. S gave evidence at the trial in support of these charges. F subsequently brought a civil suit against N for the possession of the same house under section 9 of the Specific Relief Act. S died before the institution of the civil suit. At the trial of the civil suit the deposition of S in the Criminal Court was tendered by F as evidence on the issue of possession. Held, that S being dead and the proceedings being between the same parties and the issues being substantially the same, the deposition of S was admissible. Foolkiserry v Nobin Chandra, 23 C 441.

STATEMENTS MADE UNDER SPECIAL CIRCUMSTANCES

34 Entries in books of account, regularly kept in the

Entries in books of account when relevant refer to a matter into which the Court has to inquire but such statements shall not alone be sufficient evidence to charge any person with liability.

A sues B for Rs. 1,000, and shows entries in his account books showing B to be indebted to him to this amount. The entries are relevant, but are not sufficient, without other evidence, to prove the debt.

Principle. The reasons justifying the admission of this class of statement are that they are by cross examination have not been as clearly defined by the Judges as in other Hearsay exceptions, but they seem fairly clear. More § 1522. It has already been stated that in order to admit evidence which is an exception to the Hearsay rule, two principles must be satisfied, namely (1) the necessity principle and (2) the principle of circumstantial guarantee of truth. Northiams. Vide notes on section 32 supra. On the face of it, in this class of evidence the second principle is well satisfied. In such cases the situation is one where, even though a desire to state falsely may casually have subsisted, more powerful motives to accuracy empower and supplant it. In the typical case of entries made systematically and habitually for the recording of a course of business dealings experience of human nature indicates three distinct degrees of related motives which operate to secure in the long run a sufficient degree of habit and system of making such a record with regularity, calls for accuracy through the interest and purpose of the entrant and the influence of habit may be relied on, by very inertia, to prevent casual inaccuracies and to counteract the possible temptation to misstatement. (2) Since the entries record a course of business transactions, an error or misstatement is almost certain to be detected and the result disputed by those dealing with the entrant. A misstatement cannot safely be made if at all except by a systematic and comprehensive plan of falsification. As a rule, this fact (if no motive of honesty obtains) would deter all but the most daring and unscrupulous from attempting it. The ordinary man may be assumed to decline to undertake it. In the long run this operates with fair effect to secure accuracy. (3) If, in addition to this, the entrant makes the record under a duty to an employer or other superior, there is additional risk and disgrace from the superior in case of inaccuracies. A motive on the whole the most powerful and most palpable of the class. More § 1522. The third reason is thus stated by Indal C J in I. & S. Higgins & Co. v. B. & C. 649. "The clerk had no interest to make a false entry if he had any interest it was rather to make a true entry. Again the clerk would be likely to bring disgrace with his employer. The fact that the entry was made was open to all the clerks in the office and the entry if false would be exposed to speedy discovery." See also Hargrave & Co. v. Heramba 8 Ind Cns 81=13 C. I. J 139.

In order to understand the Necessity principle, so far as a party's entry in a shop book is concerned we must go back to the time when this kind of entry was was first admitted. At that time a party was disqualified as a witness for him self, and since in certain class of transactions he was thus totally without evidence obtainable from others, certain past statements of his must be admitted by very necessity. Thus the principle of necessity and the principle of circumstantial guarantee were both recognized, and the case stood on the ordinary footing of an exception to the Hearsay rule, without reference to specific exceptions. When parties were made competent, on their own behalf, a main reason—the necessity disappeared, but the form of the rule was established before this change was made and its limitations can therefore be understood only by keeping in mind that the original attitude of the Courts in establishing it was precisely analogous to their attitude towards other Hearsay exceptions—119 more § 1536. As regards other regular entries made in the ordinary course of business this necessity principle is absolutely wanting (vide next topic).

‘It is recognized that to use a system of regular accounts to sustain a particular fraud is so difficult and dangerous a procedure that the Courts may guide their decisions by using entries in such a system, truth and accuracy and contemporaneous record being almost indispensable for a due carrying on of such accounts. Mukundram v Dayaram, 10 N. L. R. 41=23 Ind. Cas. 893. ‘It must be confessed that to forge elaborate accounts extending over six years or even to insert new sheets in such accounts, would be a most dangerous undertaking, and to make the different books correspond exactly would be a task of almost insuperable difficulty.’ Jaswant Singh v Sheo Narain, 16 A. 157=21 I. A. 6. The principle is to admit only such statements recorded by a party in his own behalf as by their nature and circumstances are ordinarily beyond his power to tamper with, undiscovered, for the purpose of a particular case. Mukundram v Dayaram, supra.

English rule—History of the exception. In England an exception to the Hearsay rule exists for regular entries made in the course of business, but there are two distinct branches to this exception: one concerned with such entries in general, and the other with entries by a party in his own shop books. Greenleaf § 116. In cases of regular entries made in the course of business, it is indispensable for the use of these statements that the entrant be unavailable as a witness. Death is usually spoken of as the condition on which they may be used, and death is certainly sufficient. Absence from jurisdiction should equally suffice. Elliot v Dyche, 78 Ala. 157. On the same principle, insanity (Union Bank v Knapp 3 Pick. 109) and illness hindering the presence of the witness should equally suffice, and in general ‘the ground is the impossibility of obtaining the testimony, and the cause of such impossibility seems immaterial. North Bank v Abbott, 13 Pick. 471. That which gives trustworthiness to such statements, and affords a reason for receiving them as an exception to the rule, is the habit and system of making the entries as part of the ordinary and regular course of business, removing the ordinary motives for untruth and adding certain safe guards for correctness. Per Tindal C. J. in Pool v Deas, 1 Bing. N. C. 649.

In order to understand the present condition of the law as regards parties shop books it is necessary to notice briefly the historical relation of the two forms of exception, this and the preceding one. First, there was in England, as early as the 1600s, a custom to receive the shop books of diverse men of trades and handicraftsmen in evidence of the particulars and certainty of the wares delivered and thus whether the books were kept by the party himself or by a clerk and whether the entrant were living or dead. But there was more or less abuse of this evidence in leaving the books uncrossed and any way discharged and still suing for the claim, more over, the whole proceeding was also disparaged as involving the making of evidence for one's self for ‘the rule is that a man cannot make evidence for himself. In 1609 Stat. Jac. I. C. 12, after reciting these considerations, forbade this use of shop books ‘in any action for any money due for wares hereafter to be delivered or for work hereafter to be done except (1) within one year after the delivery of the wares or the doing of the work, (2) where a bill of debt existed (3) between merchant and merchant, merchant and tradesman, or between tradesman and tradesman,’ for matters within the trade. That Statute was continued in 3 Car.

S. 34 I C 1 § 22 and 16 Car I, C 4 The higher Courts, applying the principle that a man cannot make evidence for himself, ultimately made the exclusion complete by refusing to recognize these books at all, after the expiration of the year. In the lower Courts, where the jurisdiction was limited to small claims the use of these books continued (Vide Thayer, Cases on Evidence pp 471, 506, 516 for a full collection of the historical material), and a recent Rule of Court has re-introduced the use (to an extent somewhat indefinite) in the upper Courts (Rule of Court 1893 Ord 33, R 3, Ord 30, R 7 as amended by Rules of July, 1902). But before the end of the century of the above Statute the entries of a deceased clerk (even a clerk of a party) began to be admitted on considerations of necessity, as an exception to the Hearsay rule. It was distinctly understood that their use, though affording some concession to parties was a different thing from the use of books kept by a living party himself. Price v Lord Torrington, (2 Ld R 873) is the case most frequently taken as the limit mark of the rule, but the usage is earlier than that case (Vide, Putman v Maitland 1 Ld R 732, Sir Biby Lake's Case, Theory of Ev 93). The attitude of the Court may be gathered from the following passage in Lefebvre v Worden, 2 Ve 41: "So far as the Courts of justice have gone (and that was going a good way) and perhaps broke in upon the original strict rule of evidence) that where there was such evidence (entries) by a servant known in transacting the business, as in a goldsmith's shop by a cashier or book keeper, such entry, supported on the oath of that servant that he used to make entries from time to time and that he made them truly, has been read. Further, where that servant, agent, or book keeper has been dead if there is proof that he was the servant or agent usually employed in such business was intrusted to make such entries by his master, (and) that it was the course of trade,—on proof that he was dead and that it was his hand writing, such entry has been read (which was Sir Biby Lake's Case). And that was going a great way, for there it might be objected that such entry was the same as if made by the master himself yet by reason of the difficulty, of making proof in cases for this kind the Court has gone so far. The admission thus covered only the books of a clerk of a party, But already there were instances for shadowing a wide principle (Smart v Williams, Comb 247, Woodnoth v Lord Cobham, Bunbury 180, Sutton v Gregory, Comb 247, Cis 150), and finally in Doe v Turford 3 B & Ad 890, the matter was placed on a firm footing, and the general scope of the exception was understood as covering all entries made "by a person, since deceased, in the ordinary course of his business"—whether a person wholly unconnected with the parties or the clerk of a party, or a party himself. Greenl Ev § 120b

English Law When a person in the regular course of his duty or office performs some business transaction and makes forthwith a return or record of it which he has no interest to falsify such return or record is after his death evidence against all persons of the performance of the transaction, and is known as a declaration in the course of duty. Price v Torrington 1 Sm L O Polman v Gray, 12 Ch D 411, Sturla v Freccia 5 App C 623, 640. The guarantee of its credibility, is the accuracy which is generally produced by business routine. Wills Ev 2nd Ed p 178. So in England when A sues B for the price of goods sold in entry in A's shop books, debiting B with the goods, is not evidence for A to prove the debt. Smith v Anderson 7 C B 21. Phip Er 19. But where A sues B for the price of goods sold an entry in A's shop book debiting C and not B with the goods is evidence against A to disprove the debt. Scott, 6 C & P 241. Entries made in a ledger or diary in the ordinary course of business are not admissible in evidence if the writer be still alive, and even though he has absconded or is kept away by the other side, though if he be called as a witness he may refresh his memory by referring to them. So the evidence contemplated by this section is not admissible according to the English common law. Cum Ev 11th Ed 99. Field Ev 6th Ed p 154.

Origin of the section The present section, which is in conformity with the law of France and America, is a reproduction of the Roman law, under which the production of a merchant's or tradesman's book of accounts, regularly and fairly kept in the usual manner, was deemed presumptive evidence (see Ev 1st probatio) of the justice of his claim, and in such cases, the suppletory oath of the party (iuramentum Suppletivum) was admitted to make up the plena probatio necessary to a decree in his favour' Taylor § 712 By the law of France, too the books of merchants and trade-men regularly kept and written from day to day, without any blank, when the tradesman has the reputation of probity, constitutes a semi proof and with his suppletory oath are received as full proof to establish his demand Greenl Ld § 119 cited in Taylor § 712 The same doctrine is familiar in the law of Scotland by which books of merchants and others, kept with a certain reasonable degree of regularity, satisfactory to the Court, may be received in evidence the party being allowed to give his own oath in supplement of such imperfect proof It seems however, that a course of dealing or other "pregnant circumstances" must in general be first shown by evidence aliunde before the proof can be regarded as amounting to the degree of semiplena probatio to be rendered complete by the oath of the party Tay on Evidence pp 273—277, Greenl Ev § 119 A party may, under this section, corroborate other evidence of a debt being due to him by entries, whether by himself or another in his own books provided the books have been regularly kept in the course of business Cun. Et. 10th Ed 175

Old law under Act II of 1855 Section 43 of the repealed Act II of 1855 lays down "Books provided to have been regularly kept in the course of business shall be admissible as corroborative but not as independent proof of the facts stated therein" So, even by that Act a man was not allowed to make evidence for himself by what he chooses to write in his own books behind the back of third parties But where there was other independent evidence of the truth of the transaction to which the accounts referred they were admissible as corroborative evidence provided the books were first shown to the satisfaction of the Court to have been regularly kept in the course of business Nori Ev 193 see also Dwarika Doss v Jankar Doss 6 M J A. 88 But such books could not be used as independent evidence Rai Sri Krishen v Rai Hurri Krishen 5 M J A 432, Dwarika Doss v Darka Doss 2 Agr 308, Pimkristo v Hurrydo Marsh 219, Jagun Koor v Raghoonundun 10 W R C R 143, Allyat v Jugut Chunder 5 W R C R 242 Gopal Mundal v Nabho Krishen 5 W R Act X Rule 83 Account books are legal evidence to corroborate oral testimony Rajnaram v Oliva 5 W R Act X Rule 30 Ram v Hurry Marsh 219—1 Hay 569 Doornu v Stevens, 2 Ind Jur N 85 Zainab v Hadjee 2 Ind Jur N 54 Ganga v Inderjit, 23 W R 390 P C But the language of Act II of 1855 differs very materially from that of Evidence Act (I of 1872) The only limitation in section 34 is that statements contained in documents of this kind shall not alone be sufficient to charge any one with liability This change of expression has made substantial alteration in the law Per Marfaty J in Belasi Khan v Rash Beharee 22 W R 519, but see Surnomoy v Johur Mahomed 10 C L R 516, Ahtouli v Tarak, 16 C L J 323=17 C W N 744 A hath chutta book is a document kept especially as a security for the vendor, and in the absence of fraud it must be considered binding upon him Gopeck v Abdool 1 Ind Jur N 5 375

Scope of the section This section states that books of accounts regularly kept in the ordinary course of business are relevant whenever they refer to a matter into which the Court has to inquire but such statements shall not alone be sufficient evidence to charge a person with liability Now section 34 does not make books of accounts inadmissible unless corroborated It states distinctly that such books are admissible but not sufficient by themselves to charge any person with liabilities Even though they are uncorroborated they are still evidence It is not correct to say that such books are inadmissible They are admissible. It is not therefore correct to say that such books of accounts are inadmissible unless corroborated if required to charge a person with liability It would be more correct to say that though inadmissible they do not establish the facts required to be proved, i.e., that a person owned a certain sum of money unless corroborated Per Cumming J in Gopeswar Sen v Bhooy Chand, 32 C W N 580=53 C 1167=108 Ind Cas 883=A I R 1926 Cal 851, Belasi Khan v Rash Beharee 22 W R 519 Dukha Mundal v Grant, 16 C L J 24, but see

S 34 Aktowli v Taral Nath Ghose, 17 C W N 774=16 C L J 328, Emperor v Narbada, A I R 1930 All 38, Duarla v Sant, 18 A 118, Far-uddi v Agni Kumar, 71 Ind Cas 300, Surnamoy v Johur Mahomed, 10 C L R 51a, Nuroi v Maharaja, 82 Ind Cas 794, Deonarayan v Duarka, 9 Pat L T 619. 'The expression 'corroborative evidence,' 'independent evidence' and 'substantive evidence' that are found in many of the reported decisions hearing upon section 34 of Act I of 1872 are somewhat out of place in view of the wording of that section and have not been handed down to us from the words 'corroborative and 'independent' that appeared in section 43 of the old Act and these words as well as the word 'substantive' that were used in the decisions thereunder. The present section deals amongst others, with the relevancy of evidence and in some instances with its prohibitive value. The only material difference is between an entry relevant under section 34 and one relevant under section 32 cl (2) is that in the former case the person who made the entry may be available as a witness while in the latter case he is not. I find it very difficult to appreciate on what ground the legislature could intend to exempt entries relevant under section 32 clause (2) from the disability that it imposes on entries relevant under section 34 by the second part of that section, and personally I have always felt inclined to take the view that such entries, no matter whether they are relevant under one section or under the other are not to be considered as alone sufficient to charge any person with liability. The other view, however, namely that the latter part of the section 34 applies only to such entries which are relevant only under section 34 and not under section 32 clause (2) is backed by the high authority of Sir Laurence Jenkins C J, in the case of Ram Pyarabai v Balaji Sridhar, 28 B 294 and has been accepted as correct in Daji Abaji Khari v Gobin Narayan, 10 Bom L R 811, Dukha Mandal v W N Grant, 16 C L J 328, and in 24 and Aktowli v Taral Nath Ghosh, 17 C W N 774=16 C L J 328, and it is perhaps too late to contest it. If this other view is adopted it should be held that it was intended by the legislature that where the maker of the entry is available as a witness the entry alone will not be sufficient proof to charge a person with liability but where the maker is not available as a witness but the entry is relevant by reason of one or other of the conditions mentioned in the opening paragraph of section 32 being present there is no statutory obligation to look for anything else to found the liability. Per Mukherji J in Gopeswar Sin v By v Chand, supra see also Jainab Biswas v Sita Kumari Devi 46 C L J 233=144 Ind Cas 733=A I R 1927 Cil 835. It is essential in every case where reliance is placed upon books of account to establish that they have been regularly kept in the course of business but it is not sufficient to prove the correctness of the books the entries themselves have to be proved, unless the necessity for such proof is removed by the admission of the opposite party. Bibi Imambakh v Haji Motasuddi 15 C L J 621=13 Ind Cas 678. Under the Indian Evidence Act entries in books of account regularly kept in the course of business are admissible in evidence not only for refreshing the memory of the witness but also as corroborative evidence of the story which he tells. Books of account which profess to record facts relating only to the particular transaction in question, are less reliable than a book wherein the same is recorded in common with other transactions in the ordinary course of business. Bhrozoy Hong v Ramanathan, 29 C 334 P C=6 C W N 401=4 Bom L J 378=8 Sar 273. It is not necessary in a suit on accounts to show how the accounts came to be written and that they were kept in regular course of business. If a gomastah and a member of a firm were examined and depose that the accounts were regularly kept the accounts may be held to have been proved in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Beecha Lal v Jai Pershad 10 P R 10. A party who calls for an account book is bound by all the entries contained therein. Shab Pershad v Promotho 10 W R 193, Kameswari v Jai Anand 9 A 713 P C.

Account books. The remarks of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Jumant v Shro Narain 16 A 157 (161)=21 I A C are instructive as to the variety in account books. Some may be of no evidential value but merely a man's private record prepared by him as may be in accordance with his custom and convenience. Other accounts may be so kept, and may be so called, external circumstances, as to carry conviction that they are true" "And," their Lordships continue "the Evidence Act, section 34, therefore, enacts that entries in books of account regularly kept in the course of business shall be relevant evidence, though not sufficient of themselves to charge any person with liability. The admission of such entries on behalf of a person making them is an exception to the general rule laid down in section 21 of the Act

"The word 'books' in its ordinary sense signifies a collection of sheets of paper bound together in a manner which cannot be disturbed or altered except by tearing in part. The binding is of a kind which is not intended to be movable in the sense of being undone or put together again. A collection of papers in a portfolio or clip, or strung together on a piece of twine which is intended to be untied at will would not in the ordinary English, be called a book. But so narrow a signification would not do in India where accounts are often kept on sheets of paper laced or threaded together in a manner which allows removal of any sheet at any time by the untying of a knot. Of this class are the bahis of practically every Marwari banker in India. The definition of 'book' given in the English Copyright Act 1845 section 3 is that the term means and includes 'every volume, part or division of a volume pamphlet sheet of letter press, sheet of music map, chart, or plan separately published' This is a special definition for the convenience of using a single word to answer the purpose of a particular Act, and would obviously misrepresent what the Legislature had in mind when enacting section 34 of the Indian Evidence Act. It may be pointed out that even the Marwari bahis, though capable of being unbound without damage, are not made in that form for that purpose, but when properly kept are pegged and intended not to be taken apart at any time for any purpose. I think the term 'book' in section 34 aforesaid may properly be taken to signify ordinarily, a collection of sheets of paper bound together with the intention that such binding shall be permanent and the papers used collectively in one volume. It is easier however to say what is not a book for the purpose of section 34, and I have no hesitation in holding that unbound sheets of paper, in whatever quantity though filled up with one continuous account are not a book of account within the purview of section 34.

When the article produced is a book we have still to see that it is a book of account, for that is the only kind of book to which the section opens the door of relevant evidence. I am alive to the dictum of the Privy Council in Deputy Commissioner of Bara Bank v Ram Parsad 27 O 118=26 I A 254=4 C W N 417 disapproving of the dictum of West J in Munchershaw Bexonji v New Dhurumsay Spinning and Weaving Co, 4 B 576 at p 583, is giving too limited a meaning to the section. But there is nothing in that case which gives any undue extension to the word 'account' beyond its usual significance. To account is to reckon, and I am unable to conceive any accounting which does not involve either addition or subtraction or both of these operations of arithmetic. A book which contains successive entries of items may be a good memorandum book but until those entries are totalled or balanced or both, as the case may be, there is no reckoning and no account. In the making of totals and striking balances from time to time lies the chief safeguard under which books of account have been distinguished from other private records as capable of containing substantive evidence on which reliance may be placed. A private diary may be most regularly kept and contain records of facts contemporaneously made, of the utmost value. It may be used for contradicting or corroborating a witness or refreshing his memory and the like under sections 144 177 159 and others of the Evidence Act, for such user does not make the document itself evidence. (Cf Ramji v Rangayya, 1 M II C R 168) It may also come in under section 32(2) if the requirements of that section are satisfied. But no entry in such a diary can be filed as documentary evidence of the facts stated in it in favour of the person making the entry if he is a party to the suit. It would be excluded by section 21 of the Act, and section 34 provides no exception in favour of it. The reason for such differentiation between a private diary and a private account is manifest. An account, regularly kept necessarily results in a continuity which makes fraudulent addition extremely difficult and dangerous, it is a chain of forged links into which the subsequent

It is not necessary in a suit on accounts to show how the accounts came to be written and that they were kept in regular course of business. If a gomastah and a member of a firm were examined and deposed that the accounts were regularly kept the accounts may be held to have been proved in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Biccha Lal v Jan Pershad, 45 I R 102. A party who calls for an account book is bound by all the entries contained therein. Shub Pershad v Promotho 10 W R 193. Rameswari v Bil Kichu, 9 A 713 P C.

Account books The remarks of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Jaswant v Shoo Narain 16 A 157 (161)=21 I A 6 are instructive as to the variety in account books. Some may be of no evidential value but merely a man's private record prepared by him, as may be in accordance with his place and convenience. Other accounts may be so kept and may so tally with external circumstances, as to carry conviction that they are true" "Aud," their Lordships continue "the Evidence Act, section 34, therefore enacts that entries in books of account regularly kept in the course of business shall be relevant evidence, though not sufficient of themselves to charge any person with liability. The admission of such entries on behalf of a person making them is an exception to the general rule laid down in section 21 of the Act" S 34

"The word 'books' in its ordinary sense signifies a collection of sheets of paper bound together in a manner which cannot be disturbed or altered except by tearing a part. The binding is of a kind which is not intended to be movable in the sense of being undone or put together again. A collection of papers in a portfolio, or clip, or strung together on a piece of twine which is intended to be untied at will would not in the ordinary English, be called a book. But so narrow a signification would not do in India, where accounts are often kept on sheets of paper laced or threaded together in a manner which allows removal of any sheet at any time by the untying of a knot. Of this class are the bahis of practically every Marwari trader in India. The definition of 'book' given in the English Copyright Act, 1845 section 3 is that the term means and includes 'every volume, part or division of a volume pamphlet sheet of letter press, sheet of music map, chart, or plan separately published'. This is a special definition for the convenience of using a single word to answer the purpose of a particular Act, and would obviously misrepresent what the Legislature had in mind when enacting section 34 of the Indian Evidence Act. It may be pointed out that even the Marwari bahis, though capable of being unbound without damage, are not made in that form for that purpose, but when properly kept are paged and intended not to be taken apart at any time for any purpose. I think the term 'book' in section 34 aforesaid may properly be taken to signify ordinarily, a collection of sheets of paper bound together with the intention that such binding shall be permanent and the papers used collectively in one volume. It is easier however to say what is not a book for the purpose of section 34, and I have no hesitation in holding that unbound sheets of paper, in whatever quantity though filled up with one continuous account are not a book of account within the purview of section 34.

When the article produced is a book we have still to see that it is a book of account, for that is the only kind of book to which the section opens the door of relevant evidence. I am alive to the dictum of the Privy Council in Deputy Commissioner of Bara Banks v Ram Parsad 27 C 118=26 I A 254=4 C W N 417 disapproving of the dictum of West J in Munchershaw Bexonji v New Dhurumsay Spinning and Weaving Co, 4 B 576 at p 583 as giving too limited a meaning to the section. But there is nothing in that case which gives any undue extension to the word 'account' beyond its usual significance. To account is to reckon, and I am unable to conceive any accounting which does not involve either addition or subtraction or both of these operations of arithmetic. A book which contains successive entries of items may be a good memorandum book but until those entries are totalled or balanced or both, as the case may be, there is no reckoning and no account. In the making of totals and striking balances from time to time lies the chief safe guard under which books of account have been distinguished from other private records as capable of containing substantive evidence on which reliance may be placed. A private diary may be most regularly kept and contain records of facts contemporaneously made, of the utmost value. It may be used for contradicting or corroborating a witness or refreshing his memory and the like under sections 144 147 159 and others of the Evidence Act for such use does not make the document itself evidence. (Cf Ramji v Rangappa, 1 M H C R 168). It may also come in under section 32(2) if the requirements of that section are satisfied. But no entry in such a diary can be filed as documentary evidence of the facts stated in it in favour of the person making the entry if he is a party to the suit. It would be excluded by section 21 of the Act and section 34 provides no exception in favour of it. The reason for such differentiation between a private diary and a private account is manifest. An account, regularly kept necessarily results in a continuity which makes fraudulent addition extremely difficult and dangerous. It is a chain of forged links into which the subsequent interpolation of a link of forgery without discovery is almost impracticable. The man who wishes to defraud his neighbour generally avoids keeping regular accounts, or, having kept them suppresses them. The labour of wearing falsehood with truth in regularly kept account is too great and still continuous to be popular, because of the mathematical connection running through them. But these safe guards of truth are entirely absent in the most regularly kept of private diaries and subsequent interpolations, to meet an unexpected demand and facilitate fraud are generally possible without difficulty and danger of discovery. It is clear that the Legislature, which guides itself by human experience had such considerations before it when it enacted, by section 34 an exception to section 21, in favour of books of account. I am therefore, of opinion that the Legislature did not intend to include in that category any record in which there is no process of reckoning. Therefore a book which merely contains entries of items, of which no account is made at any time, is not a book of account for the purposes of section 34. The papers produced by D W No 12 in this case are entirely devoid of totals and balances. Therefore the entries in them never ripened into accounts, and such entries—which could obviously be fraudulently added to or penned through at any time without hindrance or discovery are not admissible under section 34. Per Stangeron A J C in Mukund Ram v Dayaram, 23 Ind Cas 893 (894, 895) = 10 A L R 44

Entries of books of account regularly kept in the course of business. Section 43 of Act II of 1855 was as follows — "Books proved to have been kept in the course of business shall be admissible as corroborative and not as independent proof of the facts therein stated." In this section the word 'regularly kept' are substituted for the words "proved to have been regularly kept" and in illustration to the section the word used is "how and not 'proves'". It is apparent, therefore, that the law embodied in section 34 of Act I of 1872 is not quite the same that was contained in section 43 of Act II of 1855, and this seems to be conceded on all hand. The plain words of section 34 indicate that the section deals with all entries in books of accounts regularly kept in the course of business—in the first place, making them relevant whenever they refer to a matter into which the Court has to enquire, and next, providing that when such entries are sought to be used as statements for a particular purpose—namely, to charge any person with liability they shall not alone be sufficient evidence for the purpose. Section 32 clause (1) makes relevant a statement consisting of an entry made by a person who is a witness before this Court in books—not necessarily books of account—but kept in the ordinary course of business. A book of account may be one of such books and where an entry appears in a book of account it comes both under section 32 clause (2) and section 34. The illustration to section 34 makes it plain that if the book of account is regularly kept in the course of business the entry will be relevant notwithstanding that the person who made the entry has not been examined to prove the truth of the transaction to which the entry relates and notwithstanding that he is available as a witness. Per Yokyer J in Gopeshwar Sen v Byoy Chand 32 C. W. N 590 (184). Under the old Act II of 1855 books to be admissible had to be "proved to have been regularly kept in the course of business." In the later Act of 1872 the words "proved to have been" have been dropped. This amounts to material alteration in the law. The law is now that the books in question are books of account and regularly kept in the regular course of business. Emperor v Yarbada, A I R 1930 All 19.

A book of account may be said to be regularly kept although the book is not entered up from day to day or from hour to hour as the transaction takes place. Chandreshwar Prasad v Bisheshwar Pratap, 5 P 771. According to section 34 "regularly" or "systematically" means that the accounts are kept according to a set of rules or a system whether the accountant has followed the rule or system closely or not. Nor is there anything in the section that says the system must be an elaborate or reliable one. Both the matters—the character of the system and the closeness with which it has been followed—are the weight of the evidence of admissibility. The weight of memoranda of accounts kept generally according to the most elementary standard, though often departing from it are admissible in evidence, but would of course have no weight. Kesho Rao v Ganesh, 95 Ind Cas 128=A I R 1926 Nag 407. It would be giving too limited meaning to section 34 if it be held that books of account regularly kept in the course of business mean books entered from day to day or from hour to hour as transactions take place. The time of making the entries may affect their value, but would not, by the mere fact of the entries not being made from day to day or from hour to hour make them entirely irrelevant. The Deputy Commissioner v Ram Parshad, 4 C W N 147=27 C 118 P C=26 I A 24, Munchershaw Borani v The New Dhurumsay, 4 B 576, was not approved. "Finally, when we have got books of account, properly so called we must see that they have been regularly kept. This does not mean as is frequently supposed that they must be maintained in a particular form favoured by bankers usually called the mahajan system. Their evidential value will of course depend upon their formality and the checks against fraud secured by method of keeping them, but that is not to be confused with admissibility. A single account book, however simple, if regularly kept will be admissible. As regards admissibility section 34 makes no difference between the cash books and ledgers of a large bank and the day book of a house keeper. The difference lies in the weight to be given to the entries therein. But where the fact of regular maintenance and general accuracy of a account book is not admitted, it must be formally proved. Mukundam v Dayaram 10 N L R 44=23 Ind Cas 893.

Though an unstamped acknowledgment of debt in the plaintiff's book, by the defendant, is not admissible against the defendant under the Stamp Act yet the book itself is admissible as corroborative evidence of the plaintiff's claim. Debi Dutta v Man Singh 43 P R 1874, Kalu v Basanta Mal, 33 P R 1873.

Accounts prepared at considerable intervals from memory or possibly inadequate materials cannot be treated as proof of the actual income and expenditure of the estate to which they relate although they may be useful in cases where they corroborate other evidence. Raja Gopala Naidu v Subbammal 31 M 291=109 Ind Cas 153=28 L W 151=A I R 1928 Mad 180=51 M L J 703.

Where there were only the account books and the general statement of the plaintiff that there were dealings between him and defendant held that the dealings were not proved under s 34 Evidence Act, in the absence of evidence of specific sums having been paid. Buta v Triol, 100 Ind Cas 862=A I R 1927 Lah 903. Narayan v Lithoba, 100 Ind Cas 863=A I R 1927 Nag 177. The mere production of account books without more does not prove anything. Mere proof of the existence of certain entries in books of account kept in the ordinary course of business is not sufficient to charge a person with liability. The law requires proof not only of account books generally but of each item. Mathilda v Fritz, 23 L W 272=96 Ind Cas 429=A I R 1926 Mad 955, see also Abdul v Sharje 1922 Lah 378. Mere entries in books of account are not by themselves sufficient to charge any person with liability. The reason is that a man can not be allowed to make evidence for himself by what he chooses to write in his own books behind the back of third parties. There must be independent evidence of the transaction to which the entries relate. Beni v Bisan 89 Ind Cas 371=A I R 1925 Nag 445. Plaintiff's own statement on oath in support of entries, can be sufficient to support the entries in plaintiff's account books to fix the defendant with liability. Firm of Jodha v Ditta 84 Ind Cas 909=6 Lah L J 504=A I R 1925 Lah 242. This section does not limit in any way at all the nature of the material upon which Court may rely to support the statements in a book of account. Such material may take the shape of contemporary vouchers receipts or other documentary evidence or of sworn oral testimony. Kallu Mat v Bhawan, L R 6 A 375=83 Ind Cas 393=A I R 1925 All 742, see also Yesuadayan v Subba 53 Ind Cas 704, Abdul v Puran 82 P R 1914=277 P L R 1914, Ramaswami v Ramanathan, (1914) M W N 240=22 Ind Cas 627. Where a claim based on entries in account books is entirely denied plaintiff must prove the various items of his account by

In a suit for recovery of water cess, bahi entries showing that in previous years the defendant has been paying cess at the rate demanded, are admissible in evidence. Prabhu Dyal v Ram Chander, A I R 1923 Lah 593.

Where original accounts were kept in a rough book or on slips of paper and were after an interval of time entered in the regular books, the books can be rejected on the ground that the entries were not made in them regularly from day to day. Mangoli Prasad v Mandir Das, 11 Ind Cas 9. Where the plaintiffs can easily produce independent and trustworthy evidence in support of entries in their account books, it would be unfair to defendants and wrong in principle to accept as sufficient proof the entries, uncorroborated by any evidence other than a somewhat vague statement by one of the plaintiffs to the effect practically that the books speak for themselves. Ganga Ram v Kaka Ram, 3 P W R 1914=22 Ind Cas 403. An entry in the paimash alone is not sufficient evidence to establish a right to property which is denied. Asha v Vasudevan, 7 M 297. A single account book, not otherwise suspicious, is admissible in evidence particularly when it is supported by prima facie reliable evidence. Jita v Neki, 4 Ind Cas 495=51 P W R 1909. Entries to be admitted as evidence by way of corroboration of other testimony must be made in the regular course of business. It is not sufficient to prove that the entries were taken from books which were regularly and correctly kept. Queen Empress v Sayad Sarfuddin Rat Un Cr C 341=Cr Rg 37 of 1887. Though entries in account books are proved not to have been regularly kept in the course of business, yet if they are proved to have been kept on behalf of a firm of contractors by its servant or agent appointed for that purpose they are relevant admissions against the firm. Reg v Hanmant, 1 B 6, 10. If books are kept in pursuance of some continuous and uniform practice in the current routine of the business of the particular person to whom they belong they are 'books of account' regularly kept in the course of business' within the meaning of s. 34 Evidence Act. Crown v Romchand G S L R 195=14 Cr L J 262=19 Ind Cas 202.

Absence of entries effect of. Although this section makes an entry in a book of account relevant, such a book is not by itself, relevant to disprove an alleged transaction by the absence of any entry concerning it. Queen Empress v Grees Chunder, 10 C 1024. In Kamalapati Banerjee v Bejoy Lal Chaudhuri, 10 Ind Cas 291, the Court observed: 'But even if the account books were produced and it was established that the entries were not to be found there the question is at least doubtful whether this would be any evidence against the defendant.' The Queen v Grees Chunder supra and In the matter of Jugan Lal, 7 C L R 21 seem to indicate that though the entries in books of account are relevant to the extent provided by section 34 of the Evidence Act, such a book is not by itself relevant to raise an inference from the absence of any entry. The American view is apparently supported by the observation of Lord Duns in Ram Persad v Lakshpati Koer, 30 C 231 (217)=7 C W N 162. The contrary view however was taken in Sagarmull v Munraj, 4 C W N 100 in which it appeared that the fact that there have been held that the cases just mentioned did not rule that the fact of absence of an entry is no evidence at all under any section of the Act, and that evidence that there is no entry in the account books, though not a prima facie evidence under section 34 may be admissible under sections 9 and 11. In Imrit Chander v Serdhar Panday Mr Justice Moolerjee J said: 'In support of the contention that it is not evidence, reliance may possibly be placed upon the cases of Queen Empress v Grees Chunder supra and in the matter of Jugan Lal 7 C L R 21. These cases however if they decide that the absence of a recital in a document is not admissible in evidence at all under any section of the Evidence Act cannot be accepted as giving a correct exposition of the law on a matter of fact in neither of these cases was the question raised in this form. What was argued was that section 34 did not make the document admissible for the purposes stated. It was pointed out, however, in the case of Sagarmull v Munraj supra that under ss. 9 and 11 of the Evidence Act the absence of recital in a document may be used in evidence as against the person who is not a party to that document, and the observation of Lord Duns in the case of Ram Pershad Singh v Lakhpatkoer, 30 C 231, must be taken to be restricted in the same manner " 15 C L J 7=13 Ind Cas 120=17 C W N 108, see also Imambandi v Matasuddi 15 C L J 621=13 Ind Cas 678, Ali Nasar Khan v Manil Chand, 25 A 90=22 A W N 207, Pragdas v Daulat Ram, 11 B 257, Debendra v Arun, 1925 Cal 65, Talakumar v Arun 37 C, L J 319=74 Ind Cas 383, Kasam v Haji 67 Ind Cas 327 Ganga Ram v Lachmaram 19 C W N 611=28 Ind Cas 705, Imambandi v Haji Mutsaddi 29 C L J 409=45 C 878

Jama wasil baki papers Where certain entries are admissible under section 32, the position is that there is no statutory obligation to look for any thing else in order to found the liability. It does not follow that such entries should necessarily, in any event be regarded as conclusive of the truth of the statements therein made. When such entries in the landlord's papers are sought to be used against the tenant their evidentiary value has got to be carefully appraised, the entries themselves being scrutinised and the circumstances in which they were made being considered with extreme care. Gopeswar Sen v Bejoy Chand Mahatah, 32 C W N 580=35 C 1167 Jama bandis which formed part of the record of the proceedings of a settlement under the Bengal Regulation are admissible under this section being in the nature of books of account as corroborative evidence but not as in themselves substantive evidence. Dionarayan v Duarka 9 Pat L T 679=109 Ind Cas 136=A I R 1928 Pat 429. Although Zemindari papers cannot be admitted under s 34 of the Evidence Act as corroborative evidence without independent evidence of the fact of collection at certain rates they can be used as independent evidence if they are relevant under s 32 clause (2) of that Act. Charidar Bai v Kailash Behari, 4 Pat L W 218=(1918) Pat 145=3 Pat L J 306=44 Ind Cas 422. In an application under section 105 of the Bengal Tenancy Act for settlement of fair and equitable rent the landlord filed certain collection papers for showing variation of rent from time to time. The collection papers were produced by an officer of the landlord who deposed that they were in his custody. There was no evidence as to who wrote these papers nor as to who collected the rent, there was neither any evidence to show when and by whom these entries in collection papers were made. Held that the collection papers were inadmissible in evidence. Altouli v Taral Nath 16 C L J 328. Jama wasil baki papers have no weight except as corroborative evidence. Surnomoy v Johur Mahomed, 10 C L R 345. Belaet Khan v Rashbehary 22 W R 549. Gopal Mandat v Nabolasto 5 W R (Act X) 83, Kherromonee v Bejoy 7 W R 533, Umed Ali v Habibullah, 47 C 266. Jeshuradynn v Subba Naicker, 52 Ind Cas 704, Dwarla Das v Sant Baksh 18 A 92, Mahomed Mahmud v Safar Ali 11 C 407 (409), Fayyuddin v Agnikumar, 71 Ind Cas 300, Jonab v Sita Kumari 46 C L J 253=104 Ind Cas 733=A I R 1927 Cal 855, Umed Ali v Habibullah 47 C 266=31 C L J 69. The fact that collection papers may be admissible under s 34 of the Evidence Act does not prevent their also being admissible under s 32 of the Act if the condition prescribed by section 32 are established. Bhaba Sundari v Thira Naryn, 6 Ind Cas 369.

Account books, entries, how to be proved. Where certain account books were produced in the original Court by the plaintiff and all that was proved was that they were in the handwriting of his father and the books were not even examined in detail in the original Court, and the particular entries upon which the plaintiff relied were not selected and exhibited, it was held that the entries ought to have been pointed out and proved and evidence should also have been given in detail as to the character of the books themselves. Hingunmyn v Heramba Chandra 8 Ind Cas 81=13 C L J 139. In that case the Court in delivering the judgment said "It is essential, in every case where reliance is placed upon books of account, to establish that they have been regularly kept in the course of business. It is perfectly true that as laid down by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Deputy Commissioner v Ram Pershad, 27 C 118=26 I A 251=4 C W N 417, they need not be written up from moment to moment or from day to day. But it is obvious that if they have been written up casually once a week or a fortnight, though they may be

S 34 admitted in evidence, obviously they do not possess the same claim to confidence that attaches to books entered from day to day or from hour to hour as transactions take place (Muncher Shaw v New Dhurumsay, 4 B 576). The proper procedure to follow therefore, is, as laid down by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Duarka Dass v Janki Das, 6 M I A 88 (98) to call the clerk who has kept the accounts or some person competent to speak to their genuineness and prove that the books have been regularly kept and that they are generally accurate. But this is not all that is necessary, section 34 makes the entries relevant if they are entries in a book of account regularly kept in the course of business. It is therefore not sufficient merely to prove the correctness of the book the entries themselves have to be proved unless indeed the necessity for such proof is removed by the admission of the opposite party. In the case before us the account books were produced in the original Court and all that was proved on the side of the plaintiff was that the books were in the handwriting of his father Kali Prasanno Chuckerbutty. The books were not even examined in detail in the original Court. The particular entries upon which the plaintiff relies were not even selected and exhibited. In this Court some of the entries have not been taken at all. Obviously the proceedings in the original Court were conducted with considerable laxity. The particular entries upon which the plaintiff relies could to have been pointed out and proved, evidence should also have been given in detail as to the character of the books themselves. We have our eyes examined the books closely and we are of opinion that they require much fuller examination than has been applied by the Courts below, before the plaintiff can be permitted to use any entries there in support of his claim. It must be remembered that the books purport to be private account books of the father of the plaintiff and they ought, consequently, to be carefully tested before they are used in favour of the defendant. In fact when they are used in favour of the plaintiff it must not be overlooked that the plaintiff is allowed to use in his own favour evidence which he or his predecessor in interest has created the Court must therefore be assured that the books are thoroughly reliable. There was evidence to show that the khata books containing the memoranda of the receipts and expenditure of a debtor estate as well as that on the my estate of the debtor were deposited by him soon after the surat, embodying the expenses, and maskabari, or accounts were prepared. It was found that the latter accounts were kept regularly in the ordinary course of business. The maskabari and khata books should be regarded as the original accounts and are admissible in evidence. Section 34 even though the khata books may not be forthcoming. Raja Pary v Narendra Nath, 9 C W N 421-32 C 582. Where a Small Cause Court gave a decree for the plaintiff on the evidence of his account books and of his keeper, who deposed that the entries in the account books were made from the khata supplied to him by the plaintiff on the days on which such entries were supplied it was held that the plaintiff not having produced the books by himself going into the witness box or by accounting for his failure in going into the witness box was not entitled to succeed. Hira Bhai v G. B. Rani, 63 P R 1897.

Where there are entries in plaintiff's bahi account book, which are in the report of the commissioner correct and regular according to the entries in the part of the country to which the parties belong and there is a plaintiff's statement on solemn affirmation that the account is correct, it was held that certain disputed items interspersed in the account should not be rejected simply because they were not admitted by defendants and no special evidence was adduced in regard to them as there is no reason why such entries should have been interspersed in an otherwise true account. Hindus v Rani, 60 P R 1910-147 P L R 1910-117 P W R 1910. It is not precedent to accepting entries in account books as relevant under the Indian Evidence Act that it should be proved how the account was written and that they were regularly kept in the course of business. It is necessary that there should be other evidence in support of the entries to be established. The testimony of one of the plaintiffs as to the entries who were examined as witnesses for the defence was considered.

corroborative evidence of the accounts to charge the defendants with liability Bichha Lal v Jai Pershad, P L R 1900, 5. It is unnecessary to prove, by independent evidence, the correctness of every single item of an account extending over seven years, in the absence of any demand of the correctness of any of those items Moortee Ram v Laljee Sahoo, W R 1864, 174. Plaintiff sued for the amount due to him on several hundis drawn by the defendant. The main question was whether the hundis were genuine or false. The first Court found that the hundis were forged and dismissed the suit. The High Court on appeal gave a decree to the plaintiff, deciding that the hundis were genuine and the defendant's answer was false. Certain account books filed by the plaintiff and the evidence connected with them formed the main ground for the decision of the High Court in favour of the plaintiff. The Judicial Committee likewise observed that not only was there no discrepancy between the several account books, but each book contained that amount of difference which was appropriate to its character. The committee also used the better test of genuineness than the correspondence of the books themselves and that was their correspondence with other evidence and agreeing with the High Court on the entire evidence, confirmed the decision of that Court. Jaswant Singh v Sheonarayan, 16 A 157 = 21 I A 6 P C.

Plaintiffs sued to recover money due as balance of a running account and relied chiefly on their account books. The lower Court found that the books were regularly kept, and assumed as point of law that by reason of having been regularly kept, the books would by themselves constitute prima facie evidence against the defendants of the matters therein entered. The various items entered in the books not having been specifically proved by the plaintiff, the High Court held that the entries alone would not constitute, under this section, sufficient evidence to charge the defendant with liability. On the evidence however, one of the plaintiffs having given evidence with reference to the account books stating the amounts advanced to and repaid by the defendant and no question having been put to him suggesting that he was not speaking from his own personal knowledge, such evidence along with the evidence of a witness for the plaintiff and the entries in the plaintiff's account books, was sufficient to uphold the decree given to the plaintiff by the lower Court. Duarka Das v Sant Baksh, 18 A 92 = A W N 1895 233.

"There is frequently confusion in the subordinate Courts as to how an account book should be proved and used under section 34 aforesaid. It is common practice to call a witness and examine him, as to the particular item sought to be proved by getting him, as it were, to read them out to the Court, sometimes when he has no personal knowledge concerning them and they are not in his hand writing, meanwhile, it is taken for granted without formal proof that because the book is the khata or rokar of some firm, it is regularly kept. The question whether or not a book is regularly kept is one of fact, to be proved (if not admitted), according to the circumstances of each case. Where an entry is properly admitted it is mere waste of time to have its contents repeated out of the mouth of a witness who merely reads it and cannot supplement it with his personal knowledge. Use of an entry to refresh memory is one thing, its proof as substantive evidence under section 34 is another. But this distinction is constantly lost to sight by Judges and practitioners. A clerk called as a witness may depose—I remember paying out Rs 100 as a loan to the defendant ~~some~~ last year. Having now refreshed my memory from an entry made at the time in my master's cash book I can state that the date was the 15th Jan. 1910. That is not a case of evidence under section 34 of the Evidence Act. But ~~suppose~~ the account book had been produced and the entry tendered in evidence. Then the deposition of the clerk might have been in these terms—I know the defendant. I remember that he came to my master's shop and ~~borrowed~~ some money last year. I cannot remember the amount lent or the date of ~~loan~~ though I saw the money paid. I also saw another clerk make an entry of the loan in my master's cash book. This book (Exhibit A) shows ~~is~~ a book in which the entry ~~is~~ made. It is regularly kept. Transactions ~~are~~ entered as they occur and the ~~total~~ is totalled and balanced every day and ~~carried~~ carried into a ledger. S. 35. admitting the entries tendered by the plaintiff and using them to corroborate witness, and prove the amount and date of the loan. It would be waste of time and to miss the point of section 34 to get the witness to give oral evidence of contents of the entries by reading them out. Once they are qualified for admission under s. 34, the Court itself can read them and use their contents for its decision. Mulunda v. Dayaram, 23 Ind Cas 893=10 N L R 44

But such statements shall not alone be sufficient evidence. Section of the Evidence Act declares that entries in account books regularly kept in course of business should not alone be sufficient evidence to charge any person with liability. Ghastal v. Ranchor, A W N 1881, 60. Section 34 of the Evidence Act only lays down that a plaintiff cannot obtain a decree by merely proving the existence of certain entries in his books of account, even though those books are shown to be kept in the regular course of business. He has to show further by some independent evidence that the entries represent real and honest transactions and that moneys were paid in accordance with the entries. No particular form or kind of evidence in addition to the entries is required. Any relevant facts which can be treated as evidence without meaning of the Evidence Act would be sufficient corroboration of the evidence furnished in books of account, if true. *Yesuradhyam v. 35. An entry in any public or other official book, register, record, stating a fact in issue or relevant fact and made by a public servant in the discharge of his official duty, or by any other person in the performance of a duty specially enjoined by the law of the country in which such book, register or record is kept, is itself a relevant fact.

General Principle. An exception which in practice is by far the commonest in its employment is the exception admitting statements made by officers in pursuance of official duty. The principle of Necessity, which in one form or another is found in all the hearsay exceptions is satisfied not in the declaration of emergency or other like circumstances, as in section 32 supra, of the declaration but in the practically unendurable inconvenience of summoning public officers from their posts on the innumerable occasions when their official doings or records are to be proved in litigation. So in this and ensuing exceptions the application of the principle of necessity is found relaxed. Something is required that an absolute impossibility is regarded as sufficient. The necessity reduces itself to a high degree of expediency. In none of these exceptions (with the exception of the first) is it required that the witness be shown to be unavailable by reason of death, absence or the like circumstance. In the present exception it is only required why it is highly expedient, if not practically necessary, to accept the statement of an official in certain classes of case instead of summing him up to attend and testify in person before a Court or by deposition before a sioner The public officers are few in whose duly work something is not done which must later be proved in Court, and the trials are rare in which testimony is not needed from official sources Where there is no exception for official statements hosts of officials would be found devoting the greater part of their time to attending as witnesses in Court or delivering their depositions before an officer The work of administration of Government and the needs of the public having business with officials would alike suffer in consequence Although, then, there is strictly no necessity for employing hearsay, in the sense that the personal attendance of the officer is corporally impossible to obtain there is nevertheless a high degree of expediency that the public business be not deranged by insisting on the strict enforcement of the Hearsay rule Wigmore § 1631, Greenl Ev § 162 (m)

The second essential for an exception to the Hearsay rule is that some circumstantial guarantee of trustworthiness be found to take the place of oath confrontation and cross examination so far as may be Two reasons are stated by the Courts as justifying the present exception in this respect The first reason is related in its thought to the presumption that public officers do their duty In this case the guarantee of trustworthiness justifying the exception is usually said to be the official oath or duty Greenl Ev § 162 (m) In R v Aickles 1 Leach Cr L 3rd ed 436 the Court observed "The law reposes such a confidence in public officers that it presumes they will discharge their several trusts with accuracy and fidelity and therefore whatever acts they do in discharge of their public duty may be given in evidence and shall be taken to be true, under such a degree of caution as the nature and circumstances of each case may appear to require" Similarly Erle J in Doe v France, 15 Q B 758 said "It depends upon the public duty of the person who keeps this register to make such entries in it after satisfying himself of their truth" In Irish Society v Bishop of Derry, 12 Cl & F 468 Parke B said "The bishops in making this return discharged a public duty and faith is given that they would perform their duty correctly, the return is therefore admissible on the same principles on which other public documents are received" The fundamental circumstance is that an official duty exists to make an accurate statement and that this special and weighty duty will usually suffice as a motive to incite the officer to its fulfilment Possibly the duty may not be one for whose violation a penalty is expressly expressed Possibly the officer may not be one from whom in advance an express oath of office is required No stress seems to be laid judicially on either of these considerations nor need they be emphasized It is the influence of the official duty, broadly considered which is taken as the sufficient guarantee of trustworthiness, justifying the acceptance of the hearsay statement Wigmore § 1632

An additional reason and requirement is said to be the publicity of the document which ensures the probability of the correction of the possible errors by the public who have access to it and the subjective incentive on the part of the official to state correctly that which the public's inspection would detect as false if he recorded falsely Greenl Ev § 162 (m) The principle, upon which (a previous decision) goes is that it should be a public enquiry public document and made by a public officer I understand by a public document there to mean a document that is made for the purpose of the public making use of it and being able to refer to it I think the very object of it must be that it should be made for the purpose of being kept public so that the persons concerned in it may have access to it afterwards Sturt v Freer, L R 5 App Cas 623 "This reasoning is plausible" says Prof Wigmore, "and does no doubt add to many official documents a special nature of trustworthiness But it should not be regarded as justifying a definite limitation of the scope of the exception for its strict application would exclude many classes of official document which are in fact admitted and ought in reason to be admitted Apart from a few jurisdictions in which by Statute the right is expressly given to every citizen to demand inspection of official documents, there are everywhere numerous official documents of which inspection cannot be demanded except in casual cases of person having a specific interest in the subject matter—for example, the account books of public officers It can hardly be supposed that this bare possibility of inspection can have any

"It has already been seen says Prof Wigmore 'that an essential qualification of a witness is that in general his knowledge or belief should be based on personal observation, and that testimony based on any thing sort of this is receivable only in a few classes of cases in which the source of knowledge is for practical purposes equivalent to personal observation. It has also been noted, that the same principle is applied to persons whose hearsay statements are receivable under the exceptions to the Hearsay rule, and the application of the principle has been noticed from time to time in the foregoing exceptions. How far is the principle to be maintained in the present exception? Must the officer whose statement is admitted have personal knowledge of the thing recorded certified or returned? In general, there can be no doubt that the principle applies here as elsewhere, but the principle itself need not be and is not judicially employed to the extent of impractical strictness, and it has its qualifications and exceptions, based on good sense and practical convenience. Wigmore § 1635. So it is at first sight unsatisfactory to accept an entry as evidence of a fact not occurring within the personal knowledge of the entrant. At the same time there are reconciling considerations. In the first place, there is in the vast majority of instances no controversy at the time and no motive to deceive the official, his record is, on the whole, of sufficient trustworthiness to be at least worth receiving in evidence. In the next place, the secular registers must in any case be founded on the testimony of some one else, and a discrimination between entries founded on the reports of physicians, midwives, undertakers, and ministers and entries founded on the reports of parents and other family members would be out of the question. Finally in strictness, the Registrars do not have personal knowledge of even the most fundamental facts, of which their entries are accepted without cavil: for example, how can a minister always say with personal knowledge that the persons married by him were M and N, or how can a Registrar usually have personal knowledge that the child registered was actually born to S, or was a boy or a girl? If we are to insist with pedantic strictness upon the entrant's personal knowledge it will be found that the registers will cease to be of much practical service for any purpose. On the whole then it is sound policy to receive all registers as evidence of the facts required by law to be recorded. Wigmore § 1646. In India this policy has been adopted both by the Legislature and by the highest tribunal. Idem Act VI of 1886 (Registration of Births, Deaths and Marriages) ss. 19 A, 20 and 21. Lekhraj Kuar v. Mahpal Singh 5 C 741 (751) P C, Sri John Woodroffe in his Evidence Act accepting the test laid by Mr. Plimpton states: 'The principle upon which entries in a register are received depends on the public duty of the person who keeps the book, register or record to make such entries after satisfying himself of their truth. It is not that the writer makes them contemporaneously, or of his own knowledge, for no person in a private capacity can make such entries. Phipps v. Ey 5th Ed 320, Doe v. Andrews, 15 Q B 756, per Earle J., Sturla v. Freccia, 5 App Cas 628-644 per Lord Blackburn, Lyall v. Kennedy 56 L T 647. Woodroffe 366. But if we are to accept that test many entries which have been held admissible under this section would be inadmissible. The test laid down by Prof Wigmore should be followed. The Court is to see whether there was any motive on the part of the individual to deceive the official who is entrusted to make the entry.

Scope of the section. To render a document admissible under section 35 three conditions must be satisfied. First of all the entry that is relied upon must be one in any public or other official book, register or record; secondly it must be an entry stating a fact in issue or a relevant fact; and thirdly it must be made by a public servant in the discharge of his official duty, or any other person in performance of a duty, specially enjoined by the law. Samar Dasadh v. Juggul Ashore, 23 C 366 (368). So this section relates to that class of cases where a public officer has to enter in a register or other book some actual fact, which is known to him, as for instance the fact of a death or a marriage. Saraswati Das v. Dhanpat Singh 9 C 431 = 12 C L R 12. In applying this rule certain simple and generally accepted limitations prevail. There must be an official duty to make the record report or entry in question. This duty may be expressly provided for by Statute or Ordinance, or it may be implied from the nature and functions of the office Greent El § 162(n) Such writings (those which the law requires to be kept for the public benefit) are admissible in evidence on account of their public nature though their authenticity be not confirmed by the usual tests of truth namely the swearing and the cross examination of the persons who prepared them. They are entitled to this extraordinary degree of confidence partly because they are required by law to be kept partly because their contents are of public interest and notoriety, but principally because they are made under the sanction of an oath of office, or at least under that of official duty, by accredited agents appointed for that purpose. Moreover, as the facts stated in them are entries of a public nature it would often be difficult to prove them by means of extrinsic witnesses." Per Wayne J in Games v Pelf, 12 How 472, 570, Wigmore § 1631. So "official registers or books kept by persons in public office, in which they are required to write down particular transactions, or to enrol or record particular contracts or instruments are generally admissible in evidence notwithstanding their authenticity is not confirmed by those usual and ordinary tests of truth—the obligation of an oath and the power of cross examination—persons on whose authority their truth and authenticity may depend. It has been said to be because they are required by law to be kept because the entries in them are of public interest and notoriety, and because they are made under the sanction of an oath of office or in the discharge of an official duty." Per Fowler J in Ferguson v Clifford, 37 N H 85, 95 Wigmore § 1632. Under this section all public or official books, etc., fall, under it also will come consular and notarial certificates log books and any book which railway and other companies are required by law to keep. Nort Ev 200. There are many instances where records are kept by persons occupying public office, or engaged in occupations of a public nature. These records though somewhat similar in kind to those of which the Court may take judicial notice do not usually have a sufficient degree of publicity to bring them within the limits of that class of matters. They are however deemed to have sufficient guarantee of reliability to render them admissible if offered in evidence. Mekhi's El § 206. The exceptional privilege given to public records given by this section cannot be extended to entries which a public officer is not expected to and is not permitted to make. Ali Nasir v Manikchand 25 A 90 (F B)—1902 A W N 207. Madhabrao v Deonal, 21 B 695. Where a document is clearly an official document it is admissible in evidence under section 35 of the Evidence Act. It may be possible that in the case of such a document if it could be shown that any particular part was in excess of the official duty by reason of which it came into existence that part might not be admissible. Bhanya Durgay v Bani M... 22 C W N 439=23 M L T 382=20 Bom L R 712=28 C L I 1=41 Ind Cts 1 (P C).

English Law. Another exception to the hearsay rule consists of statements contained in public or official documents which are admissible as evidence of the truth of the facts recorded even against strangers. Philp Fr 291. Statements and recitals in public matters contained in any public Statute, Proclamation (R v Sutton 4 M & S 533 R v de Berenger, 3 M & S 67), Speech from Throne Address to the Crown from either House of Parliament (R v Franklin, 17 How St Tr 636—639) State paper (Thelluson v Cording 41 E 266) diplomatic correspondence (R v Franklin, 17 How St Tr 638, or Philp Fr 291) United Ins Co v Johns 38, Talbot v Seeman 1 Cranch 137, 3d) or Parliamentary Journal (upon all matters properly before either House of Commons Randall, 1 Cowp 17, Root v King 17 Cowen 613, but not upon extra-parliamentary matters Oates Case, 10 How St Tr 1165—1167) are in general prima facie evidence of the facts recorded (R v Greent 6 A & E 541) Philp Fr 291. Official registers are admissible in proof of the facts recorded when (1) the entry is required by law to be kept for public information or reference and (2) the entry has been made promptly, and by the proper officer. Philp Fr 291. In England a church record of baptism, kept by a clergyman of the Church of England is admissible even before his death, accompanied by the evidence of the identity of the child to prove the date of its baptism but not the date of its birth because the clergyman has no authority to make enquiry about the birth.

Public Book, register or record The public nature of books and documents admitted under this exception must be proved or sufficiently appear as preliminary to their being received in evidence. It is always a question of determination by the Court whether the document shows on its face, or is by outside evidence proved to be of a character which will justify its admission. There is no definite rule which can be laid down on this subject, as every case presents its own circumstance. McHenry's Ex 313 This section contains no definition of 'public book, register or record'. According to section 74 of the Indian Evidence Act, the following documents are public documents—(1) documents forming the acts or records of the acts—(i) of the sovereign authority, (ii) of official bodies and tribunals, and (iii) of public officers, legislature, judicial and executive, whether of British India, or of any other part of her Majesty's dominions, or of a foreign country, (2) public records kept in British India of private documents. "I do not think," says Lord Blackburn in Stirling v Freer 5 App Cas 623, "that 'public' there is to be taken in the sense of meaning the whole world. I think an entry in the books of a minor public in the sense that it concerns all the public interested in the matter. And an entry probably in a corporation book concerning a corporate matter or something in which all the corporation is concerned, would be public within that sense. But it must be a public document and it must be made by a public officer. I understand a public document there to mean a document that is made for the purpose of the public making use of it, and being able to refer to it. It is meant to be where there is a judicial, or quasi-judicial, duty to inquire, as might be said to be the case with the bishop acting under the writ issued by the crown. That may be said to be quasi-judicial. He is acting for the public when that is done, but I think the very object of it must be that it should be for the purpose of being kept public, so that the persons concerned in it may have access to it afterwards." (Vide Frans v Urban District, 1899, 1 Ch 241). In many cases, entries in the parish register, of births, marriages, and deaths, and other entries of that kind, before there were any Statutes relating to them, were admissible, and they were "public" then, because the common law of England making it an express duty to keep the register, made it a public document in the sense kept by a public officer for the purpose of a register and so made it admissible. I think as far as my recollection goes, although I will not pledge myself to its accuracy, and so far as I have ever heard anything cited it will be found that, in every case in which a public document of that sort has been admitted, it has been made originally with the intent that it should be retained and kept, as a register to be referred to, even after. Thayer's Case 432 Rasadbandi or Choukidari papers are not public documents and hence not admissible under section 35. Thakur Singh v Ghanaya, 27 P L R 194=91 Ind Cts 125=A I R 1926 Lah 452. A single document may, in certain cases, be a public record within the meaning of s 35 of the Evidence Act. But it does not follow that every report regarding a particular fact, from a public servant or a superior officer and made in pursuance of orders given by the latter, is admissible evidence to prove such fact. Malikarguna v Secretary of State, 30 V 21=14 Ind Cts 401.

Other official book, register or record It is important to observe that whenever it is the duty of a public official either at common law, or by Statute to record certain facts in any book which is intended "to be kept as a register to be referred to ever after," the book is admissible in evidence to prove not only that such official made those entries, but also that the facts which he recorded in the book are true. And this rule extends to every public document, whether a register or not, which is "made for the purpose of the public making use of it and being able to refer to it." Pouell p 271. An entry made in a Chaukidari register of births and deaths is not admissible in evidence where it neither purports nor is proved to be signed by the station writer, the register not being one directed to be kept by any law. Mohammad v Emperor 22 O C 200=64 Ind Cts 10. The statement of a witness to a Police Officer, under the provision of Cr P Code though reduced into writing, is not a public or official document, and the writing in question cannot be used as evidence in any proceeding to prove that the statements contained therein were, in fact made. Such a document is not a record within the meaning of section 35 of the Indian Evidence Act, and the document in question is not therefore admissible in evidence under the provisions of that section. Isab Mandal v Queen Empress, 28 C 348=5 C W N 65. The certificate of guardianship is no evidence of the age of the minor under this section, for it is neither a book nor a register, nor a record kept by any officer in accordance with law. Satish Chandra v Mohendra Lal, 17 C 949. Teiskhana papers prepared by patuaries under section 16, Reg XII of 1817, are not papers of the description contemplated by section 35 of the Evidence Act. Samar Dasadh v Jaggul Kishore, 23 C 366. It is doubtful whether the provisions of this section can be taken to apply to an entry in a public register or record kept outside British India. Ponnammal v Sundaram Pillai, 23 M 499. A Teiskhana Register (so called from the number of columns in the statement or register) prepared by a person who is called a patuari and submitted to the Collector in accordance with the rules framed by the Board of Revenue under § 16 of Reg XII of 1817, is not an official public document. Bay Nath v Sukhu Makhan, 18 C 534. This section does not apply to ordinary correspondence, though that correspondence might be conducted by officials, for the entries must be in something which is either "a book, register, or record, and they must be made by public servants in the discharge of their official duties". Jiyambha v Vengalaksami, 7 M L T 117=5 Ind Cas 827. The register of Minpardari villages being clearly an official document, in the absence of anything to show that any particular part of it is in excess of the official duty by reason of which it came into existence and that in consequence that part may not be admissible in evidence, is admissible in evidence under this section. Rai Bhayya Dargaj v Deo Bahadur, 22 C W N 439=23 M L T 382=28 C L J 1=47 Ind Cas 1 (P C).

Public Servant. The term "public servant" in this section must be interpreted in the same way as a "public document" in section 74, Cl 1 (iii), namely, as including the servant of a foreign state. Maharaj Bhanudas v Krishnabai, 28 Bom L R 1225=50 B 716=A I R 1937 Bom 11. The term "public servant" has not been defined in this Act. For the definition of the term vide s 21 of the Indian Penal Code and s 2 (17) of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act V of 1908). As regards who are public servants vide 12 B H C R 1, 8 A 201, 7 B L R 448=16 W R 27, 15 M 127, 21 M 428, 6 Bom L R 54, 7 W R 99. Various Acts in British India have declared certain persons to be public servants e.g. Coroners, (by s 5 of Act IV of 1871), Appraiser of Presidency Small Cause Courts (XV of 1892 s 52) Forest Officers etc.

Register or record. A register or record differs from a return or a report in that it comprises in a single volume a series of homogeneous statements recorded by entries made more or less regularly, it differs from a certificate that it is kept in the official custody. A return or report differs from a register in that it is a single document made separately for each transaction as occasion arises (perhaps filed or indexed with others having but a separate existence of its own), this difference arising usually in practice from the circumstances that the statement dealt with something done outside the official precincts and therefore not fitted for entry in a single office volume. The return differs from the certificate in that it is preserved in official custody. A further distinction, within this class between a return proper and a report is that the former deals with something personally done or observed by the officer, while the latter records the result of his investigation as to something that has occurred out of his presence. A certificate differs from a return in that it is not preserved by the official but is given out by him to an applicant for the latter's use. It differs from a register in that it is not a series of entries in a single volume. Iligmore § 1637.

Discharge of his official duty. In order to make an entry admissible under this section, it must be shown that the entry was made by a person in the discharge of his official duty or in the performance of a duty enjoined especially by law. Tarak Chandra v Prasanna Kumar, 28 C W N 679=39 C L J 389=78 Ind. Cas 719=A I R 1924 Cal 634. In delivering his judgment in the above case Mr Justice Mookerjee observed "It does not also appear that the person who made the entry did so in the performance of a duty specially enjoined by the law. The paper therefore in my opinion does not come under section 35 of the Evidence Act at all. The section is based upon the circumstance that in the case of official documents entries are made in the discharge of public duty by an officer who is the authorised and accredited agent appointed for the purpose. The law reposes such a confidence in public officers that it presumes they will discharge their several trusts with accuracy and fidelity. The circumstances relating to this entry do not stand these tests. It is likely that the books were kept for the information of the Collector but that does not make them binding as official records of the facts contained therein."

Any other person in performance of a duty, etc. An entry in a Chaudar's register of births and deaths was relied upon as proof of the date of the birth of a person. The entry was admittedly not made by the Chaudar and there was no evidence that it was made by any other public servant or that it was the duty of any public servant to make it. Held, that the register was not admissible under s 35 of the Evidence Act. anipal v Gauri Sankar 190 C 68,

Wajib ul arz. An entry in the wajib-ul-arz is admissible in proof of the custom under s 35 and its validity does not depend upon the question whether the wajib ul arz has been verified by the proprietors of the village or not. Mehdi Hasan v Abdul Wahid, 101 Ind Cas 820=1 Luck C 73. A wajib ul-arz is a village administration paper prepared by a village official in which are recorded the statements of persons possessing interests in the village relating to ex tunc rights and customs. As such they are of considerable value in the determination of such rights and customs. But statements which merely narrate the tradition and purport to give the history of the devolution in certain families are not even of the narrators stand in no better position than any other tradition. When the incidents in question stated in the wajib ul arz are incidents not within the memory of men living at the time that they are prepared the entries in the wajib ul-arz cannot be considered of accuracy as to tradition and it would not be safe to accept the statements in the wajib ul-arz. Madari Singh v Aarun Ali 4 O W N 1029=105 Ind Cas 24. The entries in wajib ul arz may be taken to have been made after due enquiry by the Settlement Officer, unless the contrary is shown by the party alleging it. Manya v Sitaram, 23 N L R 16=100 Ind Cas 438=A I R 1927 Nag 147. Wasiq Ali v Athar Ali 110 Ind Cas 4=A L R 1928 Oudh 409. Sartaz Koer v Mahalco Bux 29 O C 133=99 Ind Cas 637=A I R 1926 Oudh 332. Subha Singh v Rustam Singh, 3 O W N (Supp) 240. It is not necessary that the existence of a custom recorded in a wajib ul-arz or Ruway-i-am should be supported by instance. Bayri Nath v Bahadur 3 O W N 872=12 O L J 571. An entry in a wajib ul arz is prima facie evidence of the existence of a custom unless there is anything in the wajib-ul arz itself which negatives the idea of such an existence or there is other evidence to the contrary or if such custom is unreasonable or unenforceable, the presumption would be that such a custom exists. Gayan Si v Babu Lal 21 A L J 822=L R 4 A 557. Sher Muhammad v Purbi Lal, 91 A L J 801. Sher Mahammad v Dost Muhammad 78 Ind Cas 431. Lal Chandra v Ram Chand, 46 A 674=82 Ind Cas 526=1924 All 753. Where the wajib ul-arz consisted in an entry of nadarad in the column provided for the right of pre-emption, held that, if the meaning of the word nadarad, was merely meaning no entry, such an entry, though in a public document was not admissible under section 35 of the Evidence Act to prove that no custom existed or that the custom has ceased to exist because no entry as to the custom had been made. Ali Nasar v Mamik Chand 25 A W N 1902 207.

Declarations as those of Kanungo entries made in the village records (Wajib-ul-arzes) by the officer charged by the government with that duty are answers to official inquiries made under government directions as to the state of succession prevailing in particular families are prima facie evidence as purporting to be made by the proper officer in the performance of a

Recitals in judgments A recital in judgment not inter partes of a relevant fact is not admissible in evidence under section 35 of the Evidence Act Triputra Seethapathi v. Rolfam, 45 M 332=42 M L J 324=30 M L T 160=66 Ind Cas 280 (F B) In delivering the judgment of the Full Bench Kumara swami Sastri J said "The contention of Mr. K P M. Menon for the appellant is that a judgment is a public record within the meaning of section 74 of the Evidence Act, that a Judge is a public servant and when he writes a judgment, he makes a public record, and that a statement in the judgment is, therefore, an entry made by a public servant in a public record, which, if it relates to a relevant fact, would be evidence under section 35 irrespective of whether the judgment in which the statement occurs, is or is not between the same parties. In support of his argument he refers to the decisions in Parbutty Dass v. Purno Chunder, 9 C 596, Byathamma v. Arullo, 15 M 9 Thana v. Kondan, 15 M 378 and Krishnaswami v. Rayagopala 18 M 73=4 M L J 212 For the respondents it is contended that the relevancy of judgments is governed by sections 40 to 43 of the Evidence Act and that a judgment not inter partes is not evidence.

It would be straining the language of section 35 to hold that a Judge when he writes a judgment is making entries in a public or official book, register or record and that every statement made in a judgment is an entry in such book, register or record. If section 35 is applicable to judgment and if the contention of Mr. Menon, is accepted the result will be that every judgment would be admissible to prove a relevant fact if it contains any statement as to a fact in issue or relevant fact, even though the judgment may be between persons who are total strangers to the litigation in which it is sought to be filed in evidence. I find it difficult to hold that the Legislature which in sections 40 to 44 has carefully defined the limits within which judgments are admissible in evidence, would have in a previous section practically nullified the provisions as to the relevancy of the judgments by including judgments in the category of public or other official books, registers or records. Then after dissenting from the judgment of Prinsep and O'Kinelly JJ in Parbutty Dass v. Purno Chunder Singh supra and explaining Lekhraj Kuar v. Mahpal Singh 5 C 744=6 C L R 593 the learned Judge continued "The correctness of this decision (i.e. Parbutty Dass v. Purno Chunder Singh,) was doubted in *Sundar Das v. S 35. be borne in mind that "although a judgment not inter partes may be used in evidence in certain circumstances as a fact in issue or as a relevant fact or possibly as a transaction, the recitals in the judgment cannot be used as evidence in a litigation between the parties" Per Mookerjee J in Kashi Nath v Jagat Kishore, 35 Ind Cas 298=20 C W N 643=23 C L J 583 (J-5) Ramprohash v Anand, 33 Ind Cas 583=43 C 707=20 C W N 802=14 A L J 621=18 Bom L R 490=24 C L J 116 On a consideration of the authorities and the provisions of the Evidence Act it is clear that section 30 would not render a judgment not inter partes evidence But judgment inter partes is admissible in evidence under section 35 of the Evidence Act as they form a record of facts in issue made by a public servant in the discharge of his official duty Gopal Rao v Sita Ram, 97 Ind Cas 694=9 N L J 215

Principle This section deals with two kinds of maps namely (1) maps or charts generally offered for public sale, and (2) maps or plans made under the authority of Government 'Public maps, generally offered for public sale have been admitted to show matters of general geographical notoriety such as the relative situation of towns and countries' Halsbury Vol. XIII para 657 'The admissibility of the first kind depends on grounds similar to those on which a Judge may refer to a dictionary for the meaning of a word or to historical work for information of matters of public history The publication being accessible to the whole community and open to the criticism of all, the probabilities are in favour of any inaccuracy being challenged and exposed Field Et 143 (7th Ed) The person or persons who prepared the map in question, being unavailable both the principle of Necessity and the principle of the Guarantee of Trustworthiness are satisfied Hence there is no objection to admit this exception to the Hearsay Rule As regards the second class of maps, the

S 36 Necessity principle as well as the principle of the Guarantee of Trustworthiness are satisfied in the same way as in section 35. The admissibility in this case depends upon the authority, hence on the one hand, the returns of the Government surveyor are admissible to evidence only those matters which he is authorized to do, and on the other hand a private person's survey, if made under special warrant or if otherwise sanctioned by proper authority, may become admissible. Higmore § 1665, Elaus v Mirthur Fydfil, (1899) 1 Ch 241 (20).

Scope of the section As regards maps or charts offered for public use this section refers to the physical features of the country, etc., and as regards maps or plans made under the authority of Government, the section refers not only to such features but also boundaries of villages, estates, and (in later maps) fields. Whitely Stoke's Anglo Indian Codes, Vol II p 878. See also R v Orton, Step Dig Art 35 where a map of Australia was received to show the situation of places where the defendant was alleged to have lived. For the case in various stages see Reg v Castro, Orton, L R 9 Q B 330, 17 Cox C C 454, 5 Q B D 406 14 Cox C C 436, 6 App Cas 229, 14 Cox C C 546. Under the rule excluding declarations as to private boundaries and maps are not admissible in England to prove boundaries of that character. Re v Lakin, 7 Cr & P 481, Bridgman v Jennings, 1 Ld Ryms 234. Wright v Hearfield, L R 5 Ch D 709. This section does not require that the authority under which a map is prepared, must be an authority given by statute. Gajhoo Damor v Jagat Pal, 11 C W N 230=9 C L J 415.

Survey maps No general rule can be laid down as to the weight to be assigned to a survey map as a piece of evidence. It is good evidence of position according to the boundary demarcated thereon and may be taken to have been admitted by those concerned and in each case it must be decided upon the circumstances if it raises a reasonable presumption of title. Revenue Survey maps are not conclusive and may be shown to be wrong. Rammandan v J. Gobind 2 Pat 839. Thal and survey maps are not conclusive as to whether a which formed part of the bed of the river were included in the permanent settlement of 1793. It is not permissible for a Court to act on the assumption that in 1793 the state of things existed different from what appeared from any evidence before the Court. Secretary of State for India v Upendra Narain, 71 Ind Cas 849=A I R 1923 Cal 247=36 C L J 336. Maps and surveys made for revenue purposes are official documents prepared by competent persons with due publicity and after notice to parties interested. They are admissible as valuable evidence of the state of things at the time they were made. They are not conclusive but in the absence of evidence to the contrary are of much weight. Kali Prosanna v Hemanta, A I R 1924 Cal 977.

As a rule ex parte statements in survey maps should be created on the same basis as books of account and regarded not as a primary proof, but merely as corroboration of other direct evidence. But where such documents relate to distant times and no direct evidence of the matter mentioned here is any longer available their value assumes greater proportions, and if they indicate a series of affairs which may be presumed as not unlikely to have happened they may be taken into account and relied upon with more certainty. But no hard and fast rule can be laid down as to the value to be attached to documents of this nature of an ancient date. Kumar Kamalhya v Surendra, A I R 1925 Pat 281. But C C Ghose, J said. It is perfectly true that a survey map may be direct evidence of possession at a particular time, namely the time at which the survey was made. In each case the Court has got to decide whether the evidence of possession is sufficient to raise a reasonable presumption of title. A survey map is an official document prepared by competent persons with due publicity and notice to persons interested as to be admissible and valuable evidence of the state of things at the time they were made. Thakur v Surendra, 31 C W N 419=102 Ind Cas 370=45 C L J 474=A I R 1925 Cal 347. See also Musht Bibi v Deo Nandan, 5 Pat. L J 691=2 Ld. L T 759 Ind Cas 293.

Where the parties consent to be bound to regard the boundary lines as laid by the survey authorities as conclusive they cannot afterwards produce evidence to the contrary.

correctness of the same Babu Raghunath v. Sri Rameshwar Singh 1922 (P 87). Kistuari maps (survey maps) are under section 36 of the Evidence Act, evidence between the parties quantum valet. They are primarily evidence of possession but evidence of possession is always evidence of title Chaudhury Nazirul v. Abdul, 3 Pat L T 140=64 Ind Cas 326. There is prima facie presumption in favour of the accuracy of thal and survey maps and it is for the party who impugns their accuracy to prove his case. Such a map may be shown to be incorrect by the admission of the parties or adjudication by a Court or by evidence intrinsic or extrinsic to the map in question Taramoni v. Gopal, 65 Ind Cas 182. There is no general inflexible rule of law that the facts stated on the thal or survey map must be presumed to have been in existence at the time of the permanent settlement. The question is essentially one of fact and must be determined on the facts and circumstances of each case Profulla Nath v. Secretary of State, 21 C W N 630=31 C L J 320=57 Ind Cas 29. Maps and surveys made in India for revenue purposes are official documents prepared by competent persons and with such publicity and notice to persons interested as to be admissible and valuable evidence of the state of things at the time they are made. They are not conclusive and may be shown to be wrong, but in the absence of evidence to the contrary they may be properly and judicially received in evidence as correct when made Jagadindia v. Secretary of State, 7 C W N 193=30 I A 44=30 C 291 P C=5 Bom L R 1. As they are not conclusive, they may be shown to be wrong but in the absence of evidence to the contrary they may be properly and judicially received in evidence as correct when made Mirza v. Munshi, 12 C W N 273=3 M L J 212. The thal and survey maps are valuable evidence of the state of things at the time they are made, but it does not follow that they show conclusively what was the state of things at the time of the permanent settlement Ananda Hari v. Secretary of State, 3 C L J 316, Mirza Shamsher v. Kunj Behari, 7 C L J 414. Unless it can be proved that the person against whom a thal or survey map is attempted to be used expressly consented to the delineation or admitted the correctness of such maps, they have no binding effect Kristomoni v. Secretary of State, 3 C W N 99. A survey map as well as a thal map is admissible as evidence Jugdish v. Choudhry, 24 W R 317, Sashee Mookhee v. Bisessuree, 10 W R 343, Koomodini v. Pooouo, 10 W R 301. Survey maps are not evidence of title in a dispute regarding a right of fishery Broma v. Lalit Narain, W R 1864 120. A survey map is not sufficient in the absence of other satisfactory proof of title or of long antecedent possession to establish a plaintiff's right to the land and to disturb the defendant's present possession Collector of Rajshahi v. Doorga Soundery 2 W R 210. But a survey map and proceedings may in certain cases form evidence sufficient to prove title Gommut Fatima v. Bhup, 13 W R 50, Nabo Coomar v. Gobind, 9 C L R 303, Syam Lal v. Luchmun, 15 C 353, Mon Mohun Watson & Co, 27 C 336 P C=27 I A 44=4 C W N 113. A survey map sought to be set aside may be used for the purpose of testing the correctness of an Amin's report Padoo Manee v. Bisseshur, 5 W R 34. If there has been a Government survey the survey map must be taken as evidence Radha Choudhuran v. Girdharee, 20 W R 243. See also Proanna v. Land Mortgage, 25 W R 453, Guddadthur v. Tara Chand, 15 W R 3, Burm v. Achumbul, 20 W R 14, Radha Chuan v. Amund Sem, 15 W R 444, Mohesh v. Juggut, 5 C 212. The fact of a later Government survey map having been prepared does not affect the presumption of accuracy, under the Evidence Act, of an earlier surveyed map Jaggessur v. Becant, 5 C 822=6 C L R 519. A survey map is a piece of evidence like other evidence in a case and can be of no effect in determining the burden of proof Narain Singh v. Nurendro, 22 W R 296. See also Tarun v. Fakrannisa, 15 Ind Cas 459.

Thakbust map There are three kinds of thal maps in existence (a) eye sketches in which no actual measurements were made (b) maps in which rough magnetic bearings were used and rough linear measurements made and (c) maps made from careful magnetic bearings and careful linear measurements Sashi Bhusan Banerjee v. Ramjas Agarwala, 3 Pat 85=A. I R, 1924 Pat 402. The thal authorities had nothing to do with title or possession and no deduction as to title or possession can legitimately be drawn from thal map Debendra Lal

S. 36. v Secretary of State, 31 C W, N 473=103 Ind Cas 13=46 C L J 391-41 I R 1927 Cal 403, Jagadima v Secretary of State, 30 I A 41 (53)=30 C 291=7 C W N 193, Satcourie v Secretary of State 22 C 552 (201) It is evidence of possession at the time the survey was made Satkon v Secretary of State, supra, Pogose v Mukund 22 W R 36, Charu v Zebida, 20 W R 54 But such maps are not intended to represent and are, in no sense, a record of tenure subordinate to Government revenue-paying estates Mohima v Wise 27 W R 277 Thak maps are good evidence of possession, but the value of the evidence varies enormously. In the case of a thak map containing definite landmarks and in disputed boundaries signed by the parties or their accredited agents and representing land which has been brought under cultivation and is in possession of ryots whose names are known or can be discovered from the zemindari papers it is very valuable evidence of possession. But the value of such a map is greatly diminished when we find that there are no natural landmarks delineated thereupon, that the land was jungle when measured, that boundaries are not discoverable from a mere inspection of the map, and that neither the zemindars nor their agents have by their signatures, admitted the correctness of the thak. Joylara v Mohamed Mubarak, 8 C 975=11 C L R 399 Although the thakbust map is a part of the thak survey, it is not meant to be and is not in fact a scientifically prepared plan but merely a rough sketch, or at most an unscientifically prepared plan showing the number and approximate position of the thak marks or dhuis for the guidance of the revenue surveyor who followed it and who, having picked up and verified the thak marks indicated roughly in the thakbust map, prepared the revenue map by accurate observations made by expert surveyors with scientific instruments. Keshabjee v Sashi bhawan 9 Ind Cas 1027=A I R 1926 P 385 As the object of a thakbust survey and map is to ascertain and delineate the boundaries of the estates borne on the Revenue Map of the District the entry in a thak map that certain lands formed part of an estate become a relevant fact under this section, and such entries are evidence on which a Court may act. Abdul Hamid v Kiran Chandra 7 C W N 849

Entries in a thakbust map are not sufficient to enable a Court of fact to hold that disputed lands were really included in an estate at the time of the Permanent Settlement. They may be good evidence as to what the boundaries of a particular plot was at the time of the Permanent Settlement. Ramchandra v Joygovind, 2 Pat 849 It cannot be presumed as a matter of law that the state of things described in the thak and survey maps existed at the time of the Permanent Settlement. Secretary of State v Wazed, 34 C L J 141 A thakbust khasra prepared by the Amin in connection with the measurement preliminary to the survey of a village is a rough register, statements entered in it have no evidentiary value unless it is proved that the persons adversely affected thereby had notice of it and opportunity to controvert it but knowingly acquiesced in the statement before the Amin. Jagdeo Narain v Baldeo Singh, 3 Pat 1 F 605=36 C L J 499=49 I A 399 (P C) An entry in a thak map that it was prepared in the presence of the representatives of certain parties is a fact in evidence. Budhumukhi v Jitendra, 10 C L R 527 So that map is admissible in evidence under this section. Raghunath v Balanta, 7 C W N 612 Mukhi v Bisessurer 10 W R 342 But entries in it are not conclusive evidence. Gokul v Hara Sundari 9 C W N 383, Kalidasa v Nithianand, 12 W R 4 A thak map prepared in 1859 was held to be good evidence of the boundaries of the parties in dispute were at the time of the Permanent Settlement and also as to what they admittedly were in 1859. Syama Sundari v bandhu Soolar, 16 C 136 As regards the value of thakbust maps as evidence of the right of parties in a tidal river, cule Satcour Ghosh v Secretary of State 22 C 552

In case of dispute between Thak and Revenue Survey maps if a revenue survey map which was carefully and accurately prepared by competent officers and the thakbust map do not agree it is quite impossible to rely on the thakbust map unless indeed the demarcation pillars, put down on the ground by the thakbust authorities are still in existence and they correspond to the boundary pillars as shown in the map or the field book and the entries collected by the thakbust authorities furnish sufficient data. The presence survey map prevails over the thalbust map. The signature of the revenue surveyor on the thal map does not mean that if the thal map is reduced to the same scale as the revenue survey map, then the two boundaries will necessarily agree but merely that the surveyor has satisfied himself that the boundary accepted and intended by the demarcation staff has been correctly picked up on the ground, and correctly surveyed on the revenue map. Shashi Bhushan v Ramyas 3 Pat 85=A I R 1924 Pat 402 Keshabji v Sashibhusan 96 Ind Cas 1027=A I R 1926 P 385, but see Maharajah of Cooch Behar v Rajah Mahendrasa Rayan, 4 C L J 465 where it is held that there is no inflexible rule that a survey map must have the preference over a thal map. There is no general or definite rule making it incumbent upon the Courts to follow either the one or the other, the Court may if it considers that the thal map is more reliable, follow that in preference to the survey map. Where the thal proceedings and the decision of dispute took place in the presence of the predecessors of the parties to the suit, the thal map is a valuable evidence in a suit between the successors of the persons who were present. As a general rule the thal and the survey maps should agree, where they differ, the one that more clearly agrees with the local landmarks is the one which should be followed. There is no general or definite rule making it incumbent upon the Court to follow either the one or the other, the Court may, if it considers the thal map more reliable follow that in preference to the survey map. Abid Hossein v Doucurry Pal 6 C W N 629.

Topographical survey map When the question was in which of the two adjoining villages—the boundary line between which admittedly corresponded with the boundary line between two perganahs—the land in dispute was included, held that a Topographical survey map of 1869, in which the boundary line between the two perganahs was given, was admissible in evidence under section 36 of the Evidence Act. When pergannah boundaries are found entered in such map, the presumption is that they were so entered in pursuance of instructions received. Assuming that topographical survey maps were not prepared for revenue purposes they are official documents prepared by competent persons, and with such publicity and notice to persons interested as to be admissible and valuable evidence of the state of things at the time they were made. They are not conclusive and may be shown to be wrong but in the absence of anything to the contrary, they may be properly judicially received in evidence as correct when made. In cases of boundary disputes the fact that no satisfactory evidence as to possession is obtainable does not relieve the Court of the duty of settling the boundary line on the evidence before it. Held on second appeal that, in the absence of better evidence, the lower Appellate Court erred in law in not accepting a Topographical survey map as evidence of possession at the time the map was made. Gajhoo Damor v Koticar Jagatpal, 11 C W N 230=9 C L J 415.

Other maps Where a certain map was referred to in the report of the Commissioner but the map was not produced their Lordships of the Privy Council received the report of the Commissioner as admissible in as much as no objection was taken to the report and the Commissioner himself was neither examined nor cross-examined. Naresh Narayan v Secretary of State for India, 45 M L J 444=50 C 446=50 I A 121=(1923) M W N 511. The map in respect of area which is the original record is the settlement map and the entry in the Khasra is no more than a copy in a different notation and therefore the Khasra is no more reliable than the map, nor is it an independent piece of evidence. Laharam v Gurmukh Rao, 99 Ind Cas 628=A I R 1927 Nag 204. Maps prepared under the Calcutta Survey Act have great evidentiary value as regards question of title. Deendra v Surendra, 31 C W N 419=102 Ind Cas 370=45 C L J 474=A I R 1927 Cal 315. A site-plan prepared for the purposes of a case can have a very little probative value on the question of title. Entries in such documents in support of title of a Municipal Board are no more than admissions in favour of the Board and are not relevant. Gauri Shankar v Emperor A I R 1930 All 26.

37 When the Court has to form an opinion as to the existence of any fact of a public nature, any statement of it, made in a recital contained in any Act of Parliament, or in any Act of the Governor General of India in Council, or of "any other legislative authority in British India constituted for the time being under the Indian Councils Act, 1861 the Indian Councils Acts, 1861 and 1892, or the Indian Councils Acts, 1861 to 1909,"* or in a notification of the Government appearing in the Gazette of India, or in the Gazette of any Local Government, or in any printed paper purporting to be the London Gazette or the Government Gazette of any colony or possession of the Queen, is a relevant fact†

Legislative recitals—Principle It is clear, in the first place that the statements concern matters not within the personal knowledge of the declarant; the recital deals not with the legislative proceedings but with extrinsic facts. It follows then, under the general principle (vide notes under section 34, under the heading personal knowledge of the official making the entry), that, unless there is an official duty to investigate and obtain adequate information, the statement should not be received. The publicity and solemnity of the declaration—an argument sometimes advanced (vide R v Sultan & M & S 532, 549)—cannot otherwise suffice to give it any weight as evidence in controversy. But, next, it is clear enough that the Legislature has within itself the authority to inform itself properly for if it can give such authority to others it can assume the authority for itself. Accordingly when the recital is not a mere allegation but a statement of the result of due investigation, it should be receivable, and it was in fact the distinction applied to the use of recitals of pedigree in F & P Peerage Acts and the like Wigmore § 1662 In Wharton Peerage Case 12 Cl & F, 295 302 Lyndhurst L C admitted the recitals of family relations saying "It is a well settled practice of this House not to allow the insertion of a statement in the recitals of a private Act of Parliament, unless it is of that statement has been previously proved to the satisfaction of the House to whom the bill has been referred. But in Shrewsbury Peerage Case 7 H L C 1 13 Lord St Leonards referring the above observation of Lyndhurst L C said "That used to be the practice but it is not so now and recitals will not therefore be evidence. D 411 (432) where Brett and Cotton L J expressed doubts as regards such recitals "But statutory recital" says Prof Wigmore "have not ordinarily such a basis. They may represent merely the partisan prejudgments of the majority, they may represent only general conclusions in which the recited particulars have not been varified with special attention, they may have been inserted without any investigation at all, and they are in general only a statement of motives—an apology for the passage of the act rather than a deliberate binding fact. Wigmore § 1662 These observations have been demonstrated in India and as such the admissibility of recitals in the Statutes of Parliament and in the Indian Acts should depend upon the nature of the recital and the circumstances under which the Statute or the Act has been passed. "For to assume that the recital in every act of Parliament is even prima facie evidence of the facts recited in it, would lead to very extensive consequences, and might sometimes perhaps bring the truth into hazard. Ide Argument of Denman and Phillips in R v Sutton 4 M & S 532, 539 These considerations indicate it as the wiser course to reject ordinarily such recitals as evidence should it appear that the recitals offered in a given case are not merely allegations resting on an unknown basis, but are in fact the findings of the Legislature after proper means of information have been deliberately sought there seems good ground for their admission as official statements made with due authority and upon adequate sources of knowledge. Wigmore § 1662 The reason for the reception of this kind of evidence is thus stated by Baley J in R v Sutton 4 M & S 532 (549) When we consider in what manner an act of Parliament is passed and that it is a public proceeding in all its stages and challenges public enquiry, and when passed is in the contemplation of law the act of the whole body, it seems to me that its recital must be taken as admissible." But the reason set forth by the learned Judge is not sufficient to meet the objection raised by Prof Wigmore neither it guarantees trustworthiness in the contingencies contemplated by Prof Wigmore "The appropriate functions of the Legislature are to make laws to operate on future incidents, and not the decision of or forestalling rights accrued or vested under previous laws. Hence such a preamble as the present ought in such a controversy to be taken to answer the purpose for which it was intended, that is an apology for the passage of the act and the reason why the Legislature so acted. Such a preamble is evidence that the facts were so represented to the Legislature and not that they are really so. Elmhurst v Carmichael 3 Litt 472, 480 So the better opinion seems to be that "the Legislature has no jurisdiction to determine facts touching the rights of individuals." Parmalee v Thompson, 7 Hill N Y 77 (80)

Recital contained in any Act of Parliament, etc. "The rehearsal or preamble of a statute is to be taken for truth, for it cannot be thought that a statute that is made by authority of the whole realm, as well of the King as of the lords spirituall and temporall and of all the commons, will recede a thing against the truth. Coke upon Littleton 19b So a recital in a Public Act was held admissible. Leister v Haydon, 1 Plowd 384, 396, 393 R v Sutton 4 M & S 542 But in England recital in a Private Act was no longer binding. Griffin Peerage Case Le Merchant's Rep 27 G, Beaks v Bell M & M L 122 But this distinction is apparently not only without principle to say the least, also ill-adapted to indicate the true grounds of trustworthiness. Wigmore § 1662 So according to English law where certain public Statutes recited the great outrages had been committed in a certain part of the country, and a proclamation was issued, with similar recitals, and officers were appointed for the discovery and conviction of the perpetrators those were held admissible as sufficient evidence of the existence of those outrages, to support the Statute in that effect. R v Sutton 4 M & S 532 So also a recital of a fact in the preamble of a Statute is good evidence of the fact, and it is taken not as a mere statement of fact, but as a statement of fact, and this whether the fact is stated in the preamble or in the body of the Statute. Berenger, 3 M & S 67 69 Berenger v Glyn & Bishop 6, Statute 831 Similarly legislative recitals in the preamble of the Statute, when they relate to the House are the proper evidence of the facts of the House.

S 37 before it Jones v Randall Cowp 17, Root v King, 7 Cowen 613, 4 G v Bradlaugh, 14 Q B D 667 Greenl Ev § 491 This section makes no distinction between Public and Private Acts and recitals contained in a Private Statute is as much relevant as the same while contained in a Public Statute. But in England recitals in Private Statutes may be evidence of the matters recited as between the persons in whose behalf they are enacted Pur Jones § 501 They are not however evidence against the strangers to the act Elmon doff v Carmichael, 3 Litt (K) 472—11 Am Dec 86 This rule is applicable even where the Act, though private in its nature contains a clause declaring it to be Public act Brett v Beale, 1 Moody & M 416 Section 9 of the repealed Act II of 1855 ran as follows: "Any recital contained in any Act of the Governor General of India in Council, constituted for the purpose of making Laws and Regulations hereinafter to be passed, of any fact of a public nature shall be deemed, before all such Courts and persons, to be prima facie evidence of the truth of the fact recited" This has been incorporated in this section.

Whether such recitals are conclusive A recital of fact in a Statute though it may in some conditions be admissible as an official statement, is not conclusive testimony. The recitals of the Legislatures are commonly intended merely as explanations of motives and purposes and not as determinations of controverted fact. They could not, without gross injustice be made evidentially conclusive and this is generally conceded Wigmore § 1352, see also Harrell v Wise, 9 B & C 712 R v Green 6 A & E 518 So a legislative declaration of fact that are material only as the ground for enacting a rule of law—for instance that the use is a public one—may not be held conclusively by the Court, but a declaration by a Legislature concerning public conditions that by necessity and duty it must know is entitled at least to great respect Block v Heigh 93 U S 135—41 Sup 458 As a contract or an estoppel, or otherwise, the recital may be binding, but that would not be due to any rule of evidence Wigmore § 1352 This is only prima facie evidence Vide s IX of Act II of 1850

Executive proclamations Executive proclamations are difficult to classify, they are precisely neither register nor returns nor certificates. So far as recitals of fact therein are german to the doing of the executive act itself they are on principle admissible. The executive cannot be supposed to need express authority because he has no superior. And, in general the office of the executive should suffice to make admissible any recital of fact announced or recorded by him in the line of duty Wigmore § 1663 So the diplomatic correspondence communicated by the President to Congress is sufficient evidence of the acts of foreign governments and functionaries therein recited Radcliffe v United Ins Co 7 Johns 38 51 A foreign declaration of war is sufficient proof of the day when the state of war commenced Thelluson v Costing 4 Esp 266 Bradley v Arthur, 4 B & C 292, 304 Recitals in state papers are also admissible Thelluson v Costing 4 Esp 266, R v Franklin 1, How 31 Tr 638, Radcliffe v Union Insurance Co 7 Johns 38, Talbot v Seem in 1 Cranch 1, 37, 38 The Governor General's proclamation is evidence that the necessary preliminary proceedings to the coming into force of a law were duly made Stone v Nash, 2 P E 1 415 (Canada)

Government Gazette The Government Gazette is admissible and sufficient evidence of such acts of the executive or of the Government, as are usually announced to the public through that channel, such as proclamations and the like R v Holt, 5 T R 436, 443 Att Gen v Theatstone, 8 Price 89 For besides the motives of self interest and official duty which bind the public to accuracy, it is to be remembered that intentionally to publish anything emanating from public authority, with knowledge that it did not so emanate would be misdemeanour 2 Phil Ev 109 But in regard to other acts of public functionaries having no relation to the affairs of government, the Gazette is not admissible evidence R v Holt 5 T R 443 Greenl Ev § 492 Section 8 of the Repeated Act II of 1855 was enacted as follows: "All proclamations or Acts of State whether Legislative or Executive, nominations appointments or other official communications of the Government appearing in any such Gazette may be proved by the production of such Gazette, and shall be prima facie proof of any fact of a public nature which they were intended to notify. So under that section the Calcutta Gazette and Gazette of India were admitted in evidence. Queen v Amiruddin, 7 B L R 63=15 W R 25 (27). The Indian Evidence Act embodies the provisions of the English law rendering the Government Gazette provable by mere production. It constitutes the appearance in any such Gazette of Proclamations, Acts of state, Nominations, Appointments, and other official communications, proof of the fact itself. It renders recitals in Acts of Legislation prima facie evidence of the fact recited,—and the publication in the Gazette of certain defined public advertisements of a Government or Judicial nature proof of the publication under due authority. Goodere Et 307. The Government Gazette is also evidence of various Acts of state at common law. R v Holt, 51 R 436, 4 G v Pheakstone 8 Price, 89, Taylor § 1662, Phy Et 4th Ed 711. The appointment of an officer may be proved by the government Gazette. R v Gardner, 2 Camp 513. see also Greenwood v Woodham, 2 Mod & R 363 where the Government Gazette was admitted to prove the division of a parish. The Government Gazette containing the advertisement of sale, and a printed paper purporting to be the conditions of sale alluded to in the Gazette and issued from the Master's Office in the name of the Master, were admitted in evidence to prove the actual conditions of the deeds of sale. Jatundia v Brayo W R (1864) 50. The inference of knowledge of a fact is not conclusive even where such knowledge is presumed from the publication of a fact in the Government Gazette. Harriet v Wise 9 B & C 712.

Gazette of India. Previous to 1863, the Government of India had no exclusive organ of its own, its notifications, orders, etc., being published in any of the Local Gazettes of the Local Governments as was necessary. In that year the Gazette of India was first published as the Gazette of the Government of India exclusively, and Act XXXI of 1863 was passed to give to publication in the Gazette of India the same effect as publication in any other Gazette in which publication was prescribed by the law then in force. Rule 1 of Act XXXI of 1863. Field's Li 7th Ed 152.

Proof of gazette. The intolerable inconvenience of having to prove the genuineness of printed matter purporting to be published by the Government has led to a general concession by judicial decision or by Statute (vide s 84 infra), that such purporting publication, at least when in the form of a standard official document constantly used and referred to are to be assumed genuine. Two principles however are in fact usually involved first, the admissibility of a copy, proved to be printed by official authority, as hearsay evidence of the contents of the original, and secondly the presumption of genuineness of a particular printed document purporting to be of such official origin. The two questions are seldom separated either in decisions or in Statutes. A sanction of the former, principle has usually been regarded as carrying with it a sanction of the latter also. Wigmore § 2151. In R v Forsyth R & R 274, to prove the publication of a notice in the Gazette a printed paper purporting to be the Gazette was put in and no evidence of its authenticity was offered. The Judges seemed to think that the production of the Gazette would be sufficient, without proof of its being bought of the Gazette printer, or where it came from. Wigmore § 2151. Section 81 of the Indian Evidence Act enacts: 'The Court shall presume the genuineness of every document purporting to be the London Gazette or the Gazette of India or the Government Gazette of any local Government, or of any colony, dependency or possession of the British Crown or to be a newspaper or journal or to be a copy of a private Act of Parliament printed by Queen's Printer, and of every document purporting to be a document directed by any law to be kept by any person, if such document is kept substantially in the form required by law and is produced from proper custody.'

Fact of a Public Nature. The fact as to the existence of which the Court has to form an opinion must be a fact of a public nature. Field Ev 7th Ed 152. But the word public is unambiguous. It may signify 'open to all' 'capable of being known or observed by all' or it may signify 'having an interest for persons in general' or it may signify 'made or done by an officer of the Government'. Wigmore § 1630. This Act does not define what are

S 38 facts of a public nature as distinguished from facts of a private nature. But it seems that a fact is an fact of a public nature, when it is open to all; capable of being known or observed by all and in which persons in general have an interest as well as which is done by an officer of the Government, executive, legislative or judicial.

38 When the Court has to form an opinion as to a law of any country, any statement of such law contained in a book purporting to be printed or published under the authority of the Government of such country and to contain such law, and any report of a ruling of the Courts of such country contained in a book purporting to be a report of such ruling, is relevant.

Principle There is no reason why an officer may not be authorized to give printed copies as well as to give written copies, nor has there been any doubt that such authorized copies are admissible. Yet it cannot be said that such an authority has ever been implied from the nature of an office. An official printer's copies have been usually regarded as admissible, but the official printer's authority, though a general one is express rather than implied. The objections that have been made in connection with the use of printed copies have chiefly had their source not so much in a doubt of any of these principles, as in the difficulty of presuming the authenticity of a printed copy purporting to be an official one. The doctrine of presuming the genuineness of an official seal has served to furnish a mode of authenticating certified copies, but there has naturally been a hesitation about extending this doctrine to impressions of type purporting to represent an official seal or certificate. Thus it is with the authentication of the copy rather than the authority to furnish it that the difficulty has arisen. Wigmore § 1684. Not that the printed Statutes are perfect and authentic copies of records themselves, but every person is supposed to know the law and therefore the printed Statutes are allowed to be evidence because they are the hints of what is supposed to be lodged in every man's mind already. Bullen J. Trials at Ass. Pines, 225. The reason of their reception is thus stated by Duncan J. in Jones v. Maffet 5 S. & R. 532. Such authorized authentic publication would be more satisfactory evidence than a sworn copy, for a dinner of mistake or corruption or falsification. It is not the being in a Statute book which gives them authenticity, but by the publication by the King's printer. So far as foreign law is concerned such a course seems called for by the great convenience and saving of expense that it affords to all parties and by that confidential relation which exists between the state. The rule too, would seem to be almost entirely free from any danger of abuse, and error or imposition could easily be detected. Fashman J. in Emery v. Berry 23 D. H. 413, 414. Wigmore § 1684. Section 81 of the Indian Evidence Act provides that the Court shall presume the genuineness of every book purporting to be printed or published by the authority of the Government.

Scope of the section The words "any country" are wide enough to include India, Great Britain and other foreign countries and as such the Indian Act, British Statutes as well as foreign laws can be proved by the authorized edition of the Statute of the country concerned. But it seems from the words "form an opinion" that the Legislature did not intend to include in this section the doctrine of laws as well as laws of those countries of which a Court of law, under a judge, takes judicial notice. Those laws require no proof (vide s. 57 cl. (1) and (2)). But if it be necessary for a Court to form an opinion as regards the domestic law of which it can take judicial notice it is to refer to the authorized edition of the book containing the particular law. Moreover this section deals not only with the Statute-law but also with the Judge-made law. When the Indian Evidence Act was enacted in 1872 there was no provision in any other Statute which enabled the Court to ascertain the case-law from the authorized Report. The author-as well as unauthorized reports were in existence at that time, and if we give this narrow construction to this section, it would seem that in cases of foreign law authorized reports of foreign countries would be admissible to show the foreign case law but authorized reports of the domestic Government as well of the British Government would not be admissible. Taking every thing into consideration it is better, it seems, to extend the meaning of the section and to make it include Statute law of India, Great Britain and other foreign countries.

Book purporting to be printed or published. The distinct authority for printing the laws need not appear in any case where they purport to be published under the authority of the Government. Per Munston J in Will v. Cutler 38 Mich 196

Foreign law, how proved. The laws of other nations and States—not being laws of the forum at all, except by adoption—will not be judicially noticed. Greenl. Ev § 6(h). So in regard to foreign laws the established doctrine now is that no Court takes judicial notice of the laws of a foreign country, but they must be proved as facts. Ibid § 486. Where a Court consists of a Judge and a Jury the better opinion is, that such proof should be addressed to the Judge and not to the Jury. Story on Conflict of Laws § 633. The next question is, may the terms of the law, if it is a Statute be proved by an expert witness (vide s. 45 infra) instead of by an exemplification or other copy? It is usually said that in such a case a copy must be used. But the argument for the opposite view is that the state of the law at a given time, consists not merely of the words of the Statute, but of such additional elements as the construction and effect given to them by usage and judicial decision and the repealing or modifying effect of later Statutes, so that to testify to the condition of the Statute law is not necessarily to testify merely to the terms of a document, and thus may be allowed without producing the Statute or a copy of it. This argument has much force but has rarely prevailed, except that expert testimony to the judicial interpretation of a Statute already proven by copy would not be objected to. Mostyn v. Fabrigas Corp 161 174, Parson's Trial 30 How St Tr 509, Larson v. Higgins 3 Stark 178, Altian v. Funnell 1 C M & R 291, Millers v. Hemmick, 1 Camp 151, Baron de Bode's Case, 8 Q B 20, Cocks v. Parday 2 C & K 270, Nelson v. Brulford, 8 Beav 539, Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Cl & F 115, Bremer v. Freeman 10 Moore P C 362. Greenl. Ev § 489. The particular question is whether the evidence of a foreign 'written law' should be presented in the shape of a copy or merely by recollection to memory of one qualified to know it. Higmore § 1271. In Baron de Bode's Case 8 Q B 20, Patterson J said: 'I quite agree that a witness conversant with the law of a foreign country may be asked what in his opinion the law of that country is. But I cannot help thinking that, as soon as it appears that he is going to speak of a written law his mouth is closed. The general rule is not denied, that when the contents of a written instrument are to be proved, the instrument itself should be produced, or when the instrument from its nature is provable by an examined copy, then such examined copy. I cannot see why the rule should not be the same in the case of a foreign written law. I think the rule would be just the same if the question related to the French Code as existing at this moment. If a witness were asked what the law now is with respect to a bill of exchange in France and were immediately cross-examined as to whether that law was not in writing and answered that it was, I think a copy of the law must be produced.' So also Justice Story says.

Generally speaking, authenticated copies of the written laws, or other public instruments of a foreign Government are expected to be produced. For it is not to be presumed that any civilized nation will refuse to give such copies duly authenticated which are usual and necessary for the purpose of administering justice in foreign countries. It cannot be presumed that an application to a foreign Government to authenticate its own edict or law will be refused. Story on Conflict of Laws § 640.

According to this section evidence of foreign statute law can be given by the authenticated copy of the statute of the foreign government. But section 1, of the Act says that it can be proved as well by the opinions of persons specially skilled in such law. Now the question is whether there are two modes of proving a foreign statute, or they contemplate proof of foreign statute under

S. 38 different circumstances. The question is thus answered by Prof Wigmore 'But the answer to this is clear. It may be conceded that if the question were purely and simply directed to the contents of a specific statute, the proof should be by copy of its terms. But in the usual case this is not the question. The inquiry is as to the state of law at the present time or at a given time past. This inquiry can be answered only by taking into consideration the appropriate statute, if any, the pre-existing rule of custom or judicial precedent as affected by the statute, the validity of the statute under some possible constitution, and the actual effect of the statute as determined by prior and subsequent judicial application of the constitution and by judicial construction of the statutory words. In short, an answer as to the state of the law at a given moment can not be a mere reproduction, offered in place of a copy, of statutory words, it is a statement of a net fact separate from the words of a statute and involving many considerations in which the words of a statute are but a single element. The acceptance of a mere copy of the statute, far from securing greater accuracy, would on the contrary tend rather to mislead, by ignoring these and other material elements.' Wigmore § 1271, see also per Denman and Coleridge JJ in Baron de Bode's Case 8 Q. B. 250, Sussex Peerage Case 11 Cl. & F. 115, Coel's v Purday 2 C. & K. 270, vide notes under s. 40. But in some cases a copy was required. Yde, Hasford v Morris, 2 Hagg. Cons. 439, Boentling v Schneider, 3 Esp. 58, Clegg v Levy, 3 Cmp. 166, Miller v Hewark, 4 Camp. 155, Alles v Hodgson, 7 T. R. 241, Male v Roberts, 3 Esp. 164, Inglis v Usherwood 1 Esp. 520 K. B. In Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Cl. & F. 113, Lord Denman going to the other extreme said "We have both the materials of knowledge offered to us. We have the witness and he tells the law which he says is correctly laid down in the books. The books are produced but the witness describes them as authoritative. Proof of the law itself in a case of foreign law, could not be taken from the book of the law, but from the witness who described the law. If the witness says 'I know the law and the book truly states the law, then you have the authority of the witness and of the book.' So it is clear that although an authorized printed copy of a foreign statute is admissible in evidence under this section, foreign law cannot be proved from such authorized edition alone but some expert should be called to testify that it contains the law in question. In England by Stat. 22 and 23 Vict. Cap. 63, a case may be stated for the opinion of a Superior Court in any of His Majesty's Dominions to ascertain the law of that part. Phip Et 4th Ed. 309. Lord v Colvin 1 D. & S. 24, Logan v Princess of Coorg 30 Beav. 637 = 1 Jour. O. S. 109. So also by Stat. 24 and 25 Vict. Ch. 11, a similar case may be stated for the opinion of a Court in any foreign state with which His Majesty may have entered into a convention for ascertainment of such law. Phip Et 4th Ed. 309. An unauthorized translation of the Code Napoleon is not a work to which reference can be made under this section. Christian v Delanney 26 C. & F. 3 C. W. N. 614. Under this section the Ceylon Insolvency Ordinances must be looked at to decide the question of the defendant's liability. Denanayagam v Muthu Kumar Suamy 14 Ind. Cas. 560.

Rulings of the Courts Reports of rulings need not, however, be published under authorities if only the book containing them purport to be a report of the rulings of the Court of such country. Field Et 7th Ed. 104. So according to this section reports of cases recognised by the Courts of a country will be evidence and be relevant and receivable. Port Et 202. So far as foreign law is concerned where the law is found in usage or judicial precedent the oral testimony from an expert is concededly receivable. Green Et § 485. This section admits 45. So far as the Law Reports of this country are concerned, this section admits authorized as well as unauthorized Law Reports when the latter are recognized by the Court. "But no Court shall be bound to hear cited or received or treat as an authority binding on it the report of any case decided by any of the said High Court or by the Chief Court of Oudh other than a report published under the authority of any Local Government." Inde s. 3 of the Indian Law Reports Act (VIII of 1975). But the Indian Law Reports Act has no application to a decision of the Privy Council and therefore the Courts are at liberty to refer to an unauthorized report of the decision of the Privy Council.

and, if they are satisfied that it is a correct report they are bound to follow it Shuja ul mulk v Umruddumra, A I R 1926 Mad 20=48 M 846=49 M L J 498 In Mukbul Ahmed v Rakhal Das, 4 C W N 732, an unreported case, namely Jagabandhu v Deenu, 4 C W N 734, was referred to the Court. But the Court observed: "We are unable to agree with the ruling in that case, and as that ruling is not reported, we are not bound, under section 3 of Act XVIII of 1875, to follow it and to treat it as an authority binding upon us." See also Sourindra v Surnamayee, 5 C W N 307=28 C 171. But in Mahamed Ali v Mir Nisar Ali, 5 C W N 326=28 C 289, Maclean O J said: "I cannot however part with this case without taking the opportunity of expressing my dissent from the view taken by Mr Justice Rampini and Mr Justice Pratt in the case of Mukbul Ahmed v Rakhal Das Hazra, 4 C W N 732, where they held that they were not bound to receive or treat as an authority binding on them an unreported case or ruling binding that view upon section 3 of Act XVIII of 1875. That section was framed to constitute a monopoly, if the Judges so desired, for the authorized Law Reports, it only says that no Court shall be bound to hear cited the 'report' of any case etc., it does not prevent the Court from looking at an unreported judgment of other Judges of the same Court. This has always been done and ought to be done. A judgment is none the less an authority because it has not been reported otherwise the question of whether or not a judgment could or could not be regarded, would depend upon the mere whim of the Reporter. I therefore respectfully dissent from the view on this point expressed in the case reported in 4 C W N 732." Brett and Banerjee JJ concurred with him, see also Trustees P D v Venkata Chalam 93 Ind Cas 710. An unauthorized report of a High Court case is entitled to respect. 8 N L J 153=A I R 1925 Nag 414. Unauthorized reports are on the same footing as an unreported case. 24 O C 319.

HOW MUCH OF A STATEMENT IS TO BE PROVED

39 When any statement of which evidence is given

What evidence is to be given when statement forms part of a conversation, document book or series of letters or papers forms part of a longer statement, or of a conversation or part of an isolated document, or is contained in a document which forms part of a book, or of a connected series of letters or papers, evidence shall be given of so much and no more of the statement conversation, document, book or series of letters or papers as the Court considers necessary in that particular case to enable the understanding of the nature and effect of the statement and of the circumstances under which it was made

Principle "Entirety of parts is equally essential to the understanding of an utterance. A word is interpreted in the sense of the use of the same word in another part, a clause is explained by a prior or subsequent clause, one sentence qualifies another and each part is taken as a part of the whole exposition. We must consider the whole and not merely a part of the remainder for its own sake, but because without it we cannot be sure that we have the true sense and effect of the utterance. Entirety of parts is as essential as verbal precision, for the meaning of a part is often lost to a fragment of an utterance without knowing that the remainder is as follows. Hignore § 2091. 'It is as if a man is speaking and saying a word which has a different construction as if it were a word of a different tendency or which is produced if the whole were not there.' In the part of a conversation which serves to qualify or explain the utterance. Per Lord C. J. in 2 Exch 413. 'When a man gives in evidence a copy of a letter or a copy of the whole of a conversation for the purpose of proving or disproving denied by Lords Ridesdale and Wyndford, and that it does not rest on any previous authority. The Indian Legislature has wisely left to the discretion of the Court as regards how much of the statement, conversation, document, book or series of letters or papers should be admitted. Under s 39 so much of the statement made by an accused can be given in evidence as the Court considers necessary in that particular case to the full understanding of the nature and effect of the statement. But so far as the admissibility of the words deposed to is concerned they are still governed by the provisions of section 27 which must be construed as favourably to the accused as possible for it is a section which makes an exception against the accused contrary to the general sections, namely sections 25 and 26 which are in his favour. Karam Din v Emperor, A I R 1929 Irb 438. So section 39 cannot be invoked for the purpose of letting in a confession in respect of which the bar created by ss 24, 25 and 26 prevails. Act has not been removed by s 27. Salhan v Emperor A I R 1929 Irb 314.

By whom such evidence be given and how much. The principle underlying the section however raises two sorts of questions first, whether the party offering the admission must, as a preliminary condition, put in the whole, or other parts of the conversation, document, etc., secondly, whether the party whose statement it is may afterwards by way of explanation put in the remainder or other parts, or other statements. It does not seem to be generally required that the party offering the admission must put in at the same time any more than that which he desires to use—whether a speech or conversation (Eaton v Trial 11 How St Tr 423, R v O Connell 5 State Tr N S 1, 196) or a writing (Cornish v Trial 11 How St Tr 423, Seely v Burt 4 Den 426) and so far as the portion of it allowed to be given is concerned the substance is sufficient without the precise words whether of an oral statement (R v Edmond, 1 State Tr N S 76) or a lost writing, Hardy's Trial, 24 How St Tr 681. As to a letter forming part of a correspondence it does not seem usual to require the preceding letters to be put in, unless they are expressly referred to in the one offered. A party against whom the admission is offered and who wishes to explain the same may put in only so much as is necessary for his purpose, i.e. to qualify or explain the portion put in against him. Prince v Samo, 7 A & E 627. So no utterance irrelevant to the issue is receivable and no more of the remainder of the utterance than concerns the same subject, and is explanatory of the first part is receivable. The remainder thus received merely aids in the construction of the utterances as a whole and is not in itself testimony. People v Schlessel 196 N Y 476 = 96 N L 41, Higmore 2113, Bulunta Nath v Chandra Mohan, 1 B L R A C 133 = 10 W R 190, Pulin Behary v Watson 9 W R 190.

Statement. A statement may be verbal or written and it may also be in a civil or criminal proceeding: i.e. admission or confession. Almonney v Ramanoogiah 7 W R C R 29, R v Chaloo Khan 5 W R 70, Ishan v Hwan 11 W R C R 525, Sheelsh Boodhoo 8 W R C R 39.

Conversation. It is undoubtedly the general rule that whenever the statements, declarations or admissions of a party are made subjects of proof, all that was said by him at the same time and upon the same subject is admissible in his favour and the whole should be taken and considered together. This is essential to a complete understanding of what he intended to express by the particular phrases and language which he uses. To give effect to general statements, without regard to the qualifications with which they are accompanied, and by which they may be materially modified, would manifestly tend to error, and be likely to be directly productive of injustice. All therefore is to be heard and weighed before it can be affirmed that the force and effect of language whether written or spoken are fully and justly apprehended. Per Merril J in Corn v Keyes, 11 Gray 323, 324. Higmore § 2094. Complete certainty as to the true meaning of an utterance can only be ascertained by considering every word in it. The change, omission, or addition of even a single word may radically alter the meaning. But for oral utterances such verbal precision need not and cannot be required. The general rule universally accepted, is therefore that the substance or effect of the actual words spoken will suffice, the witness stating this substance as best as he can from the impression left upon his memory. The rule is applicable to oral utterances generally,—including admissions, conversations (whether as forming contracts or merely as admissions), and the like. It applies also to an accused's confessions, and to seditious utterances. P v Hunt 1 State Tr N S 171 (22), R v Edmonds, 1 State Tr N S 181, R v O'Connell, 5 St Tr N S 1, 196, Wigmore § 2097. For a party's admissions and conversations involving admissions, and for oral words charged as seditious or defamatory, the proponent need prove in the first instance that part only which serves his purpose. Wigmore § 2099. In Stuart v Sherman 5 Conn 244, 245 Hosmer C J said: 'It is correct principle that the whole of a conversation must be taken together, in order to show distinctly the full meaning and sense of the party. The question is merely this whether a particular conversation is part of a preceding conversation because a negotiation begun was still pursued. (Here) the conversation, in the manner above mentioned, was not the same. The past and future cannot thus be brought together in order to form an artificial identity. The law never intends that a party may make evidence for him from his own declarations, but merely that the meaning of a conversation shall not be perverted by proof of a part of it only.' So the application of this principle to conversations including oral admissions and confessions depends almost entirely on the circumstances of each case. Wigmore § 2119.

Document. It seems reasonable that where a party produces a document in evidence, he must be considered as producing the whole of the document. His opponent has therefore a right to refer to any part of it as already in proof. In other words he may extract the remaining contents of the document (provided they be relevant to the subject matter) and bring them before the jury, on the same principle that he may by cross examination extract from a witness all facts within that witness's memory provided they be relevant to the subject matter." Moody & Robinson Note to 2 Mo & Rob 46.

Account books. Where the statement is contained in an entry in an account book, the rule will not warrant the reading of distinct entries in the book. Cott v Dorand, 3 Stark R 6. Gregory v Tavernor, 6 C & P 280. In Derry v Holkiss, 30 N Y 497 502, Hogebloom J said: 'The book constituted one entire series of accounts between these parties, and for the purposes of this case may be regarded as if they contained nothing else whatever.—Indeed as if they had all been presented in Court by the plaintiffs on a single paper or account current. In such a case could the defendant be permitted to call particular entries from the account and exclude the residue?' I think not. Wigmore § 2118, Darston v Oxford, 1 Lq Cas Abt 10, Rouland v Blakley, 1 Q B 407.

Letters or papers. As to letters forming part of a correspondence, it does not seem usual to require the preceding letters to be put in unless they are expressly referred to in the one offered. Watson v Moore 1 C & K 626. So where the plaintiff read three letters of the defendant admitting parts of the plaintiff's case the defendant was not allowed to read other letters of his in the same book dealing with the same correspondence. Sturge v Buchanan 10 A & E 598. In that case Denman J in delivering the judgment said: 'This is a series of copies of letters written from time to time on principle exactly the same things as if they had been kept in his counting house on a file, it is like proving what a party said in one conversation, one of those letters or one of these conversations may be proved without authorizing the opposite party to bring forward for this own benefit what he himself said or wrote in another conversation or a different letter. But "where a letter is written in answer to another it may often be unintelligible without referring to the previous one." By referring to the letter to which he is replying the writer to that extent makes it a part of his own communication.' Per Honor J in Trishchal v Innes C 14 Gray 457.

As the Court considers necessary. Great prolixity and waste of time may occur if the whole of long rambling statements were to be introduced in proof on the ground that the whole of the document or documents or conversation must be before the Court. The Judge is therefore constituted in every case a referee by whose decision is limited the quantity of the document, etc., contained the statements which shall be put in evidence His direction is to be guided by the principle of letting in so much and so much only, as makes clear the nature and effect of the statement, and the circumstances under which it was made Nort P p 203 The Court would exercise a sound discretion in admitting only so much as explains or qualifies the statement Prince v Samo 7 A & L 67 is the leading case on this subject In that case Denman L C J said 'My opinion was that the witness might be asked as to every thing said by the plaintiff, when he appeared on the trial of the indictment, that could in any way qualify or explain the statement as to which he had been cross examined, but that he had no right to add any independent history of transactions wholly unconnected with it'

JUDGMENTS OF COURTS OF JUSTICE WHEN RELEVANT

40 The existence of any judgment, order or decree, which by law prevents any Court from taking cognizance of a suit or holding a trial, is a relevant fact when the question is whether such Court ought to take cognizance of such suit, or to hold such trial

Previous judgments relevant to bar a second suit or trial

law prevents any Court from taking cognizance of a suit or holding a trial, is a relevant fact when the question is whether such Court

Judgment of Court of Justice when relevant Judgments in Courts of Justice on other occasions form an exception to the exclusion of evidence of transactions not specifically connected with facts in issue Step Intro 164 Judgments are said to be of two kinds—in Rem and in Personam The former term seems never to have been clearly defined but it is commonly understood to apply to all judgments affecting the legal status of some subject matter, person or thing e.g. Admiralty judgments in cases of forfeiture or prize, Divorce Court decrees, grants of Probate and Administration, and adjudication in Bankruptcy Such judgments are conclusive evidence against all persons, whether parties or strangers Such judgments are always relevant (vide section 41) Judgments in personam are all ordinary judgments between persons not so affecting status Such judgments bind only parties and privies to the facts in issue Privies are divided by Coke (Co Lit 271 a) and other writers into three classes (1) In estate (or interest) as donor or donee lessor and lessee or vendor and purchaser (2) In blood, as ancestor and heir, or co-parceners, (3) In law (or representation) as testator and executor intestate or administrator tenant and lord claiming by escheat, or successive incumbents The same rule applies to these privies as to original parties, viz., that a party claiming through another is stopped in the same manner as the original party All judgments are conclusive against all persons of their legal effect as distinguished from the facts upon which they are based (Cockle Cas 44)

The distinction between judgments in rem and judgments in personam was thus laid down by Blackburn J in Casrique v Imrie L R 4 H L pp 427—429 Some points are clear Where a tribunal, no matter whether in England or a foreign country, has to determine between two parties and between them only, the decision of that tribunal, though in general binding between the parties and privies does not affect the rights of third parties, and if, in execution of the judgment of such a tribunal process issues against the property of one of the litigants, and some particular thing is sold as being his property, there is nothing to prevent any third person setting up his claim to that thing for the tribunal neither had jurisdiction to determine nor did determine, anything more than that the litigant's property should be sold, and did not do more than sell the litigant's interest if any, in the thing All proceedings in the Courts of common law in England are of this nature, and it is every day's experience that where the Sheriff, under a fieri facias against A, has sold a particular chattel B, may set up his claim to that chattel either against the Sheriff or the purchaser from the Sheriff And if this may be done in the Courts of the country in which the judgment was pronounced, it follows of course that it may be done in a foreign country But when the tribunal has jurisdiction to determine not merely on the

S. 40. rights of the parties, but also on the disposition of the thing, and does in the exercise of that jurisdiction direct that the thing, and not merely the interest of any particular party in it, be sold or transferred, the case is very different. Whatever settles as to the right or title, or whatever disposition it makes of the property by sale, revendication, transfer, or other act, will be held valid in every other country where the question comes directly or indirectly in judgment before any other foreign tribunal. This is very familiarly known in the case of proceedings in rem in foreign Courts of Admiralty, whether they be causes of prize or bottomry, or salvage or forfeiture, of which such Courts have a rightful jurisdiction founded in the actual or constructive possession of the subject matter."

All judgments whatever are conclusive proof as against all persons of the existence of that state of things which they actually effect when the existence of the state of things so effected is a fact in issue or is deemed to be relevant to the issue (Stephen's Digest Art 40, see also Gopi v Kherod, A I R 1920 Cal 194). The only cases in which a judgment is conclusive are those specified in section 41. In all other cases, a judgment is, under this Act, only relevant. By section 40, the existence of a judgment, etc., is declared to be relevant when 'by law' its existence and production bar a second suit or trial. A judgment is proof of its own existence and of its legal consequences not simply inter partes, but against all the world, but not of the truth of the fact on which it rested. A judgment delivered by a Court of law upon a matter thoroughly investigated by it, is evidence of the highest authority. The maxim of the law is, Pes judicis pro veritate accipitur, a matter already adjudicated on, must be accepted as truth, and this for two reasons—first on account of the solemnity and publicity attending such judgments, secondly on account of the principle, Interest reipublice ut sit finis litium (It concerns the state that there should be an end to all law suits). Hence the maxim, transit in rem judicatum. The production of a judgment is proof of its existence and of its legal consequences against all the world. Thus in action by A against B for malicious prosecution—If A puts in evidence the judgment of his acquittal on the former trial, that is proof both of the existence of the judgment, is a fact, and of his legal acquittal. So again in action by a surety against the principal to recover money which the surety has been compelled to pay on his guarantee—if the surety puts in evidence the judgment of the Court in the suit in which he was compelled to pay, that is proof of the amount of damages which he has sustained. So again, if a man be tried for a crime and puts in evidence his former conviction for the same crime, the judgment is conclusive both as to the fact of the judgment and also of all its legal consequences,—that is its efficiency to protect him from a second indictment, for the maxim of the law is Nemo debet bis vexari pro una et eadem causa. No man ought to be troubled twice for one and the same crime, which is in itself another application of the maxim interest reipublice, etc., except, in as far as the one maxim looks to the case of the individual, the other to the peace of the public at large—Non Est 205 206. So the general principle is that the mere existence of a judgment, its date and its legal consequences are conclusively proved, as against all the world by the production of the record or the production of an examined copy, (for a judgment being a public transaction of a state character must be presumed to be faithfully recorded), but that it furnishes no proof whatever of collateral facts, even though, as between the parties to a judgment themselves such facts must be proved. Tay Er 10th Ed § 106. See also Abinash v Paresb Nath 9 C W N 102 (410), Phup Er 4th Ed p 373. Abdul Latiff v Abdul Huq 28 C W N 62, Budyanath v Aliyan 36 C L J 4.

Sections 40 to 43 of the Evidence Act deal with the subject of relevant judgments. Fer Miller J in Gayu Lal v Patch Lal, 6 C 171 (144) F. R. Er. In the cases, which the Evidence Act provides for, are cases in which the judgment of a Court is in the nature of a law, and creates the right which it affects, and exists. Step Introduction pp 167 168. Decisions would be binding only as to the parties to the suits in which they were given. Judgments in one case become relevant in another only if they fall under ss 40 to 43 of the Act. Tay Er 10th Ed p 106. Das v Fakir Mohamed 19 S L R 376—1926 Sind 161. This section is applicable when the Court has jurisdiction to decide the matter and one party says it should.

not do so because that matter has been decided before Lakshman v Ramdas, S, 40 A I R 1929 Cal 374 (F B)

Judgment, meaning of The word judgment in sections 40—44 means any final judgment, order or decree of any Court Step Dig Ev art 39

Scope of the section In Ranckhoddas v Bapu Narhor, 10 B 439, Seargent C J said 'In the Bombay case (Naranji v Dupa 3 B p 3), it is plain that Westropp C J is alluding to judgments on material issues between the same parties or their representatives which were conclusive under the old law. And it is not clear from the report of the case before Couch C J (Neamut Ali v Goroo Dass 22 W R C R 365) that the judgment there in question was not of the same nature. We do not, however, think that exclusion of such judgments is a necessary inference from the Evidence Act without calling in aid sections 11 and 13. Section 40 may, we think, without unduly straining the language, be read as including them. In Soorjomonee Dayee v Suddamund Mohapattee, 12 B L R 304, the Privy Council held that the term cause of action in clause 2 of Act VIII of 1859 was to be construed as including a material issue and we think that, similarly the terms 'taking cognizance of a suit' may be construed as including a material issue in the suit between the same parties, in other words, that section 40 was intended to include cases in which the general law relating to res judicata inter partes as then understood applied. This section provides that the existence of a judgment, decree, or order is a relevant fact if it by law has the effect of preventing any Court from taking cognizance of a suit or of holding a trial. Per Mitter J in Gujju Lal v Fateh Lal, 6 C 171 (176). In the same case Garth C J at p 190 said 'It is true that s 40 might have been more clearly worded. It is in fact, much the same defect as s 2 of Act VIII of 1859 which was pointed out by the Privy Council in case of Soorjomonee Dayee v Suddamund Mohapattee, 12 B L R 304. But I cannot doubt that it was intended to include all judgments which by law operate to prevent a Court whether civil or criminal, from taking cognizance of a suit or trying any particular issue. The words 'holding a trial' are amply large enough to admit of this construction, and it is not because in some other Act the words 'holding a trial' may have been construed to refer to criminal trials only, and we ought to confine their meaning in the same way in s 40 of the Evidence Act." See also the judgment of Mitter J in page 176. An entry in a record prepared under s 108 of the Bombay Revenue Code by the Survey Officer, describing certain lands as khots is by force of s 17 of the Bombay Khots Act conclusive and final evidence of the liability thereby established and the Civil Court cannot look behind the entry. And under the circumstances mentioned above, the evidence of a decision otherwise relevant under s 40 of the Evidence Act as proof of res judicata earlier than the date of the survey entry where a Civil Court adjudged the land to be dhora, and the evidence that the khots have never received that, are inadmissible for the purpose of depriving the conclusive effect of the entry by the survey authority. All these matters must have been shown to the survey officer before he arrived at the decision of which the record is the entry. Ram Chandra v Raghunath, 20 B 470 see also Balaji v Dalbin, 21 B 235 Gopal v Dasarath, 21 B 244 Gopal v Mageshwar, 21 B 608, Anaji v Madhab, 21 B 480. Where a subsisting judgment, order or decree relevant under this section is set up by one party as a bar to the claim of the other the latter can show that the judgment, order etc. was delivered by a Court without jurisdiction or was obtained by fraud or collusion, and it is not necessary for him to have it previously set aside by a separate suit. Bansi Lal v Deapo, 24 A 242 = A W N 1902 38. This section simply renders admissible judgments which operate as pleas in bar of the action of the kind known as pleas of res judicata or otherwise under some other rule of law. This section has nothing to do with question of evidence beyond the admissibility of the judgments because a plea of res judicata is not a plea as a matter of evidence but only a plea barring the action as a matter of procedure as distinguished from the rules of evidence. The Collector of Gorakhpur v Palakdhari, 12 A 1 (F B) 44, see also Sita Ram v Amir Begam, 8 A 324. Where a judgment inter partes

S 40 . contain a recital of the pleadings it is admissible in evidence, if the recital refers to a point in issue Udamathal v Parameswara, 85 Ind Cas 996=96 L W 460=A I R 1925 Mad 1019

Foreign Judgment A party who has submitted to the jurisdiction of a foreign Court is bound by its judgment when such judgment is within jurisdiction and does not offend the principles of natural justice. Irregularities which do not affect the jurisdiction of the Court do not vitiate such judgment even when they are such as will, in the view of the foreign Court, render the judgment thereon nullity. Gudaru v Maradugula, 30 M 292, see also Kaha v Chokalinga, 7 M 105. As regards what amounts to submission vide Sriraman v Ibura 18 M 327, see also Copin v Adamson L R 9 Ex 33. Emanuel v Simon, (1908) 1 K B 302. Section 13 of the Civil Procedure Code runs as follows: 'A foreign judgment shall be conclusive as to any matter thereby directly adjudicated upon between the same parties or between parties under whom they or any of them claim litigating under the same title except— (a) where it has not been pronounced by a Court of competent jurisdiction, (b) where it has not been given on the merits of the case, (c) where it appears on the face of the proceedings to be founded on an incorrect view of international law or a refusal to recognise the law of British India in cases in which such law is applicable, (d) where the proceedings in which the judgment was obtained are opposed to natural justice, (e) where it has been obtained by fraud, (f) where it sustains a claim founded on a breach of any law in force in British India.'

So a foreign judgment operates as res judicata except in the cases specified in section 13 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908. Babubhat v Ankerbhat, 13 B 224. 'Where a Court of competent jurisdiction has adjudicated a certain sum to be due from one person to another a legal obligation arises to pay that sum on which an action of debt to enforce the judgment may be maintained. It is in this way that the judgments of foreign and colonial Courts are supported and enforced.' Per Parkes Bin Williams v Jones 13 M & W 633, Russel v Smith 9 M & W 819. Goddard v Gray L R 6 Q B 111.

So where the subject matter is a res so situated as to be within the lawful control of the state under the authority of which a Court sits and the authority has conferred on the Court jurisdiction to decide as to the disposal of the thing and the Court has acted within that jurisdiction, that decision is conclusive, whether, according to the law of another country, it might be right or wrong. Carl Marx v Wingon A I R 1928 P C 63, Chatterjee v Imrie, L R H L 414. So all foreign judgments in personam if pronounced by a competent Court for the purposes of estoppel, on a fact analogous to home judgments provided they are final and unalterable by the Court pronouncing them. Duchess of Kingston's case 2 Sm L C 1. Ricardo v Garcias 12 Cl & F 368. Nonion v Freeman 15 App Cas 1.

Previous Judgment to bar a second suit A judgment which is a res judicata in rem is not admissible in evidence against those who are not parties to it nor derive title through such parties, as proof of the facts stated therein. Kesho Prasad v Kastanath A I R 1926 Pat 577=97 Ind Cas 202. Under section 40 the existence of a decree is a relevant fact when the question is whether in view of that decree the Court ought to take cognizance of it or to hold the trial. This means that it is relevant on the question as to why it operates as res judicata under section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code or as some other general principle of finality of judicial decisions which according to recent decisions of the Judicial Committee (vide infra) must be taken to apply to this country although not incorporated in that section. Per Mukherjee J in Beni Madhab v Sarbanand 43 C L J 135=95 Ind Cas 130=1 L J 101 Cal 693 at p 700. A previous decree for rent between the same parties may be admissible under this section for proving that the claim for certain years was decreed and so no suit would lie for the rent of that period and this would also conclude the trial of the question as to what was the rate of rent at the date of that suit if the decree showed that that question was finally decided in that suit. Ibid. 'It is not competent for the Court to take case of the same question arising between the same parties, to review a previous decision. If the decision was wrong it ought to have been appealed against." Per Lord Macnaghten in Badar Bee v Habib Merican, (1909) A C at p 623, see also Huntley v Gaskell, (1905) 2 Ch 656 Mangma v Wright, (1909) 2 K B 953, Humphries v Humphries, (1910) 1 K B 796

Res judicata by general principles of law Where a matter has been finally settled between the parties, the mere fact that the decision was given in an administration suit does not affect its finality Peareth v Maniot, 23 Ch D 182. A question finally decided at one stage of a suit cannot be reopened by the parties subsequently in the same suit. The decision is res judicata upon general principles of law and apart from the limited provisions of section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code. George Henry v Administrator General, 25 C W N 915=48 C 499=60 Ind Cts 631=40 M L J 423=1921 M W N 313=19 A L J 366=23 Bom L R 648 (P C), see also Ram Kripal v Mussumat Rup Kuari, L R 11 I A 37 at p 41=6 A 269 Syam v Secretary of State 36 M 141 Peari v Dwilari, 18 C W N 934. In Sheoprosad Singh v Ramnandan Prosad 43 I A 91=43 C 694=20 C W N 738 at page 744 Sir Laurence Jenkins in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee, of the Privy Council observed "But in view of the arguments addressed to them their Lordships desire to emphasise that the rule of res judicata while founded on ancient precedent, is dictated by a wisdom which is for all time. 'It hath been well said', declared Lord Coke, "interest rei publicae ut sit finis litium" otherwise great oppression might be done under colour and pretence of law. Priddle v Napper 6 Coke 9 A. Though the rule of the Code may be traced to English source it embodies a doctrine in no way opposed to the spirit of the law as expounded by the Hindu commentators Iyanaesari and Allanta who include the plea of a former judgment among those allowed by law, each citing for this purpose the text of Katyayana who describes the plea thus 'If a person though defeated at law sue again he should be answered, you are defeated formerly. This is called the plea of former judgment' [See 'the Mitalshara (vijayakar) Bk II Ch 1, edited by J R Ghorpore p 14, and the Mayukha Ch I, Section 1 p 11 of Mandlik's edition] And so the application of the rule by the Courts in India should be influenced by no technical considerations of form but by matter of substance within the limits allowed by law." The decision of a Probate Court on the question of relationship of one of the parties with the deceased is res judicata in a subsequent title suit Dnyapada v Kalipada, 31 C W N 898 Lachmi v Bhuthi 8 L 384 (F B) but see Lalulmohan v Radharaman, 15 C W N 1021. So also in T B Ramchandra Rao v A N S Rama Chandra Rao L R 49 I A 129=45 M 320=26 C W N 713 their Lordships at page 137 of the Indian Appeals stated "How the proceedings were commenced is a matter that is not material provided that they were instituted in the manner that gave the Court jurisdiction, for they ended in a decree made by the High Court and appealable to this Court. So the real principle is that if a matter has been brought out in a Court having jurisdiction to decide that matter, the decision on that matter would operate as res judicata although the Court might not be the same. Dnyapada v Kalipada 31 C W N 898 see also Badar Bee v Habib Merican Noordin (1909) A C 623, Hook v Administrator General of Bengal, 48 I A 187=25 C W N 417, Bam Ram v Nanhu Mal, 7 A 102=11 I A 181, Rameswar Singh v Hindendra Singh 29 C W N 413=40 C L J 431 (P C) Kalyan v Sitabai, 38 B 309 (F B) nt p 330, Maung Hemat v Ma Hlay 1 L R 1 Rang 208

Res judicata The following rule was laid down by Sir William De Grey C J in the Dutchess of Kingston's Case 20 How St. Tr. 355 (357) "As a general principle a transaction between two parties in a judicial proceeding, ought not to be binding upon a third, for it would be unjust to bind any person who could not be admitted to make a defence, or to examine witnesses, or appeal from a judgment he might think erroneous and therefore the deposit of witnesses in another cause in proof of a fact the verdict of a jury in find the fact and the judgment of the Court upon the facts found although even against the parties, and all claiming under them, are not, in general, to be

S. 40 to the prejudice of strangers. From the variety of cases relative to judgment being given in evidence in civil suits, these two deductions seem to follow: generally true first, that the judgment of a Court of concurrent jurisdiction directly upon this point, is as a plea, a bar, or as evidence, conclusive, between the same parties, upon the same matter, directly in question in another Court; secondly, that the judgment of a Court of exclusive jurisdiction directly upon the point, is, in like manner, conclusive upon the same matter, between the same parties, coming incidentally in question in another Court for a different purpose. But neither the judgment of a concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction is evidence of any matter which came collaterally in question, though within their jurisdiction, nor of any matter incidentally cognizable, nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment. But a former judgment between the same parties on the same subject matter will operate as an estoppel and be conclusive only when it is so pleaded, or there is no opportunity of so pleading it. Otherwise it is only a relevant fact from which the Court may draw a conclusion in favour of the person who tenders it as evidence. Booth v. Wright 1 B & Ald 662.

But the plea of res judicata as a bar to an action belongs to the province of adjective law, ad litem ordinationem, but difference of opinion prevails among jurists as to whether the rule belongs to the domain of procedure or substance. A rule of the law of evidence is furnishing a ground of estoppel. In England and I may say also in America the rule is usually dealt with as belonging to the law of evidence, for there judgments in personam, which operate as res judicata are as often treated as falling under the category of estoppel by record. Sir James Fitz James Stephen, the distinguished jurist who framed our Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872) and whose views have been accepted by our Indian Legislature in framing section 40 of the Act adopted what seems to me the only logical and juristic classification by treating the rule of res judicata as falling beyond the proper region of the law of evidence, and as appropriate to procedure properly so called. That the effect of the plea of res judicata in the result operate like an estoppel, by preventing a party to a litigation from denying the accuracy of the former adjudication, cannot be doubted. But here the similarity between the two rules virtually ends, and it is equally clear that the ratio upon which the doctrine of estoppel, properly so called rests is distinguishable from that upon which the plea of res judicata is founded. See also Raicharan v. Kumud 25 C 271—2 C W N 297.

Sections 11 and 12 of the Civil Procedure Code, lay down the law when a previous judgment of a domestic tribunal in a civil suit operates as res judicata in a subsequent civil suit. The provisions of section 11 run as follows—

No Court shall try any suit or issue in which the matter directly and substantially in issue has been directly and substantially in issue in a former suit between the same parties or between the parties under whom they or he of them claim litigating under the same title in a Court competent to try such subsequent suit or the suit in which such issue has been subsequently raised and has been heard and finally decided by such Court.

Explanation I The expression "former suit" shall denote a suit which has been decided prior to the suit in question whether or not it was in issue prior thereto.

Explanation II For the purposes of this section the competence of a Court shall be determined irrespective of any provisions as to a right of appeal from the decision of such Court.

Explanation III The matter above referred to must in the former suit have been alleged by one party and either denied or admitted, expressly or impliedly by the other.

Explanation IV Any matter which might and ought to have been in issue on ground of defence or attack in such former suit shall be deemed to have been in issue directly and substantially in issue in such suit.

Explanation V Any relief claimed in the plaint, which is not expressly granted by the decree shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to have been refused.

Explanation VI Where persons litigate bonafide in respect of a public right or of a private right claimed in common for themselves and others all persons interested in such right shall, for the purposes of this section be deemed to claim under the persons so litigating.

Section 12 of the Civil Procedure Code runs as follows Where a plaintiff is precluded by rules from instituting a further suit in respect of any particular cause of action, he shall not be entitled to institute a suit in respect of such cause of action in any Court to which this Code applies

A judgment in personam is conclusive only between the parties to the record and their privies Res inter alios acta alteri nocere non debet—Things done between strangers ought not to injure a party, or Res inter alios judicata nullum inter alios predicum facit—Matters decided between third parties do not affect strangers or any but themselves Between such parties the facts actually decided by a Court of competent jurisdiction cannot be again litigated Boilem v Rutlin 2 Ex 665 If, as remarked by Lord Kenyon C J in Greathead v Bramley, 7 T R 456 'an action be brought and the merits of the question be discussed between the parties and a final judgment obtained by either, the parties are concluded, and cannot canvass the same question again in another action although perhaps some objection or argument might have been urged upon the first trial which would have led to a different judgment' The same learned Judge in Maurott v Hampton 7 F R 269, said "If this action could be maintained I knew not what cause of action could ever be at rest After recovery by process of law, there must be an end of litigation, otherwise there would be no security for any person

Stay of suits "No Court shall proceed with the trial of any suit in which the matter in issue is also directly and substantially in issue in a previously instituted suit between the same parties or between the parties under whom they or any of them claim litigating under the same title where such suit is pending in the same or any other Court in British India having jurisdiction to grant the relief claimed, or in any Court beyond the limits of British India established or continued by the Governor General in Council and having like jurisdiction or before his His Majesty in Council

Explanation The pendency of a suit in a foreign Court does not preclude the Courts in British India from trying a suit founded on the same cause of action' Vide section 10 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908, see also Meekjee v Kasouji 4 C L R 282 Ballissen v Ashkan Lal, 11 A 148 Ramalinga v Raghunath 20 M 418 Venkappa v Manjunath, 16 M L J 526, Bissessar v Ganput 8 C L R 113 Kanjit v Bhagabutty 7 C W N 720, Mahadeo v Gopadhar 16 C W N 897 Sital v Gaya 19 C W N 529 Padamsee v Lahamsee 43 C 141, Venkata v Venkata 22 M 256, Sita Prasad v Theumdar 42 C 926 This section does not apply merely because one issue alone is common to the two suits The words 'the matter in issue in the section denote "the entire subject in controversy between the parties" Vellachanny v Muthiah Chettiar, 103 Ind Cas 274 The object of section 10, is to avoid a conflict of judicial decision In order to try a suit under that section it must be shown that the cause of action as disclosed in the pleadings the matter directly and substantially in issue and the relief claimed are substantially the same in the two suits Identity of reliefs is not necessary as under the old Code But the mere identity of one or more issues apart from their importance and bearing does not suffice Din Shaw v Galstani, 29 Bom L R 382=102 Ind Cas 229=A I R 1927 Bom 245 see also Kuberan v Korman Nan 88 Ind Cas 421=48 M L J 251=A I R 1925 Mad 574

Omission to sue for the whole of the claim Every suit shall include the whole of the claim which the plaintiff is entitled to make in respect of the cause of action, but a plaintiff may relinquish any portion of his claim in order to bring the suit within the jurisdiction of any Court Where a plaintiff omits to sue in respect of, or intentionally relinquishes any portion of his claim, he shall not afterwards sue in respect of the portion so omitted or relinquished A person entitled to more than one relief in respect of the same cause of action may sue for all of such reliefs, but if he omits except with the leave of

 cedure Code 1872 which bears a subsequent trial runs as follows:—A person who has once been tried by a Court of competent jurisdiction for an offence convicted or acquitted of such offence shall while such conviction or acquittal remains in force not be liable to be tried again for the same offence nor for any same facts for any other offence for which a different charge from the one against him might have been made under section 22, or for which he might have been convicted under section 23.

A person acquitted or convicted of an offence may be afterwards tried for any distinct offence for which a separate charge might have been made against him on the former trial under section 24 sub-section (1).

A person convicted of any offence constituted by any act causing consequences which together with such act constituted a different offence from that which he was convicted may be afterwards tried for such latter offence if if the consequences had not happened or were not known to the Court to have happened at the time when he was convicted.

A person acquitted or convicted of any offence constituted by any act may notwithstanding such acquittal or conviction, be subsequently tried for with any trial for and other offences constituted by the same acts which he have committed if the Court by which he was first tried was not competent try the offence with which he is subsequently charged.

Explanation. The dismissal of a complaint, the stopping of proceedings under section 219 the discharge of the accused, or any entry made upon a charge under section 271 is not an acquittal for the purposes of this section.

Judgments how proved. If a party offering a record does so in support of a plea of res judicata or to show that he has acquired or his adversary has lost some title or right either by the judgment alone or by it and proceedings taken for its enforcement, the whole record so far as it concerns the facts stated must be either produced or exemplified, and if exemplified, the exemplification must show on its face that the record is complete and is a regular and correct document whether an original or a copy, can be received in evidence of a judicial proceeding it must, in general appear that the record or entry of a proceeding has been finally completed. Taylor F. 10th Ed. § 1570.

41 A final judgment, order or decree of a competent

Relevancy of certain judgments in probate etc jurisdiction. Court, in the exercise of probate, matrimonial, admiralty or insolvency jurisdiction, which confers upon or takes away from any person any legal character, or which declares any person to be entitled to any such character, or to be entitled to any specific thing, not against any specified person but absolutely, is relevant when the existence of any such legal character, or the title of any such person to any such thing, is relevant.

Such judgment, order or decree is conclusive proof—that any legal character which it confers accrued at the time when such judgment, order or decree came into operation, that any legal character, to which it declares any such person to be entitled, accrued to that person at the time when such judgment, * [order or decree] declares it to have accrued to that person, S 41 that any legal character which it takes away from any such person ceased at the time from which such judgment, * [order or decree] declared that it had ceased or should cease, and that anything to which it declares any person to be so entitled was the property of that person at the time from which such judgment, * [order or decree] declares that it had been or should be his property

Principle The principle of the conclusiveness of judgments in rem is regards per se is, that public policy for the peace of society requires that matters of social status should not be left in continual doubt and as regards things, that generally speaking every one who can be affected by the decision may protect his interests by becoming a party to the proceedings. Physson Dr. did Ed 365

Judgment in rem meaning of A judgment in rem has been defined to be the judgment of a Court of exclusive or at least peculiar jurisdiction, declaratory either of the nature and condition of some particular thing, or of the condition and status of some particular person. 2 Phillips Et. It is an adjudication pronounced upon the status of some particular subject matter, by a tribunal having competent authority for that purpose. It differs from a judgment in personam in this that the latter judgment is in form as well as in substance between the parties claiming the right, and that it is inter partes appears by the record itself. A judgment in rem is founded on a proceeding instituted not against the person as such but against or upon the thing or subject matter itself whose state or condition is to be determined. It is a proceeding to determine the state or condition of the thing itself and the judgment is a solemn declaration of the status of the thing and it ipso facto renders it what it declares to be. 2 Hoodruff v Taylor 20 Vt 65. The most concise definition of a judgment in rem is that 'it is an adjudication upon the status of some particular subject matter by a tribunal having competent authority for that purpose, depending for its effect on this principle that it is a solemn declaration proceeding from an accredited quarter concerning the status of the thing adjudicated upon which very declaration operates accordingly upon the status of the thing adjudicated upon and ipso facto renders it such as it is thereby declared to be. 2 Smith's Leading Cas 58, 186. I do not think, says Sir Barnes Peacock in Kanhya Lal v Radha Charan, in 7 W R 338 (F B) at p 342 'that Mr Smith's definition of a judgment in rem is accurate. But Mr Justice Holway has not I think attached sufficient importance to the words used by Mr Smith 'which very declaration operates upon the status of the thing adjudicated upon and ipso facto renders it such as it is thereby declared to be'. This would not be the effect of a finding upon a question of status in a suit in personam though it might have been so under the civil law in a suit in rem not for the purpose of asserting a right against a particular person but for the purpose of adjudicating upon the status.

Scope of the section This section consists of two parts. The first part makes the judgments, etc relevant. The second part makes the judgments conclusive evidence in certain matters. The conditions necessary for making a judgment relevant may be considered under two heads, those having reference to the contents of the judgments and those to the nature of the proceedings in which the judgment is sought to be relied upon. First with reference to the

* These words in s 41 wherever they occur were inserted by the Indian Evidence Act Amendment Act (18 of 1872) s 3

S 41. judgment alleged to fall under s 41 it must be (1) of a competent Court in the exercise of Probate, Matrimonial, Admiralty or Insolvency jurisdiction, (2) it must (a) confer upon or take away from any person any legal character, or (b) declare any person (i) to be entitled to any such character, or (ii) to be entitled to any specific thing, not as against any specified person, but absolutely. Secondly, with regard to the proceedings in which the said judgment is sought to be relied upon as a piece of evidence, the existence of any such legal character, or the title of any such person to any such thing must be relevant. Per Tyabji J C J in Radha Kishen v M Gangabai A I R 1925 Supd 121=22 S L R 105. A judgment can be conclusive if it falls under the second part of this section. No doubt this section makes no distinction between a positive or a negative judgment or between the point adjudicated upon and the grounds on which the decision is based but it arrives at the same result in a more simplified manner. It declares the purposes for which the judgment of a competent Court operates as conclusive against the world and so far as such purposes relate to the status or what is referred to as legal character of a person it specifies three purposes only: it provides that the judgment is conclusive proof only for showing (a) that the judgment has conferred a legal character, or (b) that it has declared that a person had such a legal character, or (c) that it has declared that the legal character of a person which subsisted had ceased to exist. Per Rup Chand J C J in Ind. So a decree of divorce, though conclusive upon all persons that the parties have been divorced and that the parties are no longer husband and wife is not even relevant against strangers, that the evidence for which the decree was pronounced existed. Kanhaya Lal v Radha Charan, 4 W R 388=B L R Sup Vol 662 (F B). The only kind of negative judgment which is contemplated by this section is that which expressly takes away from a person a legal character which has up to that time subsisted. Anjyan Chaud v Subodh 33 B 309=23 Ind Cas 325=16 Bom L R 5 (F B). This section would only be conclusive proof of the fact that the legal character ceased at the time from which such judgment declared that it had ceased or should cease.

An order adjudicating a person as an insolvent and vesting his property in the Official Receiver no doubt operates as a judgment in rem but the ground on which the order is based has no such effect. There is a broad distinction between the effect of a judgment in rem and a judgment in personam. The point adjudicated upon in a judgment in rem is always as to the status of the res and is conclusive against the world as to that status whereas in a judgment in personam the point whatever it may be which is adjudicated upon (it not being as to the status of the res) is conclusive between parties or privies. Radha Kishan v M Gangabai ubi supra, see also Ballantyne & Co v Mackinnon, (1906) 2 Q B 455=61 I J Q B 616=75 I L 95.

Where a judgment operates as a judgment in rem (is the decision of a Probate Court does under s 41) it is not subject to collateral attack while it remains in force it is conclusive not only on the person who was party to the judgment but upon all persons and all Courts. Ravi Hemangini v Ram Sundari 34 C L J 457.

'The whole question of judgment in rem in India was exhaustively discussed in Taralalamma v Anjalala 2 M H C R 276, Kanhaya Lal v Puthicherry 7 W R 338 (F B) Jogendra Deb v Janindya Deb 14 M F A 307. In these rulings learned Judges specified what were judgments in rem in this country and what were not and the result was embodied in section 41 of the Indian Evidence Act'. Rahamat v Bibi Zulma 11 Ind Cas 480=14 P L 1912. For the sake of simplicity and in order to avoid the difficulty of defining or enumerating judgment in rem the legislature has adopted the statement of law in Su Bunes Peacock in Kanhayalal v Rudhacharan ubi supra—Report of the Select Committee. After discussing the history and theory of the judgment in rem Phillips J and Holloway J in Taralalamma v Anjalala 2 M H C R at page 288 observed: 'The result seems to be that the rule which makes a judgment conclusive only against the parties and those who claim under them is subject to certain exceptions which are offspring of positive law and that the reason for the exception may be generally stated to be both in English and in Indian Law, that the nature of the proceeding, by which the res is affected is such generally not unjust extension of parties renders it proper to use the judgment against those not formally parties. This decision was in the main approved of by Peacock C J in 7 W R 333 (F 1), see also the Shiva Ganga Case, 9 M I A 339, Almedbhoy v Tulbebhoy 6 B 703. This section is exhaustive as to judgments in rem Rahmat v Babu Zahra, 14 Ind Cas 486 = 14 P R 1912. Under this section only the final judgments of the Courts of Probate, Matrimony, Admiralty and Insolvency can have the operation of estoppels or conclusiveness against all the world as judgments in rem and in those cases alone all the world is thus supposed to be a party. Nort Es 214 Cunningham Es 187. The four classes of judgments, etc which alone are to be conclusive, affect, it will be observed the status of a person or thing (when that is relevant) either by (a) conclusively proving that such personal status accrued at the time of the judgment and confirmed it or (b) where the judgment, etc does not confer but simply declares the status—that such status accrued when the judgment, etc declares it so to have done, or (c) when the judgment, etc, takes away a personal status—that it ceased when the judgment declared that it ceased or should cease or (d) where the status is that of a thing—that the title to it accrued at the time when the judgment declares it did or should where the vesting is in future Nort Es 215, see also Radhakrishnan v M Gangabai 22 S L R 105 = 1928 Sind 121. Judgments declaratory of status, passed by a Court exercising any other jurisdiction, such as ordinary decrees declaratory of adoption or legitimacy will not be operative except against the parties to the judgment and their representatives as provided by section 40. Cun Es 187, see also Ujjan v Mathura A I R 1928 All 395. No judgment except passed by a Court in the exercise of Probate, Matrimonial, Admiralty or Insolvency jurisdiction upon any matters indicated in s 41 can have the effect of a judgment in rem and therefore a judgment holding that A is not the adopted son of B is not conclusive against the whole world. Ujjan v Mathura 26 A L J 197 = A I R 1928 A 395.

Probate Jurisdiction. The Courts in India exercise the Probate jurisdiction under Act XXXIX of 1925. But this section is applicable to probate granted to Hindus before the passing of the Hindu Wills Act (XXI of 1870). Grish Chandra v Droughton 14 C 801. In that case Tierclay J in delivering the judgment observed: 'Mr Dinwiddie contends that as the testator died before the Hindu Wills Act came into force and as the executor of the Will of a Hindu dying before that Act came into force was a mere manager having no title to the estate the probate neither conferred a legal character nor declared the executor to be entitled to any legal character. I have examined the cases which have been cited but I am of opinion that s 11 of the Evidence Act applies to this case. It is quite true that a Hindu executor was at any rate until the passing of the Hindu Wills Act only a manager, but as such manager he had certain powers over the estate, and for many purposes he represented the testator. It may be that the probate did not confer upon the executor any legal character, but I think that the effect of probate is to declare the person to whom probate is granted to be entitled to the powers of an executor, whatever his powers as such may be. The words 'legal character' are not anywhere defined but I think that it is quite clear that it is intended to include the case of an executor. The fact that this section has been frequently applied to cases of persons after the Hindu Wills Act came into force shows this. The only legal character which the Probate Court declares a person to be entitled to is that of executor. It confers the character of administrator. It does not declare it. So the section would be meaningless unless 'legal character' included the office of an executor. I do not think that the circumstance that in the particular case the powers of the executor may be limited, makes any difference in the construction of the section.'

The probate of a Will which is only granted after satisfactory evidence has been furnished to the Court of adequate capacity on the part of the testator or testamentary intention untroubled by fraud and of due execution (Jones v Goodrich 5 Moo P C 16) confers the title of executor, without which this character cannot be recognised and with which it cannot in general be impugned, in any Court. Trotter on Executor 74, 75. Allen v Dwyer, 3 T R 125. Keynes v Duke of Wellington, 9 Bery 579, Faulstich on Evidence, 9th Ed p 1352, Concha

v. Concha, 11 App Cas 511, Balgongadhar Tilak v. Sakurbari 96 B 197, Griffiths v. Hamilton, 12 Ves 298, Mormusi v. Dosabhai, 12 B 164, Barley v. Harris 18 L. J. Q. B. 115. The decision of a Probate division is a judgment in rem. Voel v. Wells, 1 Lees 235, Allen v. Dundas, 3 F. R. 120. A finding not essential to the judgment in the probate action cannot be said to operate as a finding in rem but all that is essential to the decision that the executor is entitled to probate must be taken to have been conclusively determined and therefore probate is conclusive proof of the due execution of the Will which is the foundation of the title of the executor. Chandreshwar v. Bisheshwar, A. I. R. 1977 Pat. 61 = 5 P. 777. But where a judgment operates as a judgment in rem—(a) the decision of a Probate Court does under section 41 of the Indian Evidence Act is not subject to collateral attack, while it remains in force, it is conclusive as to only on the persons who are parties to the judgment but upon all persons and all Courts. Such a judgment furnishes conclusive evidence of the point thereby decided not only against the parties who are the actual litigants in the case but against all others and unless it can be shown either that the Court had no jurisdiction, or that the judgment has been obtained by fraud or collusion or evidence can be admitted for the purpose of disproving the facts adjudicated upon. R v. Duchess of Kingston, 20 How. St. Tr. 544. See also Rababundya Yammam 79 Ind. Cas. 41, Komalto Charan v. Vithlun 4 C. 360, Mayho v. Williams 4 C. W. N. W. P. 268. In re Nilmony Singh, 6 C. 429. Manjanabai v. Ram Das 4 C. W. N. clxxvi. Chunra Sami v. Harharabarda, 16 M. 350, Jagan Nath v. Rampr 25 C. 354.

So the action of a Probate Court of competent jurisdiction when it admits a Will to probate or rejects it as not duly attested and executed is in the nature of a proceeding in rem and so long as the order remains in force it is conclusive as to the due execution and the validity of the Will. Saroda v. Gobindo 13 C. L. J. 91. But when an appeal has been preferred the matter ceases to be res judicata and becomes res sub judice in other words till the final order has been made by the Court of appeal either in affirmance or reversal of the decision of the original Court, there is no decree which operates as a judgment in rem under the section. Ibid.

The decision of a Probate Court cannot be impeached in the same or another Court by showing that the facts on which it immediately rests are false. But when these facts are themselves put directly in issue in a subsequent suit the judgment does not furnish conclusive evidence of their truth. However necessary it may have been for the Court proceeding in rem to have determined the question before it adjudicated upon the principal point. Barley v. Harris, 12 Q. B. 115. The fact that probate of the Will of a person or letters of administration to his estate have been granted is not prima facie proof of the fact that the person is dead. Thompson v. Donaldson 3 Esp. 63, Moons v. De Bernal 1 Ru. 501. French v. French 1 Dick. 268, but see Rilly v. Fitzgerald 6 Ir. Eq. R. 316. Again though a probate cannot be granted until the Probate Division be satisfied of the genuineness of the Will when granted, and though when granted the title of the executor cannot be impeached in a Court of law by showing that the Will was forged still if a party be indicted for forging the Will the probate will not be conclusive, if indeed it be prima facie evidence in favour of the defendant. Voel v. Wells 1 Lev. 235, R v. Buttery R. & R. 342, R v. Gibson, 51 L. J. 393. But in Manjanabai v. Empress 4 C. W. N. clxxvi it was held that it is for the Civil Court to find whether a Will is genuine, and it is not open to any Criminal Court to find to the contrary or convict any person of having forged that Will in the face of that finding by a competent Court. In the same case it was further held that this section provides that the finding of the Civil Court in such matters is conclusive. See also Field Esq 335.

An order granting letters of administration is conclusive proof of such facts when the legal character of the grantee is relevant, also such an order is conclusive proof that the legal character which it confers accrued at the time when such order or decree declares it to have occurred. But it does not operate as a bar to preclude the starting of criminal proceedings in a matter appearing in the case but which was not in issue in the proceeding relating to letters of administration. Mah Muthu v. Emperor, 4 Rang. 251 = 97 Ind. Cas. 1054 = A. I. R. 1976 Rang.

Neither would the production of a probate preclude a party from showing in a common law Court either that the testator was in and at the time when he executed the Will (Marriot v Marriot, 1 Str 671) or that his domicile was not then in England (Whitaker v Hume 7 II L C is 126, Bradford v Young L R 29 Ch D 606), provided the object of his evidence was not to impeach the title of the executor, in which case it would be inadmissible (Taylor on Ex 1433). But where the points were directly in issue and actually decided by the Court between the same parties or persons claiming under them the judgment in rem will be conclusive evidence of the matters decided in it (Spencer v Williams, 2 L R P & D 230=40 L J P & M 15). For instance, if, in a suit for administration, the sole question be, which of the two parties is next of kin to the intestate the sentence of the Probate Division declaring that as far as appears by the evidence, the defendant has proved himself next of kin and that administration be granted to him as such will be conclusive evidence of the relationship of the parties in a subsequent action between them for distribution, instituted in another Court (Barr v Jarlson 1 Phill 782 Bonhier v Taylor 4 Bro P C 703, Dughon v Crispin 3 L J P & M 129, Thomas v Kettle 1 Ves Sen 333). But the probate is conclusive as regards the due execution of the Will, the validity of the Will and the appointment of executor (Hammou v Bai Dhanbai, 12 L 161). But refusing of the grant is not conclusive (Ganesh v Ramchandria 21 B 563, Chunna Sam v Haridara 16 M 380). This question was considered in Raman Deb v Kumud Bandhu 14 C W N 924 and the Court delivering the judgment observed: "The judgment in a probate proceeding operates as a judgment in rem and, as has been repeatedly held, an application for probate of a Will is not subject to the law of limitation (Jire Ishan Chandra Roy 6 C 707). A probate proceeding, therefore while it enjoys the advantage of exemption from the law of limitation leads to a special result that a decision therein properly obtained operates as a judgment in rem though it is clear from the cases of Hammou v Mohendranath 20 C 888 and Ramanandani v Sicojanasau, 11 C L J 623 that questions of considerable nicety may arise as to the precise matter in respect of which such decision operates as a judgment in rem. It would not, in our opinion be right to apply to such a proceeding the provisions of section 103 (of Civil Procedure Code of 1882) which by their very terms are plainly intended to apply to suits for enforcement of cause of action. This view is supported by the decision of Ganesh v Ramchandria 21 B 563. In this case it was ruled that the refusal to grant probate does not conclusively show that the Will propounded is not the genuine Will of the testator and does not prevent the adjudication of the question in a subsequent proceeding in other words the judgment of a Court by which probate is refused does not necessarily operate as a judgment in rem in the same way as a judgment by which the probate is granted. No doubt, such a judgment if it declares that the Will is a forgery, or that it has not been duly executed by the testator with a sound disposing mind or that it has not been duly attested, may take away from the executor named in the Will the legal character of an executor and from the legatees and beneficiaries their legal character and this result may be final as against all persons interested under the Will, but every refusal to grant probate does not conclusively show that the Will propounded is not the genuine Will of the testator. The decision may be based upon entirely different ground, which do not touch the question of the genuineness of the Will. Such a judgment cannot operate conclusively unless it embodies a final decision against the genuineness of the Will. The learned Judges of the Bombay High Court while they lay down the proposition carefully guarded themselves, however against any expression of opinion upon the question whether, if an issue had been raised upon the question of forgery of the Will and had been decided the decision might not be conclusive. The true rule is thus formulated in the case of Schultz v Schultz 10 Gratt 358. "When a Will has been propounded by a party interested and fairly rejected on the merits it would defeat the policy of the law and be productive of many mischief, if it could be again propounded by the same party or by others who might be interested and the contest thus renewed from time to time. The sentence, therefore, against the Will must be regarded as a sentence against all claiming under it it stands upon a footing analogous to the cases known as judgments in rem, which being adjudications upon the matter are regarded as final and conclusive not only in the Courts in which they are pronounced but in all others in which the same question arises. It has been adjudication on the merits, whether the adjudication be for or against the validity of the Will, it is a final settlement of the matter and it cannot be collaterally attacked, impeached or avoided in the same or in any other Court by any of the parties thereto or by any person in privity with them, in other words a refusal to admit a Will to probate is conclusive of the facts necessary to support the decision. Freeman on Judgments Vol 1, section 319 (b). On the other hand if probate has been refused, not on the merits but merely by reason of the insufficiency of some matter of form or procedure there is no objection that the instrument is not entitled to probate, and, therefore it may again be propounded. Lilly v Iobbin 103 Missouri 477 = 23 Am St Rep 58. It is manifest therefore, that if the application by an executor for probate of a Will has been dismissed for default that fact by itself cannot deprive an applicant for probate by another person for example, a legatee who claims an interest under the Will if so, it would be futile to hold that an executor who has made default cannot propound the Will again. Ramani v Kunniul, 14 C W N 101. The finding as to the execution of the Will of the Probate Court binds as to the parties and privies to the probate proceeding. Chaveller v Bishewan A I R 1927 Pat 61.

A contentious probate proceedings must take the form of a suit in accordance with the provision of section 83 of the Probate and Administration Act, such proceedings constitute a suit within the meaning of section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code and therefore, the findings of fact of a Probate Court in such proceedings, that the testator was not of sound disposing mind when the alleged Will was made would operate as res judicata between the parties to the proceedings although the judgment in such proceeding would not be a final judgment such as is contemplated in section 41 of the Evidence Act inasmuch as such judgment does not confer upon or take away from any person any legal character. Kalyan Chand v Sitabai, 23 Ind Cn 132 = 16 Bom J R 309 (F B).

Under the provisions of the section a final judgment of a Probate Court granting probate is a judgment in rem and it is conclusive so far as the question relating to the genuineness and validity of the Will is concerned. Srinivas Ramoje, 5 Mys F J 107. See also Monmohun v Danga 31 C 367 = 9 C W N 197.

The expression 'legal character' in section 41 Evidence Act when it refers to a judgment of a Court of Probate means the status of an Administrator or Executor and that only though when it has reference to a Court of Probate it includes wifehood and widowhood, and a judgment of a Court of Probate is conclusive proof that the person to whom letters of probate have been granted has been clothed with the powers and the responsibilities of a deceased and of nothing else. M Agre v M Shene U B R. (1910) 11 Q 61 = 10 Ind Cn 987.

Where it is alleged that letters of administration have been wrongfully granted the proper course is to apply to the Court which granted the letters to revoke the same. The grant of letters of administration so long as it subsists is conclusive evidence as regards the proper evidence of the Will and the legal character conferred on the executor. Ditaph v Sauti A I R 1929 Lih 483.

Matrimonial jurisdiction. This section enacts that a final judgment of a competent Court in the exercise of matrimonial jurisdiction which confers or takes away from any person any legal character not as against any person but absolutely is relevant when the existence of any such legal character is relevant and is conclusive proof that any legal character which it takes away from any such person ceased at the time from which such character had ceased or should cease. Sita Debi v Gopal Saran A I R 1937 37 = 9 P I T 39. In India the Court exercises a matrimonial jurisdiction under the Indian Divorce Act (Act IV of 1869) Indian Christian Marriage Act (Act XX of 1872) Parsi Marriage and Divorce Act (Act XV of 1869) Native Marriage and Divorce Act (Act XXI of 1869) and Special Marriage Act (Act III of 1908).

A sentence of divorce has or may have a dual nature. A judgment of divorce is a decree in rem, so far as it finds the status of the parties by dissolving their matrimonial obligation. But so far as it disposes of any other than the marriage relation, it is in personam. Teem Judg 4th Ed 584. Kanhya Lal v Rudha Charan 7 W R 338. The English Courts have held that no foreign Court has power so far as any consequences in England are concerned to annul the marriage solemnized in England between English subjects. Briggs v Briggs 5 P D 163, Parry v Lindsay, 1 Dow 117, In re Wilson's Trusts 35 L J Ch 243. Decrees of the Divorce Court provided they alter status e.g., decrees of judicial separation, or for dissolution or nullity of marriage but not a judgment of adultery not followed by a decree, fall under the section. Philp Tr 363. Needham v Bremner L R 1 C P 583. Section 20 of the Indian Divorce Act IV of 1869 does not make the proviso in section 17 applicable to the confirmation by the High Court of a decree of nullity of marriage made by a District Judge and such a decree may therefore be confirmed before the expiration of six months from the pronouncement thereof. As among the proviso in section 17 to be applicable to a decree of nullity a decree by the High Court confirming the same before the six months period has expired cannot on that ground be treated as made by a Court not competent to make it, within the meaning of sections 11 and 44 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 and is therefore under section 11 conclusive proof that the marriage was null and void. Edward Custon v L H Custon 22 A 270 (F B). If a marriage between Mohammedans were set aside upon the ground of consanguinity or affinity or for instance in the case of a Mohammed in that the marriage was with the sister of another wife then living the decree could be conclusive that the marriage has been set aside and that the relationship of husband and wife had ceased if it existed but it would be no evidence against third parties for instance in a question of inheritance that the two ladies were sister. Per Peacock C J in Kanhya Lal v Rudha Charan, 7 W R 338 = B L R Sup Vol 662 (T B).

Admiralty jurisdiction. Adjudications on the subject of prizes or enforcement of maritime liens are among the judgments generally designated as judgments in rem. Wren v Dundas 3 Tarr Rep 125. So judgments in rem include judgments in Courts of Admiralty in cases of prize, bottomry, salvage, forfeiture or the like where the jurisdiction is founded on the actual or constructive possession of the subject matter. (Castrique v Imrie L R 4 H L 428) or maritime lien (Urania Craig v Chartered etc Bank, [1897] 1 Q B 160). Judgments in condemnation of property as forfeited are also judgments in rem. Geyer v Igulon T R 696.

Insolvency jurisdiction. As regards the jurisdiction of the High Courts to exercise insolvency jurisdiction vide Letters Patent of different High Courts, as well as the Presidency Town Insolvency Act (III of 1909). So far as the jurisdictions of municipal Courts are concerned vide the Provincial Insolvency Act (V of 1920). A judgment in bankruptcy proceedings has the effect, in England, of a judgment in rem, but this effect it owes to the Bankruptcy Act 46 & 47 Vict C 12 s 132(2) see also Ex parte Leicroyd. In re Lamb 10 Ch D 4. A creditor who has unsuccessfully opposed his debtor's application to be declared an insolvent on the ground that he had made fraudulent transfer of property cannot in a subsequent suit raise the plea that the transfers were fraudulent and void. He is barred by the previous decision which is as a judgment in rem under this section. Narayan v Handutta Lal 16 A L R 201. The decision of the Insolvency Court amounts to conclusive proof as to the title in respect of the specific things claimed by the applicant, not merely against him but absolutely within the meaning of this section. Pitaram v Jhaghar 33 Ind Cas 798 see also Mussamat v Mathura 40 Ind Cas 102. Bhawn v P C Dass 17 A L J 787.

Where A applied to the Bombay High Court to be declared an insolvent and a creditor of his unsuccessfully opposed the application on the ground that the debtor had made fraudulent transfers, the creditor is bound by the decision of the Bombay High Court and cannot in a subsequent suit filed in the Punjab Court raise the plea that the transfer of the property in suit was fraudulent and

An order of an Insolvency Court refusing to adjudicate a person insolvent on the ground that he was not a member of a firm which had been declared insolvent is not a final order which conferred upon him a legal character within the meaning of this section and hence it is not a judgment in rem. Judgments in other cases The decision of an issue as to the age of a minor in proceedings relating to the appointment of the guardian for person or property or both of such minor or in curatorship proceeding is not one of the judgments in rem enumerated in this section, which are declared conclusive against the world Hussain v Sahib Nisr 7 Ind Cas 505=86 P W R 1916 On an application for probate of a Will under the Probate and Administration Act 1881 which was opposed by the widow of the alleged testator and her father it appeared that an application has previously been made under the Guardians and Wards Act 1890 on behalf of the widow for a declaration that he was guardian of the person and property of the infant son of the alleged testator and that an application had been opposed by the present petitioners who claimed to be testamentary guardians of the property appointed by the Will and propounded and that the Will had been found to be a forgery. Held that the question of genuineness of the Will was not res judicata for the purpose of the proceedings under the Probate and Administration Act Chinnasami v Fatharaborda 16 M 330 A judgment of a Civil Court deciding a question of adoption is not admissible between third parties as evidence of the truth of the matters decided therein Gunn Mahadei v Jagatray 71 Ind Cas 999, 40 Lall v Radha Chinn 7 W R 333 Yasalamanna v Anna Kola 1924 M H C R 276

Value of judgment in rem in subsequent civil and criminal cases. Hester v Duchess of Kingston's Case 20 How St Tr 355, 537 the Duchess of Kingston was indicted and tried in the House of Lords for bigamy in marrying the Duke of Kingston in March, 1769 during the lifetime of her husband the Earl of Bristol. The Duchess pleaded that in a suit for prohibition of marriage brought against the Earl of Bristol in the Ecclesiastical Court, namely in the Court of the Bishop of London it had been decreed and declared in February 1769 that she was a spinster, and that the Earl of Bristol had wickedly and maliciously boasted and publicly asserted (though falsely) that they were married and contracted together in matrimony. It was objected that such declaration from the Ecclesiastical Court was not binding on the Crown, and did not extend to the Crown from proving that in fact there was a lawful marriage as alleged in the indictment. The decree on the grounds (1) that the crown was not a party to the proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court and (2) that the decree was obtained by the collusion of the parties to such proceedings. Sir William Dey Grey (in 1815) the unanimous opinion of the Judges) and 'A sentence of nullity and a sentence of affirmation of a marriage have been received as conclusive evidence on a question of legitimacy arising incidentally upon a claim to a peerage'. A sentence in a case of prohibition has been received upon a claim to a peerage as evidence against a marriage and in like manner in personal actions directly founded on a supposed marriage. But in these cases the evidence is not to the suits, or at least the parties against whom the evidence was received is not a party to the sentence and has acquiesced under it, or claimed its effect.

were parties and had acquiesced. But although the law stands thus with regard to civil suits, proceedings in matters of crime and especially of felony, fall under a different consideration first because the parties are not the same, for the King in whom the trust of prosecuting public offences is vested, and which is executed by his immediate orders, or in his name by some prosecutor, is not party to such proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court, and cannot be admitted to defend, examine witnesses, in any manner intervene or appeal, secondly, such doctrines would tend to give the Spiritual Courts which are not permitted to exercise any judicial cognizance in matters of crime an immediate influence in trials for offences and to draw the decision from the course of the common law, to which it solely and peculiarly belongs. But if a direct sentence upon the identical question in a matrimonial cause should be admitted as evidence, yet a case of perjury is of a different nature, it is ranked as a cause of defamation only. The sentence has only a negative and qualified effect viz., 'that the party has failed in his proof, and that the libellant is free from all matrimonial contract, as far as yet appears.' But it has been contended that this opinion of the Judges, when taken apart from the reasons on which it is founded, is not entitled to much weight, it being merely an obiter dictum unnecessary for the decision of the points submitted to them. 2 Smith L C 676, 677. In answer to the reasons, it is stated that nothing can be more inconvenient or dangerous than a conflict of decisions between different Courts and that, if judgments in rem are not regarded as binding upon all Courts alike, the most startling anomalies may occur. Taylor Et § 1680. But so far as section 41 of the Evidence Act is concerned, the finding of the Civil Court in such matters is conclusive. Manjanna v Ramdas 4 C W N clxxvi. But this section does not operate so as to preclude the stating of criminal proceedings on the matter appearing in the case but which was not in issue in the proceeding relating to Letters of Administration. Valu Nuthu v Servai, 4 Kang 251-97 Ind Cas 1044=A I R 1926 Rang 202 see also Oates v King Emperor, 38 C I J 183.

42 Judgments, orders or decrees other than those mentioned in section 41, are relevant if they relate to matters of a public nature relevant to the inquiry, but such judgments, orders or decrees are not conclusive proof of that which they state

Relevance and effect of judgments, orders or decrees other than those mentioned in section 41

A sues B for trespass on his land. B alleges the existence of a public right of way over the land, which A denies.

The existence of a decree in favour of the defendant, in a suit by A against C for a trespass on the same land, in which C alleged the existence of the same right of way, is relevant, but it is not conclusive proof that the right of way exists.

Scope of the section. This section admits all judgments not as res judicata, but as evidence although they may not be between the same parties provided they relate to matters of a public nature relevant to the enquiry. Per Garth C J in Gayy Lal v Fatteli Lal 6 C 171 (191) F B. So by this section judgments relating to matters of a public nature are declared relevant, whether between the same parties or not. Per Mitter J in ibid at p 174 see also Collector v Paluldhari 12 A 1 (F B). The reason for admitting such judgment is thus stated by Pontifex J in Gayy Lal v Fateh Lal at p 183. "In matters of public right the new party to the second proceeding as one of the public, has been virtually a party to the former proceeding and therefore he is properly excused. So decrees of competent Courts are good evidence in matters of public interest such as the existence of custom in succession in particular communities. Such decisions form an exception to the general rule which excludes res inter alios actae. Bai Baiy v Bai Santol, 20 B 53. "This section is the sum of Taylor's section 1496 (= § 1683)" Norton Et 226, see also Madhab Chandra v Tinnee Beulah, 7 W R 210. The law on the subject is thus stated

S 42 by Taylor "The exception just stated is allowed in favour of verdicts, judgments, and other adjudications upon subjects of a public nature (Mulholland v Kullen, L R 9 I q 471), such as customs (Reed v Jackson, 1 Fa t 37, Berry v Bunner, Pca R 156), prescriptions, tolls, boundaries between parishes, counties or manors (Discoe v Lomax, 8 A & I 193, Evans v Rees, 10 A & E 14, 153), rights of feyry (Pim v Curell, 6 M & W 234, Humphill v M Kenner, 1 R L R 13), liabilities to repair roads (R v St Pancras, Per R 940, P v Huntington, 1 E & B 501) or sea walls (R v Leigh 10 A & E 393) modes (Croughton v Blale 12 M & W 205) and the like. In all cases of this nature the evidence of reputation will be admissible, adjudications,—which for the purpose are regarded as a species of reputation—will all so be received and too, whether the parties in the second suit be those who litigated the first, or be utter strangers. The effect, however of the adjudication, when admitted, will so far vary, that, if the parties be the same in both suits, they will be bound by the previous judgment, but if the litigants in the second suit be strangers to the parties in the first, the judgment, though admissible, will not be conclusive. Reed v Jackson, 1 East 357, Croughton v Blale, 12 M & W 205. Even before the enactment of this section such judgments were held admissible in this country. Doorga v Narendra 6 W R 232, Madhab v Toorne, 7 W R 710. Totaram v Mohan 2 Agra 120, Venkata v Subba, 2 M H C 1.

Origin of the Rule It has often been said that verdicts of juries, and judgments, decrees, and orders of Courts of competent jurisdiction, are evidence of reputation, and possibly, when juries were summoned de vicineto, and were consequently assumed to be acquainted with the subject in controversy this may have been a correct mode of stating the ground on which verdicts were admitted. Taylor § 624. Thus in Reed v Jackson, 1 East 357, Laurence J said "Reputation would have been evidence as to the right of way in this case, a fortiori therefore the finding of twelve men upon their oaths." Now a days there is no possible justification of the admission of such evidence as an exception to the Hearsay Rule. Wigmore § 1593. Because "that was when the jury was summoned de vicineto and their functions were less limited than at present. Per Alderson B in Pim v Curell 6 M & W 254. So its allowance upto the early part of the 18th century was merely "a relic of the time when a jury verdict was a conclusion upon their own knowledge." Taylor Cas Et 429, Per Treat Et 90 ff, 163 ff. But in the modern practice neither the jury's verdict nor a judge's decree can well be regarded as a vehicle of reputation in any true sense. That its acceptance was anomalous practice came to be perceived in England in the middle of the last century it was half heartedly admitted as a 'sort of reputation'. In Discoe v Lomax 8 A & D 211 (1838) Littleton J said "It is not reputation but it is a good evidence as reputation." In the same case Patterson J said "Now it is certainly difficult to say that a verdict can be received merely as evidence of reputation, for a jury are summoned from the body of the country at large and are not themselves likely to know the matter. Yet where a matter has been before a jury, the verdict is generally given in evidence as a sort of reputation if I may, so term it. Similarly Coleridge J said "It is not precisely evidence of reputation." So whatever be the principle on which they are admitted, the rule has been established by too many authorities to be now questioned (Evans v Rees 10 A & F 156), that in all cases involving matters of public or general interest wherein reputation is evidence, a verdict or a judgment upon the matter directly in issue though pronounced in a cause litigated between strangers to the parties on the record is also admissible not as tending to prove any specific fact existing at the time but as evidence of the most solemn kind of an adjudication by a competent tribunal upon the state of facts and question of usage at the time. Per Lord Abinger in Pim v Curell, 6 M & W 266. Taylor § 624. No doubt a previous verdict or decree should properly have an evidential value but it is certainly not to be forced into evidence on the ground of reputation and this as an exception to the Hearsay Rule. Wigmore § 1593. In Neil v Duke of Devonshire 8 Ap, Case 147 which was decided in 1882 such evidence was again received not on the Reputation Exception to the Hearsay Rule but as a Verbal Act, already explained in notes under section 6 supra. In that case Sellborne L C said

"such evidence, admissible in cases in which evidence of reputation is received, is not in itself in any proper sense evidence of reputation. It really stands upon a higher and a larger principle, specially in cases, like the present, of prescription. It comes within the category of res gestae and of declarations accompanying acts. The effect of this evidence is extremely strong to establish a state of possession and enjoyment of the fisheries." In the same case Lord O'Hagan said "I think the proceedings were admissible, not as evidence of reputation, which I agree they are not, but of something higher and better than reputation. of the possession in fact at the time of the bills being filed of the several fishery. Evidence of acts, and proceedings with reference to the river generally—the leases, the covenants and reservations the actions, the judgments, the licences, and the successful assertions of right under the patents—was properly admitted." Lord Blackburn agreed that the Court's decree "is perhaps not properly evidence of reputation but as strong or stronger than reputation." In Rogers v Wood, 2 B & Ad 256 a decree of Court by certain Judges was excluded when offered as reputation. The Court observed "Here the persons acting as Judges had no knowledge of the fact except what they derived in the course of that proceeding." But see Duke of Newcastle v Braxlowe, 4 B & Ad 279 where Parke J said "Though they (Justices) are not proved to be residents in the county or hundred they must from the nature and character of their offices alone be presumed to have sufficient acquaintance with the subject to which their declarations relate." Similarly in Evans v Rees, 10 A & E 155 Denman L C J said "(The opinion of an arbitrator as to a boundary is) formed not upon his own knowledge as declarations used by way of reputation commonly are." But the sounder view appears to be that adjudications on particular cases are analogous to the presentations of particular acts in customary Courts and are to be regarded rather as res gestae or acts of ownership than as reputation. This is the view that has found most favour with the Courts (R v Brightside Bierlow 13 Q B 933) and it seems to receive some support from a recent case in which it was held that old depositions are not admissible under this head of evidence if they contain testimony only as to particular facts Mercer v Denme, (1904) 2 Ch 534, (1905) 2 Ch 538, Wills Est 234.

Cases in which judgments were held admissible where they relate to public matters. In the case of customary commoners, a verdict in an action for or against one is evidence for or against another claiming the same right Reed v Jackson, 1 Exet 357, see Petrie v Nuttal, 11 Ex R 569 Roscoe Est 192. So a verdict with regard to a public right of way Reed v Jackson 1 East 357. A judgment in favour of a lord of a manor on a quo warranto for usurping a franchise is evidence of the right even against copy holders of inheritance Carnarvon Earl of v Villebois, 13 M & W 313. In a suit for pre-emption based on custom evidence of decrees passed in favour of such a custom in suits in which it was alleged and denied is admissible evidence to prove its existence. The most satisfactory evidence of an enforcement of a custom is a final decree based on the custom Gudayal v Jhandu, 10 A 585, see also Lochman Rai v Akbar Khan, 1 A 449, Shimdhunath v Gayan Chand, 16 A 379 Harnath v Mundul 27 C 379 (391), Kalan Das v Bhagwathi, 6 A 47, Akbar Khan v Sheonarayana, 1 A 373 Sheoboran v Bhairu 7 A 880. Judicial decisions recognising the existence of a disputed custom amongst the Jains of one place are very relevant evidence of the existence of the same custom amongst the Jains of another place unless it is shown that the customs are different, and oral evidence of the same kind is equally admissible. There is nothing to limit the scope of the enquiry to the particular locality in which the person setting up the custom resides Harnath v Mandul, 27 C 379. A judgment of a High Court as to the transferability of similar tenure in an adjoining village of the same pergunnah is admissible as evidence of such usage under section 42 of the Act Dalglisch v Guzuffer 23 C 427. In a suit brought by the trustees of a temple to recover from the owners of certain lands in certain villages money claimed under an alleged right as due to the temple. Held that judgments in other suits against other persons in which claims under the same right have been decreed in favour of the trustees of the temple were relevant under s 42 of the

- S 43. Act as relating to matters of a public nature. Ramasami v Ipparu, 12 M 9. When the question as to the nature of interest of a certain family and a certain shrine was decided by a decree, that decree, though not operating as res judicata between the parties in a subsequent suit, is still admissible under this section to show that the disputed village forms part of the shrine. Sri Ganesh v Acharya, 15 B 625 (915), see also Kalishna v Secretary of State, 16 C 110 (183). The decisions as to the rate of rent in previous suits are admissible as evidence of local usage, though the tenants in the cases before them were not parties to them. Taswara Punga v Jana Chari 13 M 361. The fact that a settlement officer is important evidence of custom, but not conclusive proof of it. Lala v Hna Singh, 2 A 19. But proof of a custom whereby the zemundar of a village is entitled to one fourth of the purchase money when a house is sold in the village is not proof of similar custom in respect of sales in execution of decrees. Kahan Das v Bhagratu, 6 A 47 (F B).

In dealing with the estate of a particular family, the evidence given in litigations between members of that family which raise the question of caste and decisions of Courts as regards the caste of a family are relevant. If the judgment or evidence the recital in the judgment of the evidence is also relevant especially when the original depositions have been destroyed under rules of Court. Maharaja of Kohapur v S Sundaram, 18 M 1 = A I R 1925 Mad 49. A judgment is conclusive proof of its correctness. Gopi Sundari v Kherod, A I R 1941 Cal 191. Previous judgment is sometimes admissible against a stranger. Re Remarks made incidentally in judgment about another plot which was not the subject of the suit are not admissible. The proper way to prove it is to produce the witness who made it. Buntarilal v Sheochari, 8 Ind C 15 795 = A I R 1913 Lah 384. When a question of status is in issue, judgment and order between the parties in mutation cases, succession certificate cases, rent suit, partition, possession etc are admissible in evidence. They are of high evidentiary value and constitute proof sufficient to shift the burden. Jumilal v M H B, A I R 1924 Nag 397. It is well settled that, although a judgment not in issue between the parties may be used in evidence in certain circumstances as a fact in issue or a relevant fact, or possibly as a transaction, the recitals in the judgment cannot be used as evidence in a litigation between parties. Kashinath v Jagat Anand, 20 C W N 643 = 23 C L J 583 = 35 Ind Cas 298 see also Ram Rajya v Ram Nairam 23 C 533 (F C), Bhutto v Kesho Prosad, 1 C W N 263, 24 I A 10. Tepu v Rajani 25 C 52 = 2 C W N 501, Dinomoni v Brojendra 29 I A 24 = 6 C W N 386. Malcomson v O Dea, 10 H L C 593. Brick v Cormican 3 App Cas 641.

The defendants in a civil case for damage were tried and convicted by the Sessions Court at Faridkot of the murder of L and sentenced each to transportation for life, and after the expiry of about three years they were released (in conjunction with various other prisoners) at the time of the Imperial Darbar. The plaintiffs who were the minor sons of L, and L's brother, K, brought the present suit claiming damage. The judgment of the Faridkot Criminal Court was offered as evidence in the civil proceedings for proving that defendants caused the death of L. Held that such judgments were not admissible in evidence. Bishen Das v Ram Labhaya 106 P R 1915. The morbid interest of a section of the public in the details of a murder trial cannot constitute such trial a matter of a public nature within the meaning of section 42, and the judgment of the Faridkot Court is not therefore relevant as relating to a matter of public nature. Ibid.

(b) A prosecutes B for adultery with C, A's wife.

B denies that C is A's wife, but the Court convicts B of adultery.

Afterwards C is prosecuted for bigamy in marrying B during A's lifetime. C says that she never was A's wife.

The judgment against B is irrelevant as against C.

(c) A prosecutes B for stealing a cow from him. B is convicted.

A afterwards sues C for the cow, which B had sold to him before his conviction. As between A and C, the judgment against B is irrelevant.

(d) A has obtained a decree for the possession of land against B. C, B's son, murders A in consequence.

The existence of the judgment is relevant, as showing motive for a crime.

(e) A is charged with theft and with having been previously convicted of theft. The previous conviction is relevant as a fact in issue.

(f) A is tried for the murder of B. The fact that B prosecuted A for libel and that A was convicted and sentenced is relevant under section 8 as showing the motive for the fact in issue.

Principle. It is well settled that a judgment in personam is not admitted in a suit between strangers or a party and a stranger (except in a question of public or general interest). Though the above rule is well settled, the reasons of the rule are by no means clear. Such judgments when tendered against strangers are sometimes said to be excluded as opinion evidence. R v Fontaine (1804) 11 Q. B. D. 1028, sometimes as hearsay (Step 1st 14 Whart 820), though it has been objected to this view that even if the Judge were called as a witness he would not be competent either to pronounce or to prove his judgment, but more commonly on the ground expressed in the maxim res inter alios acta (or judicata alteri nocere non debet) it being considered unjust that a man should be affected, and still more that he should be bound by proceedings in which he could not make defence (examine or appeal). This however, though a legitimate ground for refusing conclusiveness to such judgments, seems no satisfactory reason for denying them admissibility since it is to be remembered that the objection of res inter alios acta will not suffice to exclude other and less solemn acts of strangers if relevant to the issue. Phip Er 3rd Ed 384. So where the instance of judgments, orders or decrees is a fact in issue or a relevant fact under some other provisions of the Act, the judgments, orders or decrees are not excluded.

Scope of the section. Section 40 deals with judgments which render the matter res judicata between the parties. Section 41 deals with judgments which are called by English lawyers as judgments in rem and which from their special character are conclusive against all the world, and section 42 deals with judgments which as relating to matters of a public nature are relevant though not conclusive, between strangers to the suit. This section contains the general rule of exclusion, namely that all other judgments are irrelevant. To this rule however there is a highly important limitation. A judgment though inadmissible for proving the truth of what it asserts may be valuable as evidence for some other purpose. Its very existence may be a fact in issue, and then of course evidence of it may be given. Or it may be a fact relevant within some one of the classes of relevant facts given in the Act and then, again, evidence of it can be given (rules 8, 11, 13, 54 expl (2)). Cunningham Er 190. So this section expressly contemplates cases in which judgments would be admissible under other sections of the Act, which are not admissible under s. 40, 41 or 42. So the cases referred to in this section are such as the section itself illustrates, viz., when the fact of any particular judgment having been given is a matter to be proved in the case. As for instance, if A sues B for slander, in saying that he had been convicted of forgery, and B justified upon the ground that the alleged slander was true, the conviction of A for forgery would be a fact to be proved by B like any other fact in the case, and quite irrespective of whether A had been actually guilty of the forgery or not. This would be one of the many cases alluded to in s 43. Per Garth C J in Gayy Lal v Fatch Lal, 6 C 192. Section 43 declares all judgments, orders or decrees, other than those specified in sections 40, 41, 42 to be irrelevant unless the existence of the judgment is itself a fact in issue or is relevant under some other section of the Act. Per Beaman J in Mahamad v Hasan, 31 B 143 (152). In Collector of Gorakhpur v Palakdhari 12 A 1 (25) F B, Shaugh J said "I do not think that in taking this view I am doing any violence to the language of s 43 of the Evidence Act, which if I understood it aright, declares that judgments, orders and decrees other than those mentioned in ss 40, 41 and 42 are of themselves irrelevant that is, in the sense that they can have any such effect or operation as mentioned in those recited sections qua judgments, orders and decrees, but I do not take this to make them absolutely inadmissible, when they are the best evidence of some thing that may be proved alunde." So a judgment or decree not inter partes is not admissible in evidence under this section unless as a fact in issue or as a relevant fact under other sections of the Evidence Act. Hilendra v Rameswar 87 Ind Crs 849=6 P L J 634=4 Pat 510=A 1 R 1925 Pat 625 see also Kashu Nath v Jagat Kishore 20 C W N 643=23 C L J 563=37 Ind Crs 298 see also Shan'ar Ganesh v Kesheo A 1 R 1930 N 1 (F B), Shanisunder v Ramhelawan A 1 R 1929 Pat 739.

Existence of judgment etc is a fact in issue—If the object of the judgment be merely to prove the existence of the judgment its date, or its legal consequences the production of the record, or the proof of an examined copy is conclusive evidence of the facts against all the world. This rests on the ground that a judgment is a public transaction of a solemn character, which must be presumed to be faithfully recorded. [Abinash v Parash 9 C W N 402 (410)] Therefore, if a party indicted for any offence has been acquitted, and sues the prosecutor for malicious prosecution, the record is conclusive evidence for the plaintiff to establish the fact of acquittal although the parties are necessarily not the same in the action as in the indictment (Legatt v Tolleray 14 E R 302), but it is no evidence whatever, that the defendant was the prosecutor even though his name appears on the back of the bill or of his malice or of want of probable cause (Parcell v Macnamara 9 East 361, Inclusion v Berry 1 Camp 203 N A, Aghore v Radhika, 14 W R 339, Keramati v Gholam 9 W R 77), and the defendant notwithstanding the verdict is still at liberty to prove the plaintiff's guilt. Taylor § 1667, but see Jaduban v Sheosaran 21 A 26. So a judgment against a master or principal for the negligence of his servant or agent, is conclusive evidence against the servant or agent of the fact that the master or principal has been compelled to pay the amount of damages awarded, but it was not evidence of the fact upon which it was founded, namely the misconduct of the servant or agent. Green v New River Co 4 T R 590, Pichard v Hitchcock 6 M & Gr 165 per Cresswell J, Tyler v Ulmer, 12 Mass 166, per Parley C J Taylor § 1667. "So a judgment recovered against a surety will be evidence for him to prove the amount which he has been compelled to pay for the principal debtor but it furnishes no proof whatever of his having been legally liable to pay the amount through the principal's default. King v Norman, 4 Com B 884. The same doctrine will apply to other cases where the party has a remedy over as for contribution, or the like. Pouell v Hayton, 2 N R 371. Kip v Biglan, 6 Johns 158. Griffin v Brown 2 Pick 304. In an action against a surety where the defence was that the plaintiff had received certain moneys from the principal in satisfaction of his damage, it was held that the plaintiff, on traversing this plea might put in evidence a judgment recovered from him by the assignee of the principal for the amount so received as money lent to their use not indeed as conclusive proof that the money had been paid to him by the principal in the way of fraudulent preference, but as showing that he had actually repud the money to the assignees, and as generally

Judgments, etc are admissible, meaning of The general principle is that the mere existence of a judgment its date and legal consequences, are conclusively proved, as against all the world by the production of the record, but that it furnishes no proof whatever of collateral facts even though, as between the parties to such judgments themselves, such facts must have been proved. The judgments in personam though generally binding upon the parties and privies thereto may be used as against third persons, for the purpose of proving conclusively against them, in the absence of fraud upon them the relationship between the parties and of the extent of the relation, though the judgments cannot be used in favour of such third person Abinash Chandra v Paresb Nath 9 C W N 402. #### 44 Any party to a suit or other proceeding may show that my judgment, order or decree which is Fraud or collusion in obtaining judgment relevant under section 40, 41 or 42, and or incompetency of which has been proved by the adverse party, Court, may be proved was delivered by a Court not competent to deliver it, or was obtained by fraud or collusion

Principle If a judgment be a direct and decisive sentence upon the point so long as it stands, it is to be admitted as conclusive evidence upon the Court and is not to be impeached from within yet like all other acts of the highest judicial authority it is impeachable from without, although it is not permitted to show that the Courts were mistaken, it may be shown that they were misled Fraud is an extrinsic, collateral act which vitiates the most solemn proceedings of Courts of Justice Lord Coke says it avoids all judicial acts, ecclesiastical or temporal Per Sir William De Grey in The Duchess of Kingston's Case 2 How St Tr 355, 357 The principle on which this section rests is thus stated by Lord Brougham in Bandan v Becher, 3 Cl & F 379 "It is said that the whole of these proceedings spring from a decree of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, and that that decree being pronounced by a Court of competent jurisdiction upon parties legally before it cannot now be questioned in another Court of co ordinate jurisdiction, but if brought into dispute at all should be brought into dispute in the Court where it was originally pronounced I agree generally to the proposition, but I must add to it, this one qualification, that you may at all times in a Court of competent jurisdiction—competent as to the subject matter of the suit itself—where you appear as an actor, object to a decree made in another Court upon which decree your adversary relies, and you may either as actor or defender object to the validity of that decree, provided it was pronounced through fraud contrivance or connivance of any description or not in a real suit, or if pronounced in a real and substantial suit between parties who were really not in contest with each other This rule has been embodied in the Indian Evidence Act Baratunissa v Farid Huss, 26 A 262 (283) So under this section the defendant is entitled to show that the decree is obtained by fraud Ibid see also Hara Krishna v Ramesh, 62 Ind Cas 962=6 P L J 373

Scope of the section When one of the parties to a suit tenders or has put in evidence a judgment etc., under section 40 41 or 42, it is open to the other party under this section to void its effect on either of two grounds, (a) want of jurisdiction in the Court which delivered the judgment, (b) that the judgment was obtained through fraud or collusion Lord D 218. Section 44 lays down that any party to a suit or other proceedings may show that any judgment, order or decree which is relevant under s 40, 41 or 42, and which has been proved by the adverse party, was delivered by a Court not competent to deliver it or was obtained by fraud or collusion Prayag Kumari v Siva Prasad 93 Ind Cas 335=A I R 1926 Cal 1=42 C L J 280 (428) This section was construed by Unclean C I and Banerjee J in the case of Rajib

S 44 Pandey v Lakham Sindh, 27 C 11=3 C W N 660 and it was held that a party to a suit can show that a decree obtained by the opposite party against him in another suit was obtained by fraud and it is not necessary for him to bring an independent suit for setting it aside. See also Ahmedbhai v Vallubhai, 6 B 703 Manchha Ram v Kalidas, 19 B 821 Nistaram Dass v Nundo Lal Bose, 30 C 369=7 C W N 353. When a decree which has been obtained by fraud is sought to be used against a person, he is entitled to show the true nature of the decree, notwithstanding the fact that he has not previously taken steps for cancellation of the decree. But where he is a party to the decree and the materials on the record show that he did subsequently act in accordance with the decree, he cannot be permitted to challenge the decree unless he sets out specifically the circumstances which constituted the alleged fraud on him and on the Court. Pulin v Satya Chavan, 73 Ind Crs 548. "This section provides that any party to a suit or other proceeding may show that any judgment, order or decree which is relevant under section 40, 41 or 42 and which has been proved by the adverse party was delivered by a Court not competent to deliver it or was obtained by fraud or collusion. The application of this rule it will be observed, is limited only to cases in which a decree is treated as relevant under section 40, 41 or 42 of the Indian Evidence Act. None of these sections has any application to execution proceedings. Section 40 deals with the question of relevancy of a judgment, order or decree as barring a second suit or trial. Section 41 relates to the relevancy of a judgment in rem while section 42 deals with the question of relevancy and effect of judgments relating to matters of a public nature. When however, an application is made for execution of a decree, the execution proceeding is a continuation of the suit, it is incumbent upon the Court to execute the decree because it is the duty of the Court to give to the successful party the fruits of the litigation. Consequently the principle which underlies the cases of Rajub v Lohhan, 27 C 11 and Nistaram v Nundo 26 C 891 has no application to proceedings in execution of decrees." Bisua Nath v Bhagwandin 14 C L J 648, per Moolraj J. Section 44 is applicable not only where a previous judgment is attacked on the ground of fraud or collusion but also where it is alleged to have been obtained owing to the gross negligence of the guardian of the person disputing it. Karri Bahanna v Sundari Yerramma, 74 Ind Crs 218=18 L W 49=45 M L J 924=A I R 1923 Mad 718=33 M L T 46. The principle laid down in section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code is substantially modified by the provisions of s 44 of the Indian Evidence Act and the principle of res judicata does not operate in the case of a decree obtained by fraud. Sri Radha Krishan v Hajul Ali Khan, 19 O C 334=36 Ind Cas 746 see also Isrum Kumar v Banamiah, 21 C W N 594. This section lays down not only a rule of law relating to evidence but also a rule of procedure. Rajub v Lakhan, 27 C 11=3 C W N 660. Section 44 of the Evidence Act does not purport to enumerate the grounds on which a decree can be attacked by a separate suit. Shamu Nath v Ramya, 9 A L J 1=13 Ind Cas 80=31 A 113. A consent decree will, except in the case of fraud and collusion, be binding on all parties thereto so long as it subsists. A party to such a decree cannot escape from its effects merely by the plea that his consent thereto was given by his plunder in excess of his authority. The exceptional case of fraud or collusion will have to be specifically alleged and substantiated by the party setting it up. Balanthia v Mohendra, 1 C L J 6. To set aside a decree on the ground of fraud it is not sufficient to prove constructive fraud but an actual positive fraud is meditated and intentional contrivance to keep the parties and the Court in ignorance of the real facts and obtaining a decree by that contrivance. Lishen Singh v Wasawa Singh 92 Ind Cas 317=A I R 1926 Irb 177. Not competent The words "not competent" in this section refer to a Court acting without jurisdiction Kethilamma v Kelappan, 12 M 229 (230) "Jurisdiction may be defined to be the power of a Court to hear and determine a cause, to adjudicate or exercise any judicial power in relation to it, in other words by jurisdiction is meant the authority which a Court has to decide matters that are litigated before it or to take cognizance of matters presented in a formal way for its decision" Per Moolerjee J in Hriday Nath v Ramchandra, 24 C W N 723 (F B) at p 732=31 C L J 482, see also Sukhlal v Tara Chand, 33 C 68(71)=9 C W N 1046 F B An examination of the cases in the books discloses numerous attempts to define the term "jurisdiction", which has been stated to be "the power to hear and determine issues of law and fact," "the authority by which judicial officers take cognizance of and decide causes," "the authority to hear and decide a legal controversy," "the power to enquire into the facts, to apply the law to pronounce the judgment and to carry it into execution" Hriday Nath v Ramchandra, ubi supra see also Ishutosh v Behary Lal 35 C 61=11 C W N 1011, Charagudi v Vanadaraya, 36 C 193 This jurisdiction of the Court may be qualified or restricted by a variety of circumstances Thus, the jurisdiction may have to be considered with reference to place, value, and nature of the subject matter The power of a tribunal may be exercised within defined territorial limits Its cognizance may be restricted to subject matters of prescribed value It may be competent to deal with controversies of a specified character for instance testamentary or matrimonial causes, acquisition of lands for public purposes record of rights as between landlords and tenants This classification into territorial jurisdiction, pecuniary jurisdiction and jurisdiction of the subject matter is obviously of a fundamental character Per Moolerjee J in Hriday Nath v Ramchandra 24 C W N 723 at p 732 A judgment pronounced by a Court without jurisdiction is void Ibid When a decree is void and a nullity it is not only the duty of the Court which passed it to ignore it but of every Court to which it is presented Kunja Mohan v Manundia Chandra, 27 C W N 542 So where the decree presented for execution was made by a Court which apparently had no jurisdiction, whether pecuniary or territorial or in respect of the judgment debtor's person to make the decree, the executing Court is entitled to refuse to execute it on the ground that it was made without jurisdiction Gora Chand Haddai v Profulla Kumar Roy, 42 C L J 1 (F B) Jungli Lal v Laddu Ram 4 Pat L J 240 (F B), Imdad Ali v Jagan Lal, 17 A 478, Haji Musa v Purnanand, 15 B 216, Y Subramania v Yanikmathu 38 M 682, Roop Narain v Ramayee Singh 3 C L R 192 Laxendia v Gopal 17 C L J 634 One must be careful to distinguish exercise of jurisdiction from existence of jurisdiction for fundamentally different are the consequences of failure to comply with statutory requirements in the assumption and in the exercise of jurisdiction The authority to decide a cause at all and not the decision rendered therein is what makes up jurisdiction and when there is jurisdiction of a person and subject matter the decision of all other questions arising in the case is but an exercise of that jurisdiction Since jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine, it does not depend either upon the regularity of the exercise of that power or upon the correctness of the decision pronounced for the power to decide necessarily carries with it the power to decide wrongly as well as rightly Hriday Nath v Ramchandra, 24 C W N 723=31 C L J 482 In Utharkarjun v Narayan 27 I A 46=25 B 337 (347)=5 C W N 10 Lord Hobhouse said "A Court has jurisdiction to decide wrong as well as right If it decides wrong, the wronged party can only take the course prescribed by law for setting matters right, and if that course is not taken, the decision, however wrong cannot be disturbed See also Ramesh Chandra v Moomay 45 C L J 24

The plea of res judicata can be satisfactorily met by showing that the judgment, in which the issues pleaded were decided was delivered by a Court not competent to deliver it If the Court was incompetent this would be a complete answer under this section of the Evidence Act Abdul v Kadir 37 B 563 (569)=15 Bom L R 672 In Sardar Mal v Aramayal, 21 B 205, it

S 44 is contended that the order of adjudication of the Madras Insolvent Court upon which the vesting order was based was delivered by a Court not competent to deliver it within the meaning of section 44 of the Evidence Act. The objection was based on the contention that the creditor's petition in the Madras Court disclosed no act of insolvency which could legally justify an adjudication under section 9 of the Indian Insolvent Act, Stat 11 & 12 Vict C 21. In delivering the judgment Stachey J observed. It appears to me that this argument ignores the distinction between an order which a Court is not competent to pass and an order which even if erroneous in law or in fact, is within the Court's competency. To sustain in objection that the Madras Insolvent Court's order is a nullity conferring no title to the debtor's estate on the Official Assignee, it is obviously not sufficient to prove that the order was wrong. To hold otherwise would virtually erect into a Court of appeal from the Insolvent Court, not only this Court but every Court in which the Official Assignee might sue or be sued and would be inconsistent with section 41 as well as section 44 of the Evidence Act. What, then is the test of whether an order of adjudication in this case was not merely wrong but an order which the Insolvent Court was not competent to make? In Kethamma v Kalappan, 12 M 228 it was held that the words not competent in section 44 referred to a Court acting without jurisdiction and that the decree of a Court in a suit which should have been dismissed as barred by section 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure though wrong, could not be treated as passed by a Court not competent to pass it. In article 46 of Sir James Stephen's Digest of the Law of Evidence, the rule of English law corresponding with section 44 of the Indian Evidence Act is stated to be that whenever a judgment is offered as evidence the party against whom it is so offered may prove that the Court which gave it had no jurisdiction. The 'competency of a Court and its jurisdiction are thus synonymous terms. They do mean in the right of a Court to adjudicate in a given matter. They do not mean, in a case where that right exists the coming to a correct conclusion upon any question of law or fact arising in that matter'. See also Ex parte Coates, 5 Ch D 940, Britain v Kennard 1 Br & Bng 432. The competency of a Court does not depend on whether a point which it decides has been raised or argued by party or by counsel. It cannot be said that whenever a decision is wrong in law or violates a rule of procedure the Court must be held incompetent to deliver it. It has never been and could not be held that a Court which erroneously decrees a suit which it should have dismissed as time barred or barred by the rule of res judicata acts without jurisdiction and is not competent to deliver its decree. Vile Woodroffe Et 2nd Ed p 379, 8th Ed p 413 cited with approval in Nathu Ram v Kalia Das 26 A J22 (526)=1 A L J 217=24 A W N 110. The above statement of law is in the main founded on the elaborate judgment of the late Chief Justice Sir Arthur Stacey in the case of Caston v Caston, 22 A 270.

Although a Court cannot set aside the proceedings of another Court for want of jurisdiction, yet when a matter arises before a Court in the ordinary course of its jurisdiction, and one of the parties relies on, or seeks to protect himself by the proceedings of another Court then in that way the jurisdiction of the Court whose proceedings are pleaded may be enquired into. Ganesh Patro v Ram Nulker, 22 W R 361 see also Golab v Choudhury 2 C L J 781=9 C W N 956 Kalka Prasad v Kanappa Tal 7 N W P 99 Pearry v Secy of State 39 C L J 451 (458) Sukhrum v Goudy 19 W R 281. A decision in a previous execution proceeding which merely lays down what the law is and is found to be erroneous cannot have the force of res judicata in a subsequent proceeding for a different relief. May Nath v Padmanand Singh 39 C 818. Section 20 of the Indian Divorce Act No IV of 1869 does not make the provision in section 17 applicable to the confirmation by the High Court of a decree of nullity of marriage made by a District Judge and such a decree may therefore be confirmed before the expiration of six months from the pronouncing thereof. Assuming the provision in section 17 to be applicable to a decree of nullity a decree by the High Court confirming the same before the six months period has expired cannot on that ground be treated as made by a Court not competent to make it, within the meaning of sections 11 and 44 of the Indian

Evidence Act and therefore under section 41 conclusive proof that the marriage was null and void Fiduaud Caston v L H Caston, 22 A 271 (F B) S 4

Fraud, meaning of "Fraus et jura non quam co habitant," (Fraud and justice never dwell together) says Lord Coke. It vitates the most solemn proceedings of Courts of Justice says Lord De Grey C J in the Duchess of Kingston's case 20 How St Tr 355. It vitiates all judicial acts, ecclesiastical or temporal, Ibid, see also Sheldien v Patrucl, 1 Macq 535. But the difficulty is that no definition is given in the Act of the word 'fraud'. This section provides that any party to a suit may show that any judgment was obtained by fraud. It is clear says Martin C J in Bhalaji v Balwant, A I R 1927 Bom 510 = 29 Bom L R 1046, that some limitation must be put upon that section. For instance if party A, and his witnesses in a particular suit came into the box and committed deliberate perjury on material points, that is clearly fraud. On the other hand if a decree is eventually passed in favour of that party, even on the perjured evidence it cannot be open to the opponent to start a new action on exactly the same evidence on the sole allegation that the previous evidence was wrongfully believed by the Court. If that were so, there would be an end to the doctrine of res judicata. There could be no finality in litigation because either party might alternately bring the cross actions with varied results ad infinitum. Consequently the authorities show, I think, that if the case merely turns on, in effect a rehearing of the previous suit on substantially the same evidence, then the Court will not hear the second suit. On the other hand it is to my mind clear that in a proper case the Court has jurisdiction to set aside a decree which has been obtained by fraud practised on the Court. If, for instance the existence of certain evidence has been stoutly denied by one party and the Court has been induced to frame its decree on the basis that that evidence did not exist then, if that evidence is afterwards discovered and it is of such a nature that if it had been before the first Court, the probabilities are that the Court would have arrived at a different conclusion then, it may be when all the circumstances are looked at that in that case the Court would set aside the original decree.

In Nanda Kumar v Ram Jiban, 41 C 99 = 19 C L J 457 = 23 Ind Cas 337 = 19 C W N 681 at p 687 Jenkins C J said "The jurisdiction to impugn a previous decree for fraud is beyond question it is recognised by section 44 of the Evidence Act and is confirmed by a long line of authority. But it is a jurisdiction to be exercised with care and reserve for it would be highly detrimental to encourage the idea in litigants that the final judgment in a suit is to be merely a prelude to further litigation. The fraud used in obtaining the decree being the principal point in issue, it is necessary to establish it by proof before the propriety of the prior decree can be investigated. Decrees may be (1) by consent, (2) ex parte or (3) after contest apparent or real and though each is liable to be attacked for fraud, the character of the fraud would vary with the circumstances of each case. One who seeks to impugn a decree passed after contest takes on him self a very heavy burden and it is not satisfied by merely inducing the Court to come to the conclusion that the appreciation of the evidence and the ultimate decision in the former suit was erroneous. A prior judgment, it has been said, cannot be upset on a mere allegation of fraud or collusion it must be shown how where, and in what way, the fraud was committed." See also Sheldien v Patrucl, 1 Macq 539. "The fraud must be actual positive fraud, a meditated and intentional contrivance to keep the parties and the Court in ignorance of the real facts of the case and obtaining that decree by that contrivance." Per Sir John Roll, L J in Patch v Ward L R 3 Cb App 203. Although it is not permitted to show that the Court was mistaken, it may be shown that it was misled. Per Lord De Grey in The Duchess of Kingston's Case, 20 How St Tr 544. Lord Selborne quoted this dictum around law in Ochtenbun v Papeler, L R 8 Ch App 695 at p 698. So also in Illyatt v Palmer (1899) 2 Q B 106 = 68 L J Q B 709 Lord Lindley said at p 110. As a general proposition I think it dangerous and undesirable to summarily stop an action to set aside a judgment on the ground that it has been obtained by fraud. So the fraud contemplated under this section must be a fraud practised on the Courts below. Ryquant Prasad v Mahant Ram, 17 Bom

S 44 L R 754=37 A 485=42 J A 171 P C So the fraud must not consist in the fact of a fraudulent defence having been set up, it must be fraud in procuring the judgment, such as collusion or the like between the parties, or fraud in the Court itself Cumell v Seuell, 4 Jun N S 798. Thus it may be shown that the seal of a Court has been forged Noel v Mills, Nott 219. The fraud clearly as it seems to me, must be actual fraud, such that there is on the part of the person chargeable with it the malus animus, the mala mens, putting itself in motion and acting in order to take an undue advantage of some other person for the purpose of actually and knowingly defrauding him. I apprehend the fraud, must be fraud which you can explain and define upon the face of a decree, and that mere irregularity or the insisting upon right which, upon a due investigation of the right might be found to be overstated or overestimated, is not the kind of fraud which will authorise the Court to set aside a solemn decision which has assumed the form of a decree signed and enrolled' Per Lord Cairns L J in Patch v Ward, L R 3 Ch 203, see also Chen v Johnston 2 Sch & Lef 305.

In Fauler v Lloyd, L R 10 Ch D 327 decided on appeal by James, Baygally and Thesiger L JJ, the suit was dismissed on the ground that the fraud was not proved, but James L J on his own behalf and that of Thesiger L J said 'Assuming all the alleged falsehood and fraud to have been substantiated is such a suit as the present sustainable? That question would require very grave consideration indeed before it is answered in the affirmative. Where is litigation to end if a judgment obtained in an action brought out adversely between two litigants en juris and at arm's length could be set aside by a fresh action on the ground that perjury had been given to interrogatories or a misleading production of documents, or of a machine or of a process had been given? There are hundreds of actions tried every year in which the evidence is irreconcilably conflicting and must be on one side or other wilfully and corruptly perjured. In this case if the plaintiffs had sustained on this appeal the judgment in their favour the present defendants, in their turn, might bring a fresh action to set that judgment aside on the ground of perjury of the principal witness and subornation of perjury, and so the parties might go on alternately ad infinitum. There is no distinction in principle between the old common law action and the old chancery suit and the Court ought to pause long before it establishes a precedent which would or might make in numberless cases judgments supposed to be final only the commencement of a new series of actions. Perjuries falsehoods frauds, when detected, must be punished and punished severely but in their desire to prevent parties litigant from obtaining any benefit from such foul means the Court must not forget the evils which may arise from opening such new sources of litigation amongst such evils not the least being that it would be certain to multiply indefinitely the mass of those very perjuries falsehoods and fraud.' In the same case Baygally L J and

I desire to reserve for myself the opportunity of fully considering the question how far regard to general principles and authority it would be proper to deal with cases if and when any such shall arise in which it shall be clearly proved that a judgment has been obtained by the fraud of one of the parties, which judgment but for such fraud would have been in favour of the other. The observations which were obiter dicta were cited by Petheram G J in Mahomed Gollah v Mahomed Solihman 21 C 612. He then continued at p. 619 'The principle upon which these decisions rest is that where a decree has been obtained by a fraud practised upon the other side by which he was prevented from placing his case before the tribunal which was called upon to adjudicate upon it in the way most to his advantage the decree is not binding upon him and that the decree may be set aside by a Court of Justice in a separate suit and not by an application made in the suit in which the decree was passed to the Court by which it was passed but I am not aware that it has ever been suggested in any decided case and in my opinion it is not the law that because a person against whom a decree has been passed alleges that it is wrong and that it was obtained by perjury committed by or at the instance of the other party which is of course fraud of the worst kind, that he can obtain a rehearing of the question in dispute in a fresh action by merely changing the form in which he places it before the Court, and alleging in his plaint that the first decree was obtained by the perjury of the person in whose favour it was given. To so hold would be to allow defeated litigants to avoid the operation, not only of the law which regulates appeals, but that of that which relates to res judicata as well." The observations of Su Comer Petheram in the above case were mere obiter dicta. But the view his Lordship expressed was cited and acted upon in Abdul Huq v. Abdul Hafer, 14 C W N 695, Munshi Musaful Huq v. Suendia Nath, 16 C W N 1002, Nanda Goomai v. Ramyiban, 18 C W N 681, Nahni v. Hari, 29 C W N 325, Sarat Kumari v. Mecher, 29 C W N 11, Muktamala v. Ramcharan, 31 C W N 258 contra, Lakshmi Churn v. Nao Ali, 38 C 936=15 C W N 1010 Tenkatappa v. Subba, 29 M 179.

A Division Bench of the Madras High Court has in Tenkatappa v. Subba, 29 M 179, taken a contrary view and ruled that a suit lies to set aside a judgment on the ground that the defendant had obtained it by fraud in that he had committed deliberate perjury and suppressed evidence. The learned Judges (Bodham and Moore JJ) there declare that the law in England has been authoritatively and finally laid down in Aboucoff v. Oppenheimer, L R 10 Q B D 295 and Tadala v. Laure, L R 25 Q B D 310, and that it is the same in India. "With all deference, be it said, we doubt the completeness and finality, even in England, of these two cases. They are, of course, very high authorities but in each of them the judgment impeached is a foreign judgment and foreign judgments unquestionably stand on a footing of their own." Priestman v. Thomas, 9 P D 210 and Cole v. Langford, L R (1898) 2 Q B 36, are the only English cases we know of which at all support the Appellant. Munshi Musaful v. Suendia Nath, 16 C W N 1002 (1004). In Baker v. Wordsworth 67 L J Q B D 301 Ilright and Darling JJ held that a judgment in an action could not be set aside on a subsequent action brought for that purpose on mere proof that the judgment was obtained by perjury on the part of the plaintiff in the former action.

In Manvdranath v. Hari Mandal, 24 C W N 133, Mr Justice Chatterjee laid down the following rules, with respect to the question as to what constitutes fraud for which a decree can be set aside: "the first is that although it is not permitted to show that the Court (in the former suit) was mistaken, it may be shown that it was misled, in other words where the Court has been intentionally misled by the fraud of a party, and a fraud has been committed upon the Court with the intention to procure its judgment, it will vitiate its judgment. The second is that a decree cannot be set aside merely on the ground that it has been procured by perjured evidence. See also Sarat Kumari v. Mecher Mollah 29 C W N 11. In Muktamala v. Ram Chandra 31 C W N 258, Mr B B Ghosh J said: "As all the recent cases which I have already cited have followed the previous decision of Su Comer Petheram in the case of Mohammad Golab v. Mohammad Sulliman 21 C 612, I do not think that it is at all necessary to refer this question for the decision of a Full Bench. It is also not possible to define the grounds upon which fraud can be found for which a plaintiff may be entitled to bring a suit for setting aside a decree. The only thing that can be definitely laid down is that the mere allegation that a previous decree had been obtained upon perjured evidence is not a ground on which a previous decree can be impeached."

In Ram Narain Lal v. Tooki Sao, 5 P L J 20=1 P L J 110=(1920) Pat 93=58 Ind Crs 192 the Court observed: "I do not at all agree with the view that the test is whether the original suit was a false suit. The test, in my view, is whether there was a fraud practised in relation to the proceedings in Court by which the defendant in the original action was prevented from placing his case before the Court. Until this is found the Court, in my judgment has not arrived at the stage when it can investigate the question whether the original suit was a false suit or not." A person not actual party to the fraud may set up fraud as an answer to a decree either of an English or any foreign Court. Sri Rangammal v. Sandammal 23 M 216, Astarini Das v. Vando Lal, 3 C W N 670 Cole v. Langford, (1898) 2 Q B 36, Pulni v. Satya, 70 Ind Crs 548.

Instances of fraud in Probate Case Section 44 provides that any judgment, order or decree which is relevant under section 40, 41 or 42 may be shown by any party to a suit or other proceeding to have been obtained by fraud and section 41 includes a final judgment, order or decree of a competent Court in the exercise of probate jurisdiction. But in Komolothun v Nibuthum, 4 C 360 Markby J states at p 362 that the grant of probate is the decree of a Court which no other Court can set aside except for fraud or want of jurisdiction. These remarks were not necessary for the purposes of his decision as he states that fraud was not alleged in the case. At page 363 he sets out the confusion that would arise if after probate is granted the validity of a Will could be questioned in a civil suit and quotes some apposite remarks in a decision of the Allahabad High Court in Mayho v Williams, 2 N W P H 265 (274), see also Ambica Churu v Kala Chand, 10 C W N 422. In Allen v Macpherson, 1 H L C 191, (decided in 1847 at a time when grants issued from the Ecclesiastical Courts) the House of Lords held by a majority that where a grant of probate had issued from the Prerogative Court, the Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction to decide that a codicil had been obtained by fraud. See also Melnish v Milton, L R 3 Ch D 27. In In re Henry Hankin v Finner L R 10 Ch D 372, letters of administration had been granted to the defendant out of the Probate Division as the natural and lawful brother of the half blood of the intestate and the plaintiff sued in the Chancery Division for administration of the estate alleging that the defendant was illegitimate and that he was not next of kin and that as long as the letters of administration remained in force they were exclusive evidence that the defendant was one of the next of kin and that the plaintiff's proper course of procedure was to apply in the Probate Division to have them recalled. The Court says: 'If he (the defendant) was not the next of kin the Probate Division has been deceived and the application must be made to that Court to revoke its grant. It can only grant administration to the next of kin and if the party applying is not the next of kin the Court has no power to grant it to him, although so long as the letters remain they are binding upon this and every other Court. I do not think that that is now in issue. I do not say that it is not competent for this Court to try the matter since the Judicature Act but the Probate Division is certainly the proper Division in which to try it. In Priestman v Thomas, L R 9 P D 210 at p 214 Cotton L J said: 'Although the Chancery Division has no jurisdiction to revoke the Probate of the Will it has full jurisdiction to decide that it was a forgery.' Raf Shab v Srimati 25 C W N 207-62 Ind Cas 448. 'Having regard to the wide terms of section 41 of the Evidence Act, it is not possible to say that it is not open to a Court other than the Court from which a grant has issued in cases of fraud or collusion to deal with the matter and decide whether the grant has been obtained by fraud or collusion. I think however that in such cases, and where it is open to the party alleging fraud to apply to the Court from which the grant issued, that the better course would be to say the suit to enable an application to be made to revoke that grant. It is manifestly inconvenient that a Court which has no jurisdiction to recall or revoke the grant should deal with the matter when it can be dealt with in a Court which is both competent to pronounce on the fraud and if necessary to revoke the grant. Ibid

Fraud—Instances of Where the plaintiff in an ejectment suit relies on his title as a purchaser in a Court auction it is open to the defendants in possession of property to show that such purchase was procured by fraud and therefore passed no title to the plaintiff. Guanmar v Krishna Aiyar 23 Ind Cas 1. The plaintiff, an executor under a Will applied to the District Court for probate of the Will. The defendant No 2 a relative of the testator filed a caveat contending that the Will was a forgery. An arrangement was then arrived at between the parties under which in consideration of the withdrawal of the opposition by defendant No 2 to the grant of probate the plaintiff agreed to restore the property of the deceased to him (the second defendant) or to pay the equivalent in cash directly the probate had been granted. The probate was accordingly granted to the plaintiff but he failed to carry out the agreement. The defendant No 2 then applied to the District Court for revocation of the probate, on the ground that in declining to carry out his part of the arrangement the plaintiff had committed a fraud on the one hand upon the Court and on the other on him (the second defendant). The Court rejected the application on the ground that the second defendant on his own showing was a party to a fraud upon the Court and that he had not come to the Court with clean hands. The plaintiff must file a suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge to recover possession of a field belonging to the testator from defendant No 1 who was a tenant of the testator. Both the defendants contended that the Will was a forgery and the grant of probate was induced by fraud. Held that the second defendant was barred by the decision of the District Court in the revocation matter from raising again the question in the Court of the Subordinate Judge. I further held that as regards the first defendant the title of the plaintiff was conclusively proved by the production of the probate in the Subordinate Judge's Court which had no jurisdiction to deal with the question of probate and that it was no valid defence on the part of the first defendant to join in the allegation of the defendant that the Will was a forgery and that the probate had been obtained by fraud and deception. Arshobhar v Ranchhodan, 38 B 427 = 16 Bom L R 459. In delivering the judgment the Court made the observations: "As regards the first defendant, he does not raise these questions by his pleading, although he has made a common cause with the second defendant in his defence. As regards the second defendant although he had a locus standi to make an application, his right is now at an end by reason of the unsuccessful result of his application for revocation. That being so it appears to us that the first defendant has no defence to this suit."

The fact that the defendants have been recorded as patnidars of all the land in the village implies a decision that they have no darmal uran right in respect of any of the lands included in that village. The decision operates as a decree of Court under section 11 of Regulation III of 1872. It is open to the plaintiff to void the effect of such a decree by the method prescribed in section 25 A or sub section (1) of section 25 of the said Regulation. The object of the procedure laid down in section 24 of Regulation III of 1872 is to enable persons interested to bring forward in the Settlement Court, within the prescribed period any objection they may desire to make to any part of such record. If the defendants rely upon the record of rights as conclusive under section 25 of Regulation III of 1872 and urge that the entry therein operates as a decree under section 11, they should prove that the requirements of the statute have been fulfilled. As soon as this has been accomplished, it becomes open to the plaintiffs to urge under section 44 of the Indian Evidence Act that the entry which operates as a decree was obtained by fraud. It is not necessary that the plaintiff should institute a separate suit to set aside the record of rights on the ground of fraud. Mir Moruff Ali v Kali Prasad, 19 C L J 29 see also Nadian Chand v Chander Silhun, 15 C 765.

Section 283 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) can only contemplate a suit based upon facts known to the party against whom an order was passed under s 282 within a year from the date of the order. If he was aware of the fraudulent nature of the mortgage it was part of the cause of action he would have to allege in such a suit filed within a year, if however he was not aware of the fraud, and became aware of it afterwards he can under s 44 of the Indian Evidence Act, assert the fraudulent nature of the plaintiff's application and the consequent invalidity of the order passed upon it in any proceeding instituted by the plaintiff on the strength of that order. Chumma v Ram Dayal 16 Bom L R 648.

Judgment vitiated by fraud, whether the same should be set aside. Whenever a party seeks to avail himself of a former judgment, fraudulently entered, the opposite-party may show the fraud, and thus avoid the judgment. Wharton Ev § 797. Now the question is whether fraud can be collaterally set up by a party to a judgment in any case in which he is either directly or constructively, either by action or by want of vigilance on party to the fraud. Wharton says "When a party has the opportunity of applying to the Court entering the judgment, to open it, he must do so, and cannot resort to a collateral attack." Whart Ev §§ 797, 798. So according to Burr Jones also "domestic judgments

S 44 cannot be collaterally attacked by extrinsic evidence of fraud or collusion, when rendered by a Court having competent jurisdiction, except by those who are not parties or privies. Buri Jones § 619. But in construing this section in Rayb v Choudhury 3 C. W. N. 660, Banerjee J said: "I find that section 41 provides that a party to a suit or other proceeding may shew that a judgment, order or decree which is relevant under section 40, that is which would as a judgment inter partes operate as res judicata or which is relevant under s 41, that is which is evidence as a judgment in rem or which is relevant under section 42, that is, which is evidence as a judgment relating to a public matter, and which is proved by the adverse party, was passed by a Court, which had no jurisdiction to pass it or was obtained by fraud or collusion. Or in other words (confining our attention to so much of the section as bears upon the present case) a party to a suit may shew that a judgment or decree which is conclusive as a judgment or decree inter partes and which has been proved against him by his adversary in that suit, was obtained by fraud. And when may the party shew that the judgment or decree was obtained by fraud? The context evidently shews that the answer must be in the suit in which the judgment is proved against him by his adversary. The language of the section clearly shows that it is very different from a provision such as the plaintiffs contend it is intended to be merely declaring that a judgment which is conclusive or admissible in evidence against any party may be impeached by such party on the ground of fraud or collusion. If that had been the object of the section the words 'to a suit or other proceeding and which has been proved by the adverse party' would have been wholly unnecessary. To accept the plaintiffs' contention, would be to hold that the portions of the section are matters of elaborate surplusage intended to serve no purpose and needlessly introduced into the section notwithstanding that they are calculated to mislead. The section makes the same provision for impeaching on the ground of fraud judgments inter partes and judgments in rem or judgments relating to public matters. Now it is not disputed nor can it be disputed (vide Taylor on Evidence § 1715) that a stranger to a judgment in rem or a judgment relating to a public matter against whom such judgment is used in evidence under section 41 can impeach it on the ground of fraud in the suit in which it is so used. And it is not reasonable to suppose that the same words are used in a different sense when applied to judgments inter partes, that is judgments relevant under s 40. Then, again the section makes the same provision for impeaching a judgment on the ground of fraud that it does for avoiding a judgment on the ground of want of jurisdiction. Now there can be no question that in the latter case the objection may be substantiated in the case in which the judgment is used as evidence. It would therefore not be reasonable to hold that the provision in the former case which is expressed in the same words should have a different meaning. See also Banshi Lal v Dhapo 21 A 242 = A W N 1902, 58, Bholanath v Nagendra Bala A I R 1928 Cal 810.

So it is that the language of section 41 is wide enough to allow a party to the suit in which the judgment was obtained to aver that it was obtained by the fraud of his antagonist though the judgment stands unimpeached. Ahmedbhai v Fullerbhai 6 B 703, Manchha v Kalidas, 19 B 826, Prayag v Snapsasad, 92 Ind Cas 335, Ilme Krishna v Kamesh (1921) Pat 209 = 6 Pat. L J 373, Sib Sran v Rameshwar 60 Ind Cas 640 = 1920 Pat 363 = 2 P L J 40, Amaram v Banomali 29 Ind C 839. The case of Banshi Lal v Ramp Lal 20 A 370 cannot be regarded as an authority against this proposition because in that case section 44 was not even mentioned. In Queen v Saddlers Company 10 H L C 404 Hills J said:

"A judgment or decree obtained by fraud upon a Court binds not such Court, nor any other, and its nullity upon this ground though it has not been set aside or reversed may be alleged in a collateral proceeding. 'In applying this rule it matters not whether the impeached judgment has been pronounced by an inferior tribunal or by the Highest Court of Judicature in the realm in all cases alike it is competent for every Court, whether superior or inferior to treat as nullity any judgment which can be clearly shown to have been obtained by manifest fraud' (Shedden v Patrule, 1 Mick H L C 607) Fabula non judicium not est in scena' Nistarani v Aundo Lal, 26 C 891, per Stanley J. In the case of Brandon v Beecher, 3 Cl & Fin 479, where sales of estates had fraudulently taken place under decrees of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland obtained by collusion between the tenant for life, the mortgagor, the person in whose favour a charge had been created, and the purchaser, and where the interests of the tenant in remainder had not been protected the Court of Chancery in Ireland on the tenant in remainder coming into possession granted him relief on a bill filed to redeem. The House of Lords affirmed that decree and held that though the Court of Chancery cannot review or correct a decree of the Court of Exchequer yet where such decree has been obtained collusively and fraudulently a party whose interests are affected by it may raise in the Court of Chancery either as actor or defender a question as to its validity. In this case the remainder man was not a party to the collusive proceedings, the tenant for life repented the estate of mortgagor Nistarani v Aundo Lal ibi supra, see also Hare Krishna v Ramesh Chandra, 2 Pat L T 523=62 Ind Cas 962=(1921) Pat 209. Compromise decree—Fraud Where a decree is alleged to have been obtained by fraud and misrepresentation it is competent to a party to show under section 41 of the Evidence Act that this amount was obtained by fraud and misrepresentation, and a separate suit is not necessary to set aside the compromise decree Bamareddi v Bamareddi, 30 Ind Cas 639. Where a plaintiff is not a party to the consent decree he can attack it in his suit by virtue of this section and it is not necessary for him to have it set aside Abdul Hakim v Panchn Dasi, 32 Ind Cas 849.

Foreign judgment, induced by fraud If the fraud or collusion of the parties induces the Divorce Court of a foreign country to believe that it has jurisdiction where, according to the doctrine maintained by English tribunals, it has no jurisdiction, the judgment or sentence is rendered invalid, in England, by such fraud or collusion. But if the fraud or collusion does not go to the root of the foreign Court's jurisdiction but merely by the pretence of facts which do not exist, or the suppression of the facts which do exist induces the foreign Court to grant a divorce which it would not otherwise have granted, then as long as such divorce continues in force in the country where it is granted it cannot be invalidated in England merely on account of such fraud or collusion Baker v Baker, (1906) P 209, Dicey's conflict of Law 456. But according to section 41 of the Evidence Act the decree of divorce can be assailed by defendant on the grounds set out in that section. So it is clear that the law in India goes further than the English law and definitely allows even a decree in rem which is relevant under s 41 to be contested also on the ground of fraud or collusion which does not go to the jurisdiction of the Court Sita Devi v Gopal Saran A I R 1928 Pat 375=9 P L T 375. Foreign judgments in personam obtained by the fraud of a party to the suit in foreign Court can not be enforced by him in an action brought in an English Court Nistarani v Aundo Lal, 26 C 591 (910), see also Aboulouf v Oppenheimer L R 10 Q B D 297, Talda v Laues L R 25 Q B D 310.

In Aboulouf v Oppenheimer & Co L R 10 Q B D 295 it was held that even although the question whether the fraud had been perpetrated was investigated in the foreign Court, and it was then decided that the fraud had not been committed the judgment would not be enforced in England. In that case to an action claiming the value of goods and brought upon a foreign judgment whereby the defendants were ordered to return to the plaintiff the goods or to pay to her their value, the defence was that the judgment was obtained by a false representation to the foreign Court by the plaintiff that the goods were not then in her possession and by fraudulent concealment by the plaintiff from the Court that the goods then were in her possession. Lord Coleridge, C J commenting on argument, that upon the pleading in that case it must be taken

S 44. that the allegations of fraud were brought before the foreign Court and that the foreign Court came to a conclusion against the defendants and whether this conclusion was right or wrong on the matters of fact the question of the plaintiff's alleged fraud could not be tried in the Courts of England, says "I may take the arguments for the plaintiff also in somewhat different words, namely, that although the Russian Courts at Pisto were led to decide against the defendants through believing a false state of facts to exist owing to the fraud of the plaintiff nevertheless the defendants are not now at liberty to say that the judgments against them were procured by that fraud. Certainly this contention seems unreasonable." Brett L J in the same case said "I cannot help thinking that the same doctrine which is now asserted with regard to a foreign judgment would be applicable to an action brought on a judgment obtained in an English Court other than the Court in which the action is brought. There may be a difference where it is sought to enforce by the process of a Court a judgment of that very Court because if that judgment has been obtained by improper means the objection does not arise in a new action brought on that judgment but it arises with regard to the process of the Court to enforce a judgment of its own. In a case of that kind it was perhaps formerly necessary to proceed in a Court of Equity in order to get rid of the judgment but I doubt whether it was necessary because, at least in my opinion a Court of Common Law would have in the exercise of its own jurisdiction set aside a judgment procured from it by deception."

In the case of Todala v. Lones 1 R 25 Q B D 310 in which an action was brought by the plaintiff in the English Court upon a judgment obtained in the Court of Palermo the Italian action was brought upon certain Bills of Exchange and the defence raised in the Italian action was that the Bills were given in respect of gambling transactions by an agent of the defendant without his authority. It was held that the defendant might raise the defence that the judgment was obtained by the fraud of the plaintiff even though the fraud alleged was such that it could not be proved without trying the question adjudicated upon by the foreign Court. Lindley L J in the course of judgment says "But we now come to another and a more difficult question, and that is whether this defence can be gone into at all. There are two rules relating to these matters which have to be borne in mind and the joint operation of which gives rise to the difficulty. First of all there is the rule which is perfectly well established and well known that a party to an action can impeach the judgment in it for fraud. Whether it is the judgment of an English Court or of a foreign Court does not matter using general language, that is a general proposition unconditional and undisputed. Another general proposition which speaking in equally general language is perfectly well settled, is that when you bring an action on a foreign judgment you cannot go into the merits which have been tried in the foreign Court. But you have to combine those two rules and apply them in the case where you cannot go into the alleged fraud without going into the merits."

Foreign judgment—how impeached under Indian law. In India a foreign judgment shall be conclusive as to any matter thereby directly adjudicated upon between the same parties or between parties under whom they or any of them claim litigating under the same title except—

- (a) Where it has not been pronounced by a Court of competent jurisdiction,
- (b) Where it has not been given on the merits of the case,
- (c) Where it appears on the face of the proceedings to be founded on the incorrect view of international law or a refusal to recognise the law of British India in cases in which such law is applicable,
- (d) Where the proceedings in which the judgment was obtained are opposed to natural justice,
- (e) Where it has been obtained by fraud,
- (f) Where it sustains a claim founded on a breach of any law in force in British India.—Rule 13 of the Civil Procedure Code, (VIII of 1908)

Collusion. No definition of the word 'collusion' is given in the Act. Collusion has been defined to be a deceitful agreement or compact between two or more persons to do some act in order to prejudice a third person or for some improper purpose. Collusion in judicial proceedings is a secret agreement between two persons that the one should institute a suit against the other, in order to obtain the decision of a judicial tribunal for some sinister purpose. It may be of two kinds—(1) when the facts put forward as the foundation of the judgment of the Court do not exist, (2) when they exist but have been corruptly preconcerted for the express purpose of obtaining the judgment." Wharton Law Lexicon cited in Field Li 7th Ed p 170. No doubt a decree can be avoided on the ground of fraud or collusion under this section. But there is a great difference between fraud and collusion. A party who has been made the victim of fraud can obviously avoid a decree on the ground that he has discovered the fraud subsequent to the decree which could not have been made a point of defence in the former litigation. On the other hand the fact of collusion is a matter which must have been well known to both the parties and is a point which could and might have been raised before the decree was passed on the last occasion. A third party can undoubtedly avoid a decree on the ground that it has been obtained collusively but it is clear that a party to a collusive decree can not avoid it on that ground. Sahib Rai v Bahari Rai A I R (1927) All 494=101 Ind Cas 765. Chennappa v Puttappa 11 B 702, Paradarajulu v Simmasulu, 20 M 333, Kandetti v Ankamma 31 M 485=18 M L J 376, Tenkataramma v Vamma, 10 M 17. That such a decree is binding on a representative is shown by the case of Ranganmal v Tenkatarani 18 M 378. Darbari v Mahabuti 11, A I R 1927 All 528=101 Ind Cas 513. An application for execution of a mortgage decree was made more than three years after the decree was made absolute. After the decree absolute was made and before the said application, the judgment debtor transferred his equity of redemption to A. The mortgagee judgment debtors though served with notice did not put in appearance nor made any objection to this application. The mortgaged property was put up to sale and purchased by the decree holder. The sale was confirmed and possession given to the purchaser. Shortly after the delivery of possession, an application for setting aside the sale was made by A on the ground that the decree could not be executed as it was satisfied that the execution of the decree was barred and that the execution proceedings were irregular and had been carried on by fraud and collusion between the mortgagee judgment debtors and the decree holder. Held that it was quite competent to the applicant under the provisions of section 41 of the Evidence Act to raise the questions and adduce evidence to prove the facts stated. Ramdhani v Topi Bibi 18 C L J 261.

Who can plead fraud or collusion. The language of this section is wide enough to allow a party to the suit in which the judgment was obtained to aver that it was obtained by the fraud of his antagonist though the judgment stands unreversed. It is also wide enough to allow a party to set up his own fraud or collusion in procuring the former judgment. Anglo Indian Code Vol II p 882, Ahmedbhoy v Vullubhoy, 6 B 703 (715 716). Both under the English and the Indian Law a stranger to the judgment against whom such judgment is used as evidence, may impeach it on the ground of fraud in the suit in which it is used. Asuri v Banamali 21 C W N 594, Taylor § 1713. In England a party to a suit would not be allowed to defeat a judgment by showing that it has procured an imposition upon the Court. Whately Stokes Anglo Ind Code Vol II p 829. In India also a party may be precluded from avoiding a decree on the ground of his own fraud but this is not based on any rule of evidence but on the general principles of justice which prohibit a person to plead his own fraud. Rajib v Lakhani 27 C 11 (22, 23)=3 C W N 660. A third party can always plead fraud against a judgment. West v Ship, 1 Ves Sen 241, Ahmedbhoy v Vullubhoy 6 B 703, Prudham v Phillips, 2 Amb 763.

Party cannot plead his own collusion or fraud. Section 44 of the Indian Evidence Act, no doubt allows a judgment or decree, otherwise relevant, to be shown to have been obtained by fraud or collusion. But the wholesome doctrine that a party cannot plead his own collusion to avoid a decree is supported by numerous cases. Tukaram v Sonoyi, 6 N L R 177=8 Ind Cas.

It is a maxim of law established not for the benefit of plaintiffs or defendants, but is founded on the principle of public policy which will not assist a plaintiff who has paid over money or handed over property in pursuance of an illegal or immoral contract, to recover it back for the Courts will not assist an illegal transaction in any respect." Boon Leg Mar 7th Ed 547 Vilayat v Misran 72 Ind Ca 92, see also Kishorbai v Ranchodia 38 B 427. Once it is established that the parties are pari delicto the Court will not assist an illegal transaction in any respect, that is to say, the person who has asked the Court to do some thing in his favour will fail. This result will follow not on account of any rule of evidence but on general principles of law which forbid a party to plead his own fraud. Rajib v Lakkan, 27C 11 (22, 23) see also Raghupati Chatterjee v Narsingha Hari Das, 71 Ind Ca 1=36 C L J 491. In Montifiori v Montifiori 1 Black W 363 Lord Mansfield C J said 'No man shall set up his own inequity, as a defence any more than as a cause of action. So it is a general rule that a Court of Justice will not interpose actively in favour of a party who has been particeps criminis in an illegal or fraudulent transaction, and this rule ordinarily applies to per on who are privies in estate. Barrat v Earl Huq 26A 272 (282). In Prudham v Phillips, 2 Ambler 763 Willis C J said 'If both parties collude, it was never known that one of them could vacate it.' "The same rule I think, argued Solicitor Wedderburn in the Duchess of Kingston's Case 20 How St Tr 375, "though I can find no express authority on the point, applies as between the privies of these parties except probably where the collusive fraud has been on a provision of the law enacted for the benefit of such privies. For instance I think that the heir would be allowed to show that a decree was obtained by his ancestor collusively in fraud of the Mortmain Act: indeed the effect of the provision of law is that the heir as regards it is made the antagonist of his executor (ancestor?) and cessante ratione legis cessat ipsa lex.' So also where by means of a fraud practised on the Court the owner of considerable property, both moveable and immoveable caused a decree to be passed against himself as defendant in a collusive suit upholding a fictitious Waghamah by which it was intended to tie up the property in perpetuity for the benefit of the direct descendants of the Wagah to the exclusion of his collateral heirs it was held on suit by such heirs to recover possession of their share by inheritance of the property so dealt with, (1) that a Court which was otherwise competent to entertain the suit had jurisdiction, on the finding that it had been obtained by means of fraud to treat the previous decree as a nullity, and (2) that the plaintiffs were not prevented from setting up the plea that the previous decree had been obtained by fraud by the fact that the person who practised such fraud was their predecessor in title. Barlatunus a v Earl Huq 26 A 272. The principle that a party to a fraudulent transaction is entitled to relief in a Court of Equity as against his fraudulent confederate so long as fraud continues has not been carried into effect is not applicable merely because the party suffers a decree to be passed against him in a fictitious and collusive suit which is only a part of the fraudulent scheme. Rajab v Hadayat 19 C W N 1151=22 C L J 197=29 Ind Cas 699.

Suit to set aside judgment obtained by fraud etc. Apart from this section where a judgment has been obtained by fraud the Court has jurisdiction, in a subsequent action brought for that purpose, to set the judgment aside. Colr v Langford (1895) 2 Q B 3, see also Flore v Floyd, 10 Ch D 327. Prestman v Thomas (1834) 9 P D 210. It is well settled that a decree cannot be challenged on the ground of its being erroneous by a fresh suit. Jagannath v Aida Chaul, 41 C L J 209=86 Ind Ca 1019=29 C W N 771. So where no question of jurisdiction to pass a decree arises and there is no allegation of fraud but only of irregularity or illegality in the conduct of proceedings, a suit does not lie to declare a decree null and void. The proper remedy in such a case is by way of appeal, review or revision. Sulaiman v. Laxman Rao, 87 Ind Cas 820. It may be taken as settled law that a decree whether it be a consent decree or an ex parte decree or a decree passed after contest, is liable to be vacated on account of fraud. *M 4 Maibay v. To set aside a decree on the ground of fraud it is not sufficient to prove constructive fraud but an actual positive fraud, a colluded and intentional contrivance to keep the parties and the Court in ignorance of the real facts and obtaining a decree by that contrivance. Bushun Singh v. Basana Singh, 92 Ind Cas 317=A. I. R. 1926 Lah 177, Ram Narayan v. Ioli, 5 P. L. J. 259. A decree which is fictitious does not require to be set aside for a collusive and fraudulent proceeding in a Court is not a judicial proceeding and is to be treated as nothing nothing to the party who sets it up. Soshi Kumar v. Chandu Kumar, A. I. R. 1923 Cal 204=11 C. L. J. 348. See also Surenda v. Kaligopal, 22 C. W. N. 367. A decree can be set aside on the ground of fraud if fraud is extraneous to the suit. Mustan v. Mohenulramath 1 Rang 300, Jaganmuth v. Bahmani 62 Ind Cas 594. The test as to whether a suit lies to set aside a decree is whether there was fraud practised in relation to the proceedings in Court by which the defendant in the original suit was prevented from placing his case before the Court. Damodar v. Ram Sarup 4 Pat. L. J. 162=71 Ind Cas 843=192, P. 327. Suppression of evidence does amount to fraud. Suje Rao v. Narayan Rao, A. I. R. 192, Bom 379. *Jogesh Chandra v. The degree of fraud necessary to justify a Court setting aside a decree on the ground of fraud varies according to the method and manner in which the fraudulent decree is obtained: (i) whether the decree is (i) by consent (ii) ex parte or (iii) after contest. Chattu v. Radha Krishen, 1 Pat. L. J. 184=50 Ind Cas 451. False evidence in a suit would not be fraud vitiating a decree unless the effect of that false evidence was to prevent the other party from putting his case before the Court. Golukdas v. Odharaj, 25 Bom. L. R. 893. The mere fact that a decree has been obtained by false evidence is not sufficient ground for setting aside a decree. Kasuar v. Aminuddin, 23 C. W. N. 133=47 Ind Cas 84, Dailuntha v. Pralhad 30 C. W. N. 760, Manmunda v. Han Mandal, 24 C. W. N. 133=74 Ind Cas 626. Jangol v. Jajit, 1 P. I. J. 735=60 Ind Cas 124, Kripa v. Nandu 1 P. I. J. 239=56 Ind Cas 615. But a decree can be set aside which has been obtained in a suit which is in its very foundation false which has been obtained directly by false allegations of fact constituting the very cause of action deliberately put forward for the purpose of deceiving the Court and defrauding the defence. Kucharam v. Ghan shanda, 8 S. I. R. 91.

To sustain motion to set aside a decree on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, the fraud must be extrinsic to the proceedings before the Judge. It must be in the conduct of the suit by keeping the plaintiff out of Court by practising a fraud on him or by not serving a notice upon him or by a false declaration inducing the Court to believe that notice has been served and proceeded with the suit ex parte or by some other act by which the defendant is prevented from placing his case before the Court, as fully as he would do but for the act of the plaintiff. The fact that the plaintiff in the previous suit brought a suit false to his knowledge cannot sustain a suit for setting aside the decree obtained by him. Madda Pedda v. Kurnani, 96 Ind Cas 498=21 L. W. 300, see also Abdulla v. Kishman, 86 Ind Cas 337=4 Bur. L. J. 18=3 Rang 65. Muhammad Yusuf v. Nur Jam 101 Ind Cas 80. A suit to obtain a declaration that a decree passed by a Court was obtained by fraud and was not binding on the plaintiff can be laid in a Court inferior to that which passed the decree, provided

S 44 the subject matter is otherwise within the jurisdiction of that Court Pilla Kahladu v Chandrayya 24 M L R 254=(1918) M W N 562

Suit to set aside an ex parte decree A suit to set aside an ex parte decree on the ground that the claim was a false one and the decree was obtained by perjured evidence will not lie where the prior suit was a contested one or an ex parte decree was passed after service of summons Nalin v Hari 29 C W N 323=88 Ind Cas 779=41 C I J 281=A I R 1925 Cal 663, Bairunta v Prohlad 30 C W N 560. The mere fact that an ex parte decree has been passed does not show that there was no service of summons on the defendant and if anything the presumption is that the Court passing the decree was satisfied that there had been a proper service of summons. It is incumbent on a person seeking to set aside the ex parte decree in a subsequent case to prove that it was obtained by fraud Hainaram v Sund Keshwar, 1 P L R 127=71 Ind Cas 573=A I R 1923 Pat 406, see also Mahadeb v Mahabub, A I R 1923 Cal 569, The India Provident Co v Govinda 27 C W N 359=1923 Cal 425. Where a decree is obtained ex parte after suppression of summons and on a misrepresentation of the facts to the Court, such a decree can be set aside by a separate suit and it stands on a different footing from a decree obtained by perjury India Provident Company v Govinda 65 Ind Cas 318; Ram v Panda 3 Pat L T 451, Jangal v Lalpat, 6 Pat L J 1. Pannalal v Fara Kaula, 63 Ind Cas 728. Maharam v Mahabub 58 Ind Cas 317. Kripa Sindhu v Nanda, 1 P L R 239=(1920) Pat 209=56 Ind Cas 615, Vagendia v Parbatty 20 C W N 819. Gendu v Sadhi 44 Ind Cas 993.

OPINIONS OF THIRD PERSON WHEN RELEVANT

Opinions of third persons when relevant An inference as to the existence or non-existence of a fact is made based upon other facts presented directly to the sense of the witness is, in a legal sense 'opinion'. The statement of such inference by the witness is 'opinion evidence', generally speaking it may be said that opinion is the exclusive province of the jury, and that witnesses will not be allowed to invade such province. A witness is to testify to facts so that the jury may form an opinion as to such facts and render their verdict accordingly. McKelty v Le §§ 129-130. 'The rules, roughly thus intimated,' says Prof Bradley Thayer, 'which forbid the giving of opinion evidence and of character evidence are leading and important. As to the former it is traceable easily to the same source as the Hearsay rule. It was for the jury to form opinions and draw inferences and conclusions and not for the witness. He was merely to bring in to the jury or the Judge the raw material of fact, on which their minds were to work. If the witness spoke directly to the very fact in issue, the jury were to consider whether to believe his statement or not, if to other facts of an evidential sort then the jury were to judge of their import and their tendency. The witness was not to say that he thought or 'believed' so and so, it was for the jury to say what they thought and believed. The witness must say that he had seen and heard. He was an oyant et voyant. But then simple as this sounds the distinction could not serve in many nice and critical enquiries. In the loose and easy administration of the law of trials that existed as long as juries went on their own knowledge and needed no witnesses or evidence at all and at a time when even if they had witnesses they were at liberty to disregard them and to follow their own personal information, it was possible to get along without nice discriminations so that the law of evidence had hardly any development at all until within the last two centuries and it was but slight before the present century. In a sense, all testimony to matter of fact is opinion evidence for it is a conclusion formed from phenomena and mental impressions. Yet that is not the way we talk in Courts or in common life. Where shall the line be drawn? When does matter of fact first become matter of opinion? A difficult question, but some things are clear. There are questions which require special training and knowledge to answer them. A jury unless it be one of experts and as such ill adapted perhaps for the general purposes of trial cannot deal with them. On such questions the ordinary jury may be assisted by skill witnesses, who give their opinion

There are other questions, not requiring skill or training, but only special opportunities of observation like hand writing and the value of property, on which opinions of ordinary witnesses having such opportunities may be given. How far does this go? There is much apparent perplexity in the cases. In a very great degree it results from differences of practical judgment in applying an admitted rule—the admitted rule being that opinion evidence is not generally receivable, and the difference arising from differing judgments as to what is and is not really to be called opinion evidence in the sense of the rule. It has been said, judicially that there is, in truth, no general rule requiring the rejection of opinions as evidence (Hardy v Merrill 56 N H 227, 211). Without needing quite literally to that, there is ground for saying that in the main, any rule excluding opinion evidence is limited to cases where in the judgment of the Court it will not be helpful to the jury. Whether accepted in terms or not, this view largely governs the administration of the rule. It is obvious that such a principle must allow a very great range of permissible difference in judgment, and that conclusions of the character ought not usually to be regarded as subject to review by higher Courts. Unluckily the matter is often treated by the Courts with much too heavy a hand, and the quantity of decisions on the subject is most unreasonably swollen. Thayer Pre Treat pp 523 525. That opinion of a witness is not evidence was held in the English Courts long ago. In Carter v Boehm 3 Burr 190; 1918 Lord Mansfield L C J said "Great stress was held upon the opinion of the broker. But we all think the jury ought not to pay the least regard to it. It is mere opinion which is not evidence. It is opinion after an event. It is the opinion without the least foundation from any previous precedent or usage. It is an opinion which, if rightly formed, could only be drawn from the same premises from which the Court and the jury were to determine the case."

Why opinion evidence is excluded. The old objection to the opinion evidence was a matter of testimonial qualifications, requiring personal observations. In Ilright v Tatham 5 Cl & F 690 Coleridge J said "I do not indeed, concede though, it is not, perhaps necessary to decide the point that the mere opinion of a witness even on oath is, as such, admissible evidence upon a question of competency. When you can bring the decision of that question, as you sometimes may, to depend upon deductions from scientific premises you may hear those deductions expressed as opinions by scientific men. The necessity of the case justifies the departure from the general rule, but the competency in the main is a question of fact, and the jury are to draw their conclusions from the evidence of facts before them, not from the opinions which others may have formed from facts not before the jury. I admit that, in practice, where the witness to fact is present, it is by no means uncommon to ask directly for his opinion, such a question it would be idle to object to for the objection would only lead to a detailed enquiry into particular facts, which the witness is there ready to go into. Nothing therefore would be gained by it. I am not however, aware that the question has ever, upon argument been decided to be correct in form." Higmore § 1917. So under the old rule the opinion of a witness was rejected for want of testimonial knowledge. The principle of testimonial knowledge requires that a witness must speak as a knower not merely as a guesser. So when the witness speaking (for example) to a sale of goods, declares that he thinks or believes or is persuaded that the sale was not made, such a witness cannot be heard, so far as he means that he did not see the transactions in question but believes so on rumour alone or has otherwise reached by supposition, his conclusion. Higmore § 1917. In this requirement, however there is no new principle no independent opinion rule but merely a recognition of an otherwise established general principle of testimonial qualifications that the witness to be competent at all, must have personal observation. Ibid. But, at the same time that this principle is becoming recognized, or shortly after there occurs a general recognition of what seemed at the time as an exception to it—the use of skilled witness. Higmore § 1917. Though the witnesses can in general speak only as to facts yet in questions of science persons versed in the subject may deliver their opinion upon oath on the case proved by other witnesses. Thus a physician who has not seen the particular patient, may

S 44 after hearing the evidence of others be called to prove on his oath the general effects of a particular disease and its probable consequences in the particular case, for, though not a particular fact it is still general information which the rest of the man and stand in need of to enable them to form an accurate judgment on the subject in dispute" Peake's Evidence, 112

Gradual growth of the opinion rule We have stated in the previous topic that in the earlier English cases the scope of the opinion rule was confined only to the exclusion of evidence on the ground of want of testimonial qualifications. Third persons were not allowed to draw inference from facts supplied by others and to impart their belief thus derived to the tribunal. In other words the disparagement of opinion had always in mind the testimony of a person who had no facts of his own observation to speak from, and the skilled witness was the person who had to be received by way of exception to that notion. Thus, when an ordinary lay witness took the stand equipped with personal acquaintance with the affair and therefore competent in his sources of knowledge, the circumstance that incidentally he drew inferences from his observed data and expressed conclusions upon them did not present itself as in any way improper. It would not occur to any Judge that this witness was doing a wrong thing. In short, it was only 'opinion' as a mere guess and a belief without observation which they rejected. In Carter v Boehm 3 Burr 190, 1918 Lord Mansfield said "Mere opinion is not evidence. But opinion as an inference or conclusion from personally observed data they did not think of disparaging. That it was the attitude towards the lay observer will appear from the following passages: 'There are also many cases in which witnesses speak from judgment and opinion, without reference to any technical knowledge, such, for instance, is evidence of character and all other testimony amounting to a general conclusion from particular facts.' In H D Evans Notes to Pollock II, 216 "So also as to the value of goods sold it must always rest in opinion only, and the like as to the sanity of a party, and all other matters of proof which from their nature can only be given from the opinion which the witness may form." Mr Espinasse Ann Pices 411, Wigmore § 1917 Forbes v Cuthbert 3 Yeates 527 (Am.) Harrison v Rouan 3 Wash C C 387. So it is clear that when the early English writers and Judges disparaged "mere opinion" they never had in mind the case of the lay witness who having a 'fact knowledge' included in his testimony an opinion or inference based on these data—as in the leading instances (used by those writers and Judges) of handwriting, character, and sanity. But when by careless usage the phrase came to be passed along that 'opinion is not evidence' the distinction just before established for skilled witnesses not having 'fact knowledge' was readily enlarged, and was made to apply to the lay witness who had a 'fact knowledge', and to support the new and broad idea that opinion in general was not evidence. Now if a lay witness having a 'fact knowledge' laid out those facts before the jury and then proposed to add his own inference or conclusion or opinion upon those facts as made at the time it is apparent that the same test might be applied to exclude this opinion or inference of him since the facts had already been laid by him before the jury and they were not competent as he to draw an inference. It must be noted too that this extension—logical enough it is true and correct in theory but pernicious (as it has proved) in practice—is a peculiarly American doctrine. It has apparently not taken in England to an important degree. There appear to be no English rulings which indicate that the opinion rule has there been thought to exclude the inferences which a 'fact witness' has made from the data he lays before the jury. Certainly no such broad logical extension of the test to lay witnesses is the familiar possession of the English bar as it is of the American bar. Wigmore § 1917.

Principle underlying the newly grown up "Opinion rule" It has already been stated that the old objection to the original opinion rule was on the ground of want of testimonial qualifications on the part of the witness while giving his opinion. But no such objection can be raised in the case of a "fact witness". His testimonial qualifications can not be questioned and on that ground no objection can be raised. "The true theory, then of the Opinion rule, in the same way as here to use, is simply that of the exclusion of supererogatory evidence. It is not that there is any fault to find with the witness himself or the sufficiency of his sources of knowledge or the positiveness of his impression, but simply that his testimony, otherwise objectionable, is not needed as superfluous. Thus the principle of exclusion is in no sense one of Testimonial Qualification, but one of Auxiliary Policy. The delay and waste avoided might be in a single instance trifling, but its seriousness and its unhealableness can be appreciated if we suppose that there were no evidential limits whatever of the above nature. The time taken in the whirl of an interminable multitude of opinions, the confusion of the main issues by an additional mass of testimonial differences and impeachments, and the tendency for the jury now and then to decide simply according to the preponderance of numbers and of influential names—all these are possibilities in the absence of some limit of the present nature. It simply endeavours to save time and avoid confusing testimony by telling the witness 'The tribunal is on this subject in possession of the same materials of information as yourself, thus to join and add nothing to our materials for judgment, your further testimony is unnecessary and merely encumbers the proceedings.' It is this living principle which is (or ought to be) applied in each instance, nothing more definite than this is the test involved by the principle. Higmore § 1917. This principle is thus recognised by Lord Mansfield in Carter v Boehm, 3 Barr 1905, 1918. It is an opinion which, if rightly formed, could only be drawn from the same premises from which the Court and the jury were to determine the case, and therefore it is improper and irrelevant in the mouth of a witness.

Opinion and fact, how to distinguish. Accurately to distinguish 'matter of fact' from 'matter of opinion' is not less difficult than to distinguish it from 'matter of law'. In all supposed statements of fact the witness really testifies to the opinion formed by the judgment upon the presentation of the senses. Statement of opinion is therefore necessarily involved in statement of fact. 1 What El § 15. An instance, erroneously supposed to be simply an 'opinion' is found in cases where the phenomena being too numerous or intangible to permit a correct or effective individual statement witnesses are permitted to state simply the impression, such phenomena produced in their mind. This apparently is simply another method of stating facts. Best El 8th Ed p 473. Corn v Stuntz, 117 Mass 122, 133. So also if we look at the matter psychologically and with a nice regard for the process of the mind every statement resolves itself into a matter of opinion. The conclusions of the mind are all drawn from that which the senses perceive, the only difference being in the degree of removal from the immediate impression of the senses. Every statement is therefore really a statement of an inference, and in this sense all evidence is opinion evidence. Like the case where the question was as to why the plaintiff did not get into a street car and thus avoid the danger of riding upon the running board. He was asked for the reason, and answered that it was so crowded that it was impossible for him to get there before he was hurt. In one sense this may be said to be a statement of opinion—that is the conclusion of the witness's mind upon a state of facts presented to his senses—and in the case in question there was sufficient doubt as to the nature of the statement to cause the objection to be ruled, yet the Court held, and quite properly, that legally speaking the statement was a statement of fact and not opinion. Indianapolis Ct Ry Co v Hartsch, 35 Ind App 291=74 N E 34 (Am). There are many cases which arise where the question ruled is to some particular statement of the witness is a question of words rather than subject. One may state a fact in several ways and sometimes the use of one word will import an opinion where the use of another will accord more strictly with the language of the fact. In one case the witness testified that the defendant 'acknowledged that he took the horse at a valuation of 50 £ per head'. Under objection on the ground that the statement was an opinion, it was held that it was not. Probably the question would not even have been raised had the witness used instead of the word 'acknowledged' the word 'said'. Haunter v Davis 128 Iowa 216=103 N W 373. A witness may not be asked whether there was any room in a car for other men, but may state whether there was any vacant or unoccupied

Whatever is presented to the senses of a witness and of which he therefore receives direct knowledge he may state provided it is relevant to the issue and not excluded on some other ground. This is strictly a matter of fact. What he has seen or heard or felt, he knows in the sense in which the law requires knowledge on the part of the witness testifying. What he thinks in respect to the existence or non-existence of a fact in issue is matter of opinion, and he cannot state it. It is for him to put before the jury the facts as he has perceived them by his senses, and for the jury to form in opinion concerning the facts in proof of which the evidence is offered. McKelvey's Ex § 131. In Ogden v People, 134 Ill 599=25 N E 755 (Am) A was tried for robbery, and several witnesses testified that on the night of the robbery they recognized him by his voice, though they did not see him. The testimony was objected to as opinion. The Court treats the question as follows. The statement by the witnesses for the prosecution of a fact which they ascertained through the sense of hearing was not the statement of mere matter of opinion but the statement of a conclusion reached directly and primarily from an operation of the sense of hearing. A witness can learn and know facts by and through the exercise of his perceptive faculties—his five senses—and these facts he may state. But according to Prof Wigmore no such distinction is scientifically possible. If the above principle says the learned writer is the true one, it is obvious (leaving history out of the question and considering only principle) that there is no virtue in any test based on the mere verbal or logical distinction between opinion and fact. Further more, an examination of the so-called opinion rule, as applied in its various instances shows that the opinion element is in the very law itself, a merely superficial and casual mark, and not the essential feature. Wigmore § 1919.

Scope of the rule rejecting the opinion of witness. "The opinions of any person other than the Judge by whom the fact is to be decided as to the existence of facts in issue or relevant facts, are as a rule irrelevant to the decision of the cases to which they relate for the most obvious reasons. To show that such and such a person thought that a crime had been committed or a contract made would either be to show nothing at all or would invest the person whose opinion was proved with the character of a Judge. In some few cases, the reasons for which are self-evident, it is otherwise. Steph Introduction p 167. In this connection Mr Justice Markby says "The opinion of a competent person is always relevant and would be admissible under ss 7 and 11. But as in the case of hearsay there is an unexpressed rule forbidding its admission the rule may be stated as follows: (1) No one called as a witness is allowed to express an opinion that a fact which is being enquired into exists, he can only give an account of his own sensations with regard to it. (2) There is not the least doubt that this rule though it nowhere appears in the Act exists in India and ss 45 50 are exceptions to it. Markby p 40. If his lordship meant that a third person is not allowed to express an opinion that a fact which is being enquired into exists (save and except in cases mentioned in 45 50) he is right in his statement of law. But if his lordship meant that a fact-witness is debarred from stating his opinion in any case when on the stand his statement of law is evidently erroneous. In this connection the observation of Foster C J in Hardy v Merril 56 N H 241 should be borne in mind. All evidence is opinion merely unless you choose to call it fact and knowledge as discovered by and manifested to the observation of the witness. And it seems to me quite unnecessary and irrelevant to crave an apology or excuse for the admission of such evidence for referring to any exceptions (whether classified or isolated and arbitrary) to any supposed general rule according to the language of some books and the custom of some Judges. There is in truth no general rule requiring the rejection of opinions as evidence. A general rule can hardly be said to exist which is lost to sight in an enveloping mass of arbitrary exceptions. Wigmore § 1919. The Hearsay rule the Character rule and the Opinion rule are the product of jury system. All are founded on a peculiar cautiousness in English Law, and all have been developed with an equally peculiar rigidity.

and stolid disregard of practical consequences. All three are complex and far reaching in application as well as voluminous in detailed development. But a radically different future may be predicted to them. The Hearsay rule and the Character rule will always remain in our law, in a more or less relaxed form, while the Opinion rule will in substance disappear. An important difference between them is that the first two are the solid growth of experience, while the last rule, in its American development, is merely the logically technical development, of a mis-understood term. The opinion rule day by day exhibits its unpractical subtlety and its useless requirement of logic. Under this rule we accomplish little by enforcing it and we should do no harm if we dispense with it. Wigmore § 1929

Proper scope of opinion rule debarring a "Fact witness" from stating his opinion. The opinion of a witness on the stand derived from facts observed by him is an inference from observed and communicable data. The objection to such an opinion evidence rests on consideration of policy as to the superfluity of the testimony. This evidence is attempted to be excluded not for want of testimonial qualifications on the part of the witness but on the principle of Auxiliary policy as Prof. Wigmore termed it. Two great disadvantages which the principle of Auxiliary Policy always guards against are, namely (1) confusion of issues and (2) undue prejudice. (a) If the use of certain evidential material tends to produce undue confusion in the minds of the tribunal—the jurors—by diverting their attention from the real issue and fixing it upon a trivial or minor matter or by making the controversy so intricate that the disentanglement of it becomes difficult the evidence tends to the suppression of the truth and not to its discovery, and there is good ground for excluding such evidence, unless it is so intimately connected with the main issue that its consideration is inevitable. (b) So also if certain evidential material having a legitimate probative value, tends nevertheless to produce also, over and above its legitimate effect an unfair prejudice to the opponent, or by virtue of the personality of the witness tends to receive an excessive weight in the minds of the tribunal, there is good ground for excluding such evidence, unless it is indispensable for its legitimate purpose. Wigmore §§ 1564, 1913. So in cases where opinion evidence does not violate these two salutary principles or where it is so connected with the main issue that its consideration is inevitable or its reception is indispensable it should be received. The opinion rule is a rule based on the thought," says Dr. Greenleaf "that all the data for drawing an inference are before the jury, or can be placed before them, and it is superfluous to add by way of testimony, the inference which they can equally well draw for themselves. For example if a witness, A, testifying to the facts of a street accident in which the defendant's horse is said to have become unmanageable and run over the plaintiff has detailed the relative situation of the parties, the behaviour of the horse, the efforts of the defendant to check him and all other circumstances of the event and is then asked whether the defendant could have stopped the horse before it reached the plaintiff, or whether the plaintiff could have avoided it in season it would be natural to object that the data for his inference were fully before the jury, and that they were equally in a position with the witness to draw an inference from them.

The witness's opinion is excluded, not because inferences as such are objectionable—for a witness's knowledge and all knowledge is made up of inference—but because the inference under the circumstances is superfluous and because if one person could be summoned and inquired of in this way then the opinion of a score could equally be asked, all of them superfluous and calculated to encumber the trial, without adding anything to the essential data before the jury. Greenleaf § 441(b). But in certain cases the opinion of a witness may become not only helpful but also necessary. In the application of the rule, its principle should not be lost sight of and no arbitrary restrictions should be put forth. This consideration supplies a living test for the solution of the particular instances. Thus in Cornell v. Green 10 S. & R. 16 Gibson J said "It is good general rule that a witness is not to give his impressions, but to state the facts from which he received them and thus leave to the jury to draw their own conclusion. But I take it that wherever the facts from which a witness received an impression are too

S 44. evanescent in their nature to be recollected or are too complicated to be separately and distinctly narrated, his impressions from these facts become evidence. So in every case opinion evidence of non experts is admissible where the witness cannot adequately state or recite the data so fully and accurately as to put the jury completely in the witness's place and enable them equally well to draw the inference. Correll v Green 10 S & R 16, Buffum v R Co 4 R I 223. Green v Li § 411(h). It often happens that it is impossible for a witness to detail all the pertinent facts in such a manner as to enable the tribunal to form a conclusion without the opinion of the witness. Indeed the witness may not be able to separate the facts and indications from which he has formed a conclusion from the conclusion itself. Lahn v Ottumwa 60 Iowa 429=15 N W 257. From the many illustrations given below it will appear that from the necessity of the case the opinions of ordinary witnesses must often be received. The ground upon which opinions are admitted in such cases is that from the very nature of the subject in issue it cannot be stated or described in such language as will enable persons not eye witnesses to form one accurate judgment in regard to it. Burr Jones § 360. The opinions of non experts are admissible therefore provided they state, so far as practicable the facts on which the opinions are based on questions of identity as applied to persons things, animals or hand writing, and of the size colour and weight of objects, of time and distances of the mental state or condition of another of insanity and intoxication, of the infection of one for the other of the physical condition of another as to the health or sickness (in which latter case however, the opinion of a non expert will not be heard upon the particular disease or the cause thereof) of value, of the soundness of animals and of all subjects where it is not practicable nor possible to put the tribunal in possession of all the primary facts upon which the opinions of the witnesses are grounded. Burr Jones § 360. Similarly a witness can testify as to whether a person appeared to be in love or seemed hostile friendly or the like or felt sad, or appeared intoxicated. They can testify as to who 'controlled' and or that a spot was flooded or that a person appeared rational. He can also depose as to a person's age or that a certain person looks excited. So also he can testify that certain things were done in a pleasant manner or that a wound was inflamed'. A witness cannot testify as to 'influence in community'. He may state that foot prints corresponded. Busby v State 77 Ala 66. Best v Li p 474. He may also depose that he recognised a walk. Beale v Percy, 72 Ala 323. Opinion of a witness is admitted in the above case because a witness is not in a position to place before the tribunal all the facts and symptoms from which he had formed the opinion that a person was angry drunk sick in love or insane this would be to abandon himself to a hopeless attempt at mimicry and undignified descriptions and imitations as ludicrous as they would be vain and unprofitable. So in matters more within the common observation and experience of men non experts may, in cases where it is not practicable to place before the jury all the primary facts upon which they are founded state their opinion from such facts, where such opinions involve conclusions material to the subject of inquiry. In such cases the witnesses are required so far as may be to state the primary facts which support their opinions. Where it is practicable to place palpably before the tribunal the facts supporting their opinions the witnesses should be restricted in their testimony to such facts and the tribunal left to form its opinion from these facts untroubled by the mere opinions of the witnesses. Burr Jones § 360.

Identity testimony. Witnesses are allowed to testify when they can speak with reasonable certainty as to the identity of persons or things when if they were merely allowed to specify the details and facts on which their conclusions depended their testimony would be for no value. Hence the statements of witnesses as to identity are not necessarily rejected although they are unable to describe the features of the person in question or his clothing or other particulars in which the conclusion depends. Burr Jones § 361. Personal identity is a matter of opinion or belief founded on facts which may be and frequently are inexplicable and incommunicable to a stranger and therefore as to such facts, opinion is competent evidence. Lauson Expert and Opinion Ee 324. For example the identification may be based upon the voice alone, and it would be obviously impossible for a witness to describe the tones of voice in such a manner that from the description alone the jury could arrive at any satisfactory conclusion. The testimony of the chemist who has analysed blood and that of the observer who has merely recognized it belong to the same legal grade of evidence and though the one may be entitled to much greater weight than the other with the jury, the exclusion of either would be illegal. It must not, however be lost sight of, that such an opinion as to identification of another to be admissible, must be based upon knowledge of the person identified and be the result of the witness's recollection of the person, and the facts connected with his seeing or hearing him. An opinion as to the identity of a person, based solely upon the statement of another, is not admissible to prove identity. People v Gray, 148 Cal 507=83 Pac 707. A person may be identified by photographs. Truth v Frith (1896) P 71, Brooke v Brooke 60 Md 529 533. Marion v State, 20 Neb 240, Higmore § 660. vide notes under s 9 at p 144. The same rule can well be applied in case of identification of things. Fry v Guthercole 13 Jur 542.

Values Value may be proved by the opinion of any witness possessing knowledge on the subject. Lawson's Expert & Opinion Li 463. To prove value, opinion evidence is resorted to as a general rule from necessity, not only where the subject of such testimony is a matter of common knowledge but also where it is of a kind requiring special skill to explain or appraise it. There are many things whose value any one may testify to it being a matter of common knowledge, and not one requiring special and peculiar study, observation or skill. Thus, every one may be presumed to have a somewhat correct idea of value of property which is in almost universal use. Thus, the question is as to the value of a cow or an article in common use in the household. Ibid p 466. In Cooper v State, 53 Miss 393, the question was as to the value of a gun and it was held that the opinion of an ordinary witness was competent. In the nature of things," said the Court, "the value of this sort of property in such common use can be estimated by almost every man in the community. It is not like painting, or precious stones, of which experts alone can form an intelligent judgment, but is rather like that class of merchandise and commodities of the value of which most persons have knowledge. So evidence as regards value can be well received from an ordinary witness where it does not require a knowledge of any particular science, art or skill to enable one to testify. Chamness v Chamness 53 Ind 301 (Am). "It is not necessary, in order to qualify one to give an opinion as to value that his information should be of such a direct character as would make it competent in itself as primary evidence. It is the experience which he acquires in the ordinary conduct of affairs, and from means of information such as are usually relied on by men engaged in business for the conduct of that business, that qualifies him to testify. Hells J in Whitney v Thatcher, 117 Mass 526. Therefore though as a general thing, a witness not an expert cannot be said to be qualified to express an opinion as to the value of a thing, unless he has seen it or has some personal knowledge of its value still there is no rule of law and there can be none defining how much a witness shall know of property before he can be permitted to give an opinion of its value. He must have some acquaintance with it, sufficient to enable him to form some estimate of its value, and then it is for the jury to determine how much weight to attach to such estimate. Bedell v Long Island R Co, 49 N Y 367, Lawson Exp & Op Li 467.

The market value of land is not a question of science and skill upon which only an expert can give an opinion. Persons living in the neighbourhood may be presumed to have a sufficient knowledge of the market value of property, from the location and character of the land in question. Pennsylvania, etc R Co v Bunnell 81 Pa St 426. The best and only legitimate evidence of the value of the land at the time of the sale would be the opinion of witnesses who had personal knowledge of the land and from their own observation had become acquainted with its value. Crouse v Holman, 19 Ind 30 (Am). Lawson Exp & Op Li 469. As has been well said "to describe to a jury a piece of ground however minutely, with its supposed adaptations to use, advantages and disadvantages and demand of them, upon this information alone, a verdict as to its value would merely be farcical, and thus indeed is all that can be done to enable them to arrive at a conclusion as to its value, unless the witnesses are allowed to state their judgment or opinion together with the facts upon which such opinion is founded Illinois etc Ry Co v Von Horn 18 Ill 257, Burr Jones § 363. So it is clear that the valuation of land must be arrived at by the tribunal by taking the opinion of a witness and that that witness need not be an expert. As regards the qualification of the witness, it is of course a question for the Court Stutell etc Alf Co v Phelps, 130 U S 520 (Am), Alfonso v United States, 2 Story, 421 (Am) Lawson's Exp & Op Ex pp 463 501, Wigmore §§ 1940 1941 Nawam Chandra v Cohen 10 C 56, but see Dualla v Ladda, 4 O C 247. As to how valuation is to be made under the Municipal and Land Acquisition Act vide Manindra v Secretary of State 41 C 967, Harish v Secretary of State, 11 C W N 375 Weniel v Secretary of State, 13 C W N 1058, Secretary of State v Shannugayya, 16 M 369, Government of Bombay v Meruani 10 Bom L R 920 Heysam v Bholanath, 11 B L R 236, Secretary of State v Belchambers 33 C 408, Tulsi v Secretary of State, 14 C W N 1xxx, Ram Sahay Sha v Secretary of State, 8 C W N 671, In Fasal Salehhar, 10 Bom L R 997, Karlash v Secretary, 17 C L J 34.

Sanity The reason for admission of non expert opinion evidence as regards sanity or otherwise is thus stated by Doe J in Broadman v Woodman, 47 N H 144. 'From the nature of the subject, it cannot generally be so described by witnesses as to enable others to form an accurate judgment in regard to it. The opinion of an unprofessional witness is competent not because he can give no description of the appearances which indicate sanity or insanity but because ordinarily he cannot give an adequate description of them. The sanity or insanity of an individual may be a matter notorious and without doubt in a neighbourhood and yet few, if any of the neighbours may be able to lay before the jury distinct facts that would enable them to pronounce a decision thereon with reasonable assurance of its truth'. Per Gaston J in Clary v Clary, 2 Ind 80 (Am), Wigmore § 1934. 'To ask a witness on such a trial whether Miss B appeared peculiarly or strangely was substantially to ask whether in the witness's opinion she was insane'. Per Doe J in Broadman v Woodman supra. But the opinion of non professional witnesses are not admissible in such cases, unless such opinions are based upon their own knowledge and observation of the person's appearance. Burr Jones § 364. Opinions of witnesses from observations are admissible in evidence when from the nature of the subject under investigation, no evidence can be obtained. Ibid § 366. But it is a well settled rule that non experts can not give their opinions as to the existence, nature and extent of disease in any one. Lush v Mc Daniel 4 Ired L 455 (Am). While a non expert witness is deemed capable of judging the general question whether a person is sick or well, he is not competent to go further and give an opinion upon the nature of a disease or the extent of the ravages it has made upon the system of a patient. Smith v Smith 117 N C 326. The law from the early days, however has permitted the subscribing witnesses to a Will to be called upon for their opinion as to sanity or insanity of the testator. Kaufman v Caughman 26 S F R 16 (S C). Lawson Exp & Op Ex 2nd Ed 532, Wigmore § 1936. The theory that the law had provided thus preappointed testimony for the express purpose of securing witnesses to the testator's capacity as well as to his signature, as well as the unquestioned practice prevailed over any theory that the Judges might have as to the bearing of the opinion rule. Wigmore § 1936. But opinion as to sanity and opinion as to general testamentary or criminal capacity are entirely distinct. The latter sort of opinion is inadmissible (when it is) because a question of law may be involved, and witnesses conclusions are not needed on such points. Wigmore § 1937.

Opinion from necessity The opinions of ordinary witnesses derived from observation are admissible in evidence when from the nature of the subject under investigation no better evidence can be obtained or the facts can not otherwise be presented to the tribunal e.g. questions relating to time quantity number, dimensions, height, speed distance or the like. Lawson Exp & Op

Li 505 'The indications themselves ought to be proved, and it is quite true that the jury are authorized to draw their own deductions from them, but no witnesses can fully prevent the appearances as they were before his eyes, and to take the testimony of what he saw without his opinion would seldom prove fully satisfactory, and would often be misleading. Indeed, in many cases it is difficult to separate a description of the indications from an opinion upon them, nor is a witness always expected to do so. If a man were to come upon the track of a recent rain or snow storm he would hardly be stopped in giving an account of it as a witness, if he were to say, among other things, that the storm appeared to have come from a particular direction because such a storm, as every one knows, must usually for a time leave behind it some very conclusive indications of the direction it had taken. Of course in any such case, it should appear that the witness had some basis of observation on which to justify his opinion, but when he has stated the particular facts his opinion may properly be called for. (Cooley J in Underwood v. Haldren, 33 Mich. 232) The general rule certainly is that witnesses are to testify to facts, and not to give their individual opinions. This rule, however, has its exceptions some of which are as familiar and as well settled as the rule itself. When all the pertinent facts can be sufficiently detailed and described and when the triers are supposed to be able to form correct conclusions without the aid of opinion or judgment from others, no exception to the rule is allowed. But cases occur where the affirmative of these propositions cannot be assumed. The facts are sometimes incapable of being presented with their proper force and significance to any but the observer himself and it often happens that the trier are not qualified, from experience in the ordinary affairs of life duly to appreciate all the material facts when proved. Under these circumstances the opinions of witnesses must, of necessity be received.' Per Royce J in Clifford v. Richardson, 18 Vt. 626. So expert evidence by way of opinion of business is not admissible on the question as to whether a mark, or a combination of marks, resembles that of other goods and is likely to deceive purchasers. Macdonald v. Holland, 10 S. L. R. 175=41 Ind. Cas. 539, Sundishi Mills v. Juggi Lal, 24 A. L. J. 975.

- (a) The question is, whether the death of A was caused by poison. The opinions of experts as to the symptoms produced by the poison by which A is supposed to have died, are relevant.
- (b) The question is, whether A, at the time of doing a certain act, was, by reason of unsoundness of mind incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he was doing what was either wrong or contrary to law. The opinions of experts upon the question whether the symptoms exhibited by A commonly show unsoundness of mind, and whether such unsoundness of mind usually renders persons incapable of knowing the nature of the acts which they do, or of knowing that what they do is either wrong or contrary to law are relevant.

Origin of the rule The original character of the jury was that of witnesses to the facts, which they were called upon to decide from their own knowledge. They were expected to draw their conclusions and give their opinion as to the facts in issue. As has been seen, the development of the jury system eliminated from it that feature which required the jurymen to be persons who had original knowledge of the facts, and, in the final outcome, withdrew from their consideration any facts of which they had original knowledge, confining them to such facts only as should be presented to them at the trial. This left to the jury simply the duty of drawing conclusions from facts presented. In many cases it was impossible to present to the minds of the jury, who were supposed to have no previous knowledge, the facts in such detail as to furnish grounds for intelligent opinion. Sometimes this was due to the facts being so numerous, uncertain, or incapable of description, as to be difficult to present. At other times it happened that the matters about which it was necessary for the jury to form an opinion were of such a technical or scientific nature that, even were the facts presented to the jury, they would be incapable of forming an intelligent opinion. Fowler v Chodd, (1782) 3 Doug 157, was a case in which an engineer was called to show the effect of an embankment upon the filling up of a harbour. Lord Mansfield says "Mr Smeaton (the witness) understands the construction of harbours, the cause of their construction and how remedied. In matters of science no other witness can be called." Thornton v Assurance Co (1790) Peak 37, Beckwith v Sydebotham, (1807) 1 Camp 116. In such a case often juries had to be assisted by skilled persons. The furnishing of such assistance to the Court was a very ancient thing. It is probable that for a good while after witnesses were regularly allowed before the jury, experts were thought of in the old way, as being helpers of the Court, and the Court instructed the jury upon the points on which such aid was furnished. But at last the modern conception came in, which regards the experts as testifying, like other witnesses directly to the jury. Thayer Cas Ev (2nd Ed) p 672. So the final development of the practice as to the admission of opinion evidence was that in the class of cases mentioned it was allowed as an aid to the jury in making up their minds upon matters about which without it they might with difficulty come to an intelligent understanding. McKelvey's Ev § 134.

Principle An expert is a person having special skill in a particular subject—will by hypothesis usually be better able than the jury to draw inferences on such matters, so it occurs in practice that experts usually are able to be helpful with their opinions and are therefore usually—but not necessarily—allowed to state them. Thus, in practice opinions are receivable, from persons having special skill (whether the data in question have been personally observed by them or are stated to them), whenever that special skill enables them better than the jury, to draw inferences on the subject. Greenl Ev § 441(b).

When Opinion evidence of expert is admissible The principle underlying this section is clear enough, but in its application it often leads to what seem to be inconsistent results. All that can be said is that in each case the Court must decide the question on a careful consideration of the particular circumstances under which it arises, and if, in the judgment of the Court, the jury would be materially helped by the admission of the evidence, it is to be received. This does not mean that the jury are to receive opinion evidence merely because a witness can be produced who is better educated, has a wider range of knowledge and more acute reasoning powers, and who might therefore express opinions with more accuracy than the jurymen themselves. It is the nature of the subject matter under examination rather than the particular facts put before the jury, which must be looked to. The particular facts may be clear and undisputed, and yet the jury be utterly unable to draw any intelligent conclusion from them without the aid of outside opinion. Issues in respect to a disease, its causes and effects, which frequently arise in the cases, present instances of this sort. A skilled physician, qualified by education and experience, can arrive at an opinion where men in the ordinary walks of life would be utterly at a loss. Opinion in such cases is, by the nature of the subject made not only proper but necessary. In such a case there is no difficulty. It is in those cases which are nearer the line of practical everyday matter that the difficulties arise. When a witness, for example, is put before the jury to give his opinion as to whether a certain time of year was a proper time to set fire to fallow lands, whether a stable is an unsafe stable for horses, whether a fight is a 'prize fight' or whether the keeping of cows in connection with a hotel is unprofitable, the Court is presented with the question whether, because some men know more about the matters than others and more, it may appear that the jury is likely to know even after all the testimony is in, and their opinions may be submitted to aid the jury in arriving at a conclusion. All that need be said is that it rests in a sound discretion of the Court as to whether the subject is one which permits of opinion testimony being given. McKelvey's Et § 134. In Ferguson v Hubbell 97 N Y 507, 513-49 Am Rep 544, the rule in regard to the admission of expert testimony is thus well stated by Earl J: "It is not sufficient to warrant the introduction of expert testimony that the witness may know more of the subject of enquiry, and may better comprehend and appreciate it, than the jury, but to warrant its introduction, the subject of the enquiry must be one relating to some trade, profession, science, or art in which persons instructed therein by study or experience may be supposed to have more skill and knowledge than jurors of average intelligence may be presumed generally to have. The jurors may have less skill and experience than the witnesses, and yet have enough to draw their own conclusions, and do justice between the parties. When the facts can be placed before a jury, and they are of such a nature that jurors, generally are just as competent to form opinions in reference to them and draw inference from them as witnesses, then there is no occasion to resort to expert or opinion evidence." "The opinions of experts are in general, admissible whenever the subject is one a knowledge of which can only be acquired by special training or experience. When, however it is one upon which the jury are as competent to form an opinion as the witness or when the Court is assisted by assessors, (The Kestrel 1881, 6 P D 182, The Assyrian (1890) 63 L T 91 C A), such evidence will be rejected. Under the first head are included matters of science, art, and trade the genuineness of handwriting and foreign law." Halsbury Vol XII, p 480.

Expert. An expert witness is one who has devoted time and study to a special branch of learning and thus is especially skilled on the points on which he is asked to state his opinion. His evidence on such points is admissible to enable the tribunal to come to a satisfactory conclusion. Pouell Et 41. In Ardesco Oil Co v Gilson, 63 Pa St 146, the Court defined the term "expert" as follows: "An expert as the word imports, is one having had experience. No clearly defined rule is to be found in the books as to what constitutes an expert. Much depends upon the nature of the question in regard to which an opinion is asked." Experts, in the strict sense of the word are "persons instructed by experience." Bouvier's Law Dict. "An expert is from derivation of the word one instructed by experience, and to become one requires a course of previous habit or practice, or of study so as to be familiar with the subject." Nelson v Sun Mutual Ins Co 71 N Y 453. These are "men who have made the subject matter of enquiry the object of their particular attention or study." Per Fowler J in Page v Parker 40 N H 59. But more generally speaking the term includes all "men of science" as it was used by Lord Mansfield in Folkes v Chadd, 3 Doug 157, or "persons professionally acquainted with the science or practice." Strickland on Evidence p 48, or "conversant with the subject matter on questions of science, skill trade, and others of the like kind." Best Principles of Evidence § 346. The rule on the subject is stated by Mr Smith in his note to Carier v Boehm, 1 Sm L C 286 "on the one hand," he observes, "it appears to be admitted that the opinion of witnesses possessing peculiar skill is admissible, whenever the subject matter of enquiry is such that inexperienced persons are unlikely to prove capable of forming a correct judgment upon it without such assistance, in other words when it so far partakes of the nature

S 45 of science, is to require a course of previous habit, or study, in order to the attainment of a knowledge of it. See Talbot v. Chadd 3 Doug. 157, R v. Searle, 2 M & M 75 Thornton v. R I Insur Co Peake 2; Chamond v. Ingersoll Peake 11. While on the other hand it does not seem to be contended that the opinion of the witness can be received when the inquiry is into a subject-matter, the nature of which is not such as to require any peculiar habits or study, in order to qualify a man to understand it. It has been held unnecessary that the witness should be engaged in the practice of his profession or science, it being sufficient that he has studied it. Thus, the fact that the witness though he had studied medicine was not then a practising physician, was held to go merely to his credit. L v. Shuterlocke (1891) 2 Q B 766. Fallis v. Kidd 12 Ala 618 (1st) Stewart v. R 449. The term expert seems to imply both superior knowledge and practical experience in the art or profession but generally nothing more is required to entitle one to give testimony as an expert than that he has been educated in the particular art or profession. Rochester v. Chester 3 N H 385 Insular v. Holliston 8 C B 812, per Maule J. The Asst. Mint Master of Calcutta is an expert witness. Gill v. Emperor, 88 Ind Cas 848 = 1 I R 1925 Omdh 616. Thus hospital students dressers and unqualified practitioners may be permitted to testify as medical experts. Best, Law of Evidence, 10th Ed & 516 and accountant who are conversant with the business of life insurance as actuaries. Insley v. London and North Western Rail Co (1872) L R 8 Exch 221. So foreign law has frequently been proved by witnesses who, though not professional lawyers followed some occupation which gave them peculiar means of knowing the law in question. Faulder Doncht v. Thelluson 8 C B 519, Re Whiteleg (1899) 1 P 257, Halsbury Vol XIII p 481.

Pre-requisites of opinion—evidence by expert. "Matter of opinion is entitled to no weight with a Court or jury unless it comes from persons who first gave satisfactory evidence that they are possessed of such experience, skill or science in such matters as entitles their opinions to pass for scientific truth. Carr v. Northern Liberties 35 Pat & 321 (Am). Therefore to render the opinion of a witness admissible on the ground that it is the opinion of an expert, the witness must have special skill in the subject concerning which his opinion is sought to be given. Lanson Exp & Op 14 231. It is the duty of the Court to decide whether the expert is a competent witness or not. Bratton v. Sequelville, 5 Ex R 275 = 19 L J Ex 289. R v. Suerlock, (1891) 2 Q B 766. The house of A was destroyed by the orders of the officers of a municipality to prevent the spreading of a conflagration. A brings an action against the city for its value. The opinions of mere bystanders that the house would have taken fire and been consumed had it not been blown up by the authorities are inadmissible. The opinions of fire men and persons having particular knowledge and experience in reference to fires are admissible. Mayor of New York v. Pent 24 Wend 668 (Am). In delivering the judgment the Court said: "The broad rule to which the ancient law scarcely knew an exception is that testimony can relate merely to facts, and that the inferences from them are to be made by the jury. In ordinary cases the issues being strictly on the existence of facts capable of being proved or disproved by direct evidence opinion as well as hearsay must be excluded. But this general rule has been broken in upon by the admission of various classes of exceptions all resting upon the common grounds of necessity. Such necessity is allowed to exist when the facts in issue are not themselves accessible by evidence being either future probabilities or mere contingencies or else actual facts but not within positive knowledge. All of these must of necessity, be judged of only from other proved facts known generally to accompany or to indicate those in question, as for instance where the fact to be ascertained are inferred from some rule of art or science, or observed law of nature thus proved, the knowledge by which the existence of the unknown fact is inferred from the one proved may not fall within the range of ordinary information, but may be proved by professional or experienced witnesses having peculiar skill in some art trade or science relating to the subject. Thus the fact of certain appearances in a dead body having been proved, the subsequent question whether such appearances indicate poison is wholly out of the power of the best informed men to determine, unless they had made such subject a previous study. Again, the market value of an article at a given time, upon the allowance of the damages on which a jury has to pass, is frequently a question such as dealers in that article can alone decide. There it is a matter of necessity to call in the experienced or instructed opinion of such witnesses. No proof of the naked state of facts as to ship after a storm could perhaps enable a layman, however intelligent, to judge of those necessities which are often to be enquired into in marine contracts. Thus also in an action for negligently steering a ship, in Malton v Nesbit, 1 Cr & P 76, mere proof of the naked facts could not enable a jury of laymen to draw any inference, and experienced nautical men are called to prove whether facts of that kind amount to unjustifiable negligence. Opinion is admitted when a jury is incompetent to infer, without the aid of greater skill than their own, as to the probable existence of the facts to be ascertained, or the likelihood of their occurring from the facts actually proved before them. Indeed, it would be more logically accurate to say that mere opinions even of men, professional or expert are not admissible as such, but facts having been proved, men skilled in such matters may be admitted to prove the existence of mere general facts or laws of nature or the course of business as the case may be so as to enable the jury to form an inference for themselves. Thus the existence of certain appearances in the dead body having been proved the chemist testifies that such appearances invariably or generally indicate the operation of some powerful chemical agent. His scientific opinion is, in fact, his testimony to a law of nature. All these are testimonies to general facts which the jury can ascertain in no other way, and which, when proved, afford them the means of drawing their own conclusions from the whole mass of testimony taken together. The same reason of absolute necessity has compelled the admission of evidence of opinion in certain cases where the poverty of human language makes it absolutely impossible to separate in words the minute and transient facts observed by the witnesses from the inference as to some other facts, irresistibly connected with the former in his own mind. Lauson Exp & Op Ev 236.

But the opinion of an expert is inadmissible where the subject is one not of special skill or knowledge, but of general observation or experience or which can be better answered by persons in another calling or is upon a question which the Court or jury can themselves decide on the facts. Lauson Exp & Op Ev 238, see also, Sheo Sahal v Arjun, 56 Ind Cas 879=1 P L 1 136. Therefore it is apparent that before expert testimony can be admitted two things, must be proved namely (1) that the subject is such that expert testimony is necessary and (2) that the witness in question is really an expert. In deciding the second question the Court is to decide further what are the qualifications necessary to entitle a witness to depose as an expert. Chicago v Springfield, 67 Ill 142 (Am) Burr Jones § 369.

Qualification of an expert. While it is clear that the witness, in order to be competent as an expert must show himself to be skilled in the business or profession to which the subject relates there is no precise rule as to the mode in which such skill or experience must be acquired. Thus, the witness may have become qualified by actual experience or long observation without having made a study of the subject. On the other hand, he may be an expert although his knowledge has been derived from the study of the subject, and not from actual experience or practice in the business or profession. Thus, it has sometimes been held that a physician may give opinions as to matters connected with his profession or with medical science although in its own practice he may not have had experience as to such matters, and his knowledge in respect thereto is derived from study only even though he may not have made the disease under enquiry a specialty. Hathaway v Natural Life Ins Co 48 Vt 335. On the same principle one who is familiar with the diseases of men may be allowed to testify as an expert concerning the diseases of animals. State v Sheets, 89 N C 513. Courts will take notice that certain pursuits are so intimately connected with others as to give the following one of such pursuits unusual facilities for becoming acquainted with the other and if the occupation and experience of the witness have been such as to give him the requisite means of knowledge of the

S 45 subject he may be competent as an expert, although engaged in some other occupation (Detroit v Van Stenburgh, 17 Mich 99), or even if he has abandoned the business to which the enquiry relates Bearss v Copley, 10 N Y 93. It is necessary that the witness should possess the requisite skill either from actual study, experience or observation. The mere opportunity of obtaining such skill does not suffice. It must be shown that he is skilled or scientific or at least that he has superior actual skill or knowledge in relation to the question to that possessed by ordinary witnesses or observers. Page v Parker, 40 H N 47. To entitle a witness to answer as an expert, it is true "he must in the opinion of the Court have special acquaintance with the immediate line of inquiry, yet he need not be thoroughly acquainted with the differentia of the specific specialty under consideration. If this were necessary, few experts could be admitted to testify certainly no Courts could be found capable of determining whether such experts were competent. A general knowledge of the department to which the specialty belongs would seem to be sufficient" Washington v Cole 6 Ala 212. The value of the testimony is enhanced or depreciated according to the experience or study of the witness. Wells v Leek 151 Pa 431, Burr Jones § 368.

Expert testimony—whether preliminary question for the Court. In America when a witness is offered as an expert it becomes a preliminary question for the Court to determine whether he has the requisite qualifications (Scott v State 141 Ala 1) and for the purpose of determining this question, the witness himself may be examined as to his opportunities and means of knowledge of the subject under enquiry. Broadman v Woodman, 47 N H 120. Other witnesses may be called upon this preliminary question, and those who are qualified may give their opinions thereon. Mendum v Commonwealth, 6 Rand (Va) 704. But the expert cannot give his own opinion as to his own qualifications. Broadman v Woodman 47 N H 120. Braham v State, 143 Ala 28. It is clear that the Court must decide the question of the qualification of the witness and when it is made to appear prima facie that the witness possesses the requisite qualification the Court may admit the testimony, and is not bound to allow a preliminary cross-examination. Sarle v Arnold, 7 R I 582, Burr Jones § 369. In India this practice does not obtain. In the examination in chief the competency of the expert must be shown, otherwise his testimony will be excluded. Woodroffe Esq 3rd Ed 426. For this purpose he should be examined as to his opportunities and means of knowledge. But it seems that he cannot give his opinion as regards his own qualification. No exact standard by which to determine the competency of the witness exists and much is necessarily left to the discretion of the trial Court. Forgey v First National Bank, 66 Ind 123 (1m). It is generally held by the American Courts that the regular cross-examination may fully go into the question of the competency of the witness and if it appear that he is not a qualified expert witness his testimony will be weakened or entirely destroyed. Davis v State 35 Ind 496, Burr Jones § 369. When a witness has been adjudged competent upon the preliminary examination, opposing proof to his incompetency is to be addressed to the jury to affect the value of his testimony and not to the Court for the purpose of excluding his testimony. Rag Exp Test 50. The right to a full cross-examination is thus secured, and if it turns out the witness is not qualified the Court should take no notice of his evidence. This preliminary right of cross-examination affords full opportunity to discover the extent of the qualifications of the witness and prevents material harm to the party against whom he testifies. Burr Jones § 369.

Mode of examination of experts—Hypothetical questions. It may be plainly inferred from what has already been stated that the testimony of those found qualified as experts is not confined to facts within their own personal knowledge but that they may give their opinions upon an assumed state of facts. Indeed it is probably true that in the majority of cases in which experts are examined their testimony is based upon hypothetical questions, or upon facts assumed for the purpose of the trial and presented in some other form. Indle Raghuji v Empress 11 C L R 69=9 C 455 Empress v Meher Ali 15 C

589 While it is impossible to lay down any unyielding rule as to the form of the hypothetical question in such cases, it is clear that the question should be so framed as to fairly and clearly present the state of facts which the counsel claims to be proved and which the testimony on his part tends to prove. Couley v. People, 83 N Y 461=33 Am Rep 464. So opinion of experts can be asked as regards facts proved by other witnesses. R v Wright, R & R 456, 1 Emuel v. Bell, 1 C & K 312. If the other side does not think all the relevant facts are included in such question, it may include them in questioning propounded in cross-examination. Hurr Jones § 371. Each side has the right to an opinion from the witness upon the hypothesis reasonably consistent with the evidence, and if eagerly presented in the examination on one side, it may be fully represented on the other, the whole examination being within the control of the Court, whose duty it is to see that it is fairly and reasonably conducted. Com v. Coyle 104 Pa St 117 (4m). In other words, the hypothetical case submitted by one side to an expert need not embrace all the testimony on the subject, the other side however, having the right to submit a different hypothetical case. Burt v. State 10 S W R 1000. And in putting a hypothetical case the party may assume as proved all that the evidence tends to prove, although the Court may not regard it as proved. Quinn v. Higgins, 63 Wis 664, Lauson Exp & Op Et 167.

The substance of a hypothetical question must have a direct and intimate connection with the testimony in the case, otherwise the attention of the jury would be distracted from the issue and the very object of hearing the evidence defeated. If there is no testimony in the case tending to prove the facts assumed in the hypothetical question, such question is improper. The facts must be proved or offered to be proved. Turnbull v. Richardson, 69 Mich 400. Where there is no evidence to prove such facts or if the facts assumed in the interrogatory are wholly irrelevant to the issue, the question should be excluded. People v. Angsbury 97 N Y 701. If the foundation for the evidence is removed there is of course no basis for the super structure. Burr Jones § 371.

In Lord Melville's Trial, 29 How St Tr 1065, Lord Emslin L C said: "If you take away the foundation upon which it is made, which is matter for the Court afterwards, there is an end to the super-structure. All that the witness has done is to establish by calculation that such a stock from such a time will produce so much. He does not himself prove any fact, and the calculations he has made must therefore depend upon the facts which are proved by other." In R v. W. Naghten 10 Cl & F 200, 201, the question for the Judges was "Can a medical man conversant with the disease of insanity, who never saw the prisoner previously to the trial, but who was present during the whole trial and the examination of the witnesses, be asked his opinion as to the state of the prisoner's mind at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, etc?" Maule J said: "In principle it is open to this objection, that as the opinion of the witness is founded on those conclusions of fact which he forms from the evidence, and as it does not appear what these conclusions are, it may be that the evidence he gives is on such an assumption of facts as makes it irrelevant to the enquiry." Higmore § 672. The question is not necessarily to be rejected by the Court although the facts assumed by counsel to be true are not proved or although the question does not state the facts as they actually exist. The facts are generally in dispute, and it is sufficient if the question fairly states such facts as the proof of the examiner fairly tends to establish, and fairly presents his claim or theory. Burr Jones § 371.

Form of Questions. Policy as well as principle, require the form of the question to be expressly hypothetical because otherwise the jury, and perhaps the witness, may be misled by the statement as a proved or admitted fact, of that which is as yet only an assertion of counsel or of witnesses. Chalmers v. My Co 164 Mass 532, Higmore § 683. A classical form as suggested by Shaw C J in Woodbury v. O'bear, 7 Gray 471, was this "If certain facts, assumed by the question to be established by the evidence, should be found true by the jury, what would be his opinion, upon the facts thus found true, on question at issue?" A question should not involve the necessity of the witness finding a controverted fact in order to reconcile conflicting evidence to give

S 45 his opinion. It should be put to the witness hypothetically, whether, if certain facts testified are true he can form an opinion, and what that opinion is. In State v. Windsor, 5 Hui (Del) 512, the form of the question was very fully considered, and the following form of question was adopted. 'You have all the evidence in the case—supposing the jury to be satisfied that the facts and the circumstances testified to by the other witnesses, are true, what is your opinion as a medical man of the state of the prisoner's mind, at the time of the commission of the alleged crime? Was the prisoner in your opinion, at the time of doing the act, under any and what kind of insanity or delusion, and what would you expect would be the conduct of a person under such circumstances? In Commonwealth v. Rogers, 7 Met (Mass) 500=41 Am Dec 458, Shaw, C J adopted the following form. 'If the symptoms and indications testified to by other witnesses are proved and if the jury are satisfied of the truth of them, whether in their opinion, the party was insane, and what was the nature and character of that insanity, what state of mind did they indicate, and what they would expect would be the conduct of such a person in any supposed circumstances.' But there is no exclusive formula. Hunt v. Louell Gas Light Co 8 Allen (Mass) 169, for the mode of stating the assumed premises, there is no fixed rule. Wigmore § 683. The object is to obtain the opinion of the expert as to the matter of skill or science which is in controversy, and at the same time to exclude their opinion as to the effect of the evidence in establishing controverted facts. Questions adopted to this end may assume a great variety of form. In McCarthy v. Boston Durl Co, 165 Mass 165=42 N E 668, there are several useful guides for framing the question. (1) It is important that the form of the question should be such as not to require or permit the witness to draw conclusions of fact from the evidence in the case and to give an opinion based wholly or in part upon such conclusions. (2) A witness ought never to be permitted to give an opinion upon the effect of evidence in establishing facts which do not depend upon his knowledge as an expert. (3) Where the evidence is conflicting or relates to many details or where inferences of facts must be drawn from the evidence in order to be reasonably certain of the grounds on which an opinion is based it is usually necessary that the facts should be stated hypothetically. (4) It is impossible to lay down an absolute rule for all cases, and some discretion must undoubtedly be left to the Justice presiding at the trial. Objection to the form of the question must be specific or it will be held to have been waived. Since the facts sought to be presented in a hypothetical question may be very numerous, it sometimes happens that objection is made to the length of the question. But this is a matter to be regulated largely by the discretion of the trial Judge. Burr Jones § 377.

Hypothetical Questions on cross examinations. Just as the cross examination of an ordinary witness may involve questions which test his memory observation and bias, so in cross-examining one who takes the stand as a skilled witness, his judgment upon germane matters may be tested by assuming premises and asking his conclusions. Wigmore § 684.

Expert evidence and personal knowledge. If a physician visits a person and from actual examination or observation becomes acquainted with his mental condition, he may give an opinion respecting such mental condition at that time. There is no more reason why he may not do this than why he might not testify that he saw a certain person at a certain time and that he was then labouring under an epileptic fit or an attack of typhus fever or had been stricken down and rendered unconscious by an apoplectic stroke. State v. Feller 25 Ia 75, per Dillon C J, Wigmore § 675. Similarly in Bellafontaine & I R Co v. Bailey, 11 Oh St 337 Brinkerhoff J said 'Undoubtedly if the witness had been a stranger to the actual facts it would then have been necessary to assume a state of facts as the foundation of any opinion he might give but no such assumption it seems to us is necessary when the witness is or is properly presumed to be himself personally acquainted with the material facts of the case. If an expert may give his opinion on facts testified to by others we see no reason why he may not do so on facts presumably within his personal knowledge, and if his knowledge of any material fact be wanting or defective, the parties have ample opportunity to show it by cross examination and by testimony aliunde" Ibid S 45.

An expert witness may be witness of both the parties There is no reason why a scientific witness should not be a witness of one or more or all of the parties to a legal proceeding. To a professional man it matters not which party calls him as a witness. What is of concern to such a witness is the accuracy of the scientific opinion which he expresses, not the party by which such evidence is tendered. Lala Singh v Bejoy Pratap, 41 C L I 300=87 Ind C 1534=A I R 1925 Cal 763

Foreign law Under the English law as well as under the Indian Evidence Act the Court cannot take judicial notice of foreign law. "The laws of other nations" says Di Greenleaf 'and states—not being laws of the forum at all except by adoption—will not be (judicially) noticed. Greenleaf § 6 (b), R v Governor (1907) 1 K B 696, see section 57 infra. According to both English and Indian law, foreign law must be proved as fact. Khody v Suamabadha 22 L W 679. But in India when the Court has to form an opinion as regards foreign law, any statement of such law contained in a book purporting to be printed or published under the authority of the Government of such country is relevant. Ide section 38 supra, Palunappa v Nagappa A I R 1930 Mad 146. An expert in foreign law is no doubt called to state what the law of a foreign country on a particular point is, but where the law is laid down in a particularly elaborate manner in any code of a foreign country, the Court should interpret the Code as best as it can and it should not rely on the outside opinion however eminent, as to the interpretation of that Code. Ibid. But in England foreign law cannot be proved by production of such books. There it should be proved as matters of fact. Mostyn v Fabrigas 1 Cowp 161, 174, Sussex Peerage Case 11 Cl & F 81, Brenan's Case 10 Q B 493 (498), Prouse v E d A S S Co, 13 Moo P C 484. So foreign law must be proved on an oath and not by mere certificates of experts. Previous decisions upon the same point are admissibile, for being a question of fact it must be decided on evidence and not on authority. McCormick v Garnett, 5 D M & G 278. Another reason for this is that the law is continually liable to change. Phup Et 3rd Ed 342. So foreign law is to be proved by expert testimony. The main controversy is whether a witness to foreign law must be by profession an advocate, attorney or judge or whether a layman, if he claims knowledge may be trusted to speak as to this state of the law. The earlier practice in England seems to have been very liberal. Ide Sussex Peerage Case 11 Cl & F 117, 134, Vanderdunet v Thellusson, 8 C B 812, 824. R v Dent, 1 C & K 97. But in Richardson v Anderson, 1 Camp 66, Lord Ellenborough insisted on the necessity of a professional character in the witness. see also Wilson v Wilson (1903) P 157, R v Naguib, (1917) 1 K B 309. Bradford v Bradford (1918) McLeod Pro 140, Wignore § 564. But the decision is not uniform on this point. The following have been held competent.—A foreign Judge barrister or solicitor practising in the Courts of his own country. (Pay § 1425. Bristow v Sequerville 5 Ex 275). A Governor General of Hongkong though a non lawyer, as to the marriage law there. (Cooper King v O K 1900 P 65). A colonial Attorney General, although a non lawyer as to the law of his colony. (Sussex Peerage Case). A Roman Catholic bishop holding the office of coadjutor to a vicar apostolic in England as to Roman marriage law. A French Vice-Consul in England as to the commercial law of France. (Lacon v Higgins, 3 Strk 178). A Persian ambassador, or secretary of embassy as to Persian law. (Re Dost Ali Khan 6 P D 6). A Belgian merchant and commissioner of stocks and bills of exchange as to the Belgian law affecting such bills. (Vanderdunet v Thellusson supra). Similarly a Chilean notary public can give opinion as regards Chilean testamentary law, so also an English merchant trading in Chile can give evidence as regards marriage registers to be kept by the Chilean law. Abbott v Abbott, 29 L J P M & A 57. Phup Et 3rd Ed 341. But Colonial law cannot be proved by a barrister practising before the Privy Council. Cartwright v Cartwright 26 W R 693. A Roman Catholic priest was held not competent to prove Scotch marriage law. R v Savage, 10 East, 281. But a

S 45 mere tradesman in a foreign country can prove the law of that country R v Brampton, 10 East 287 R v Naguib (1917) 1 K B 59 C C A A person to become competent to give opinion on foreign law must be one who is expected to know the law from training, Petroleum v Deen, (1921) 1 K B 111 Foreign law on particular topic is a question of fact Khoday v Suammadha, A I R 1926 M 218 A Shm marriage law is not foreign law Ali v Ibrahim, 47A 823

Justice Story on Proof of Foreign law 'In general, foreign laws are required to be verified by the sanction of an oath unless they can be verified by some high authority such as the law respects not less than it respects the oath of an individual (Church v Hubbard, 2 Cranch 237) The usual mode of authenticating foreign laws (as it is of authenticating foreign judgments) is by an exemplification of a copy under the Great Seal of a State or by a copy proved to be a true copy by a witness who has examined and compared it with the original or by the certificate of an officer properly authorized by law to give the copy which certificate must itself also be duly authenticated (Church v Hubbard 2 Cranch 238, Paclard v Hill, 2 Wend 411 But foreign unwritten laws, customs and usages may be proved and indeed must ordinarily be proved by parol evidence The usual course is to make such proof by the testimony of competent witnesses, instructed in the laws, customs and usages under oath Church v Hubbard 2 Cranch 237, Dalrymple v Dalrymple 2 Hagg Consist App pp 115-144, Brush v Hulius 4 Johns Ch 120 Mostyn v Fabrigas Comp 171 Sometimes, however certificates of persons in high authority have been allowed as evidence without other proof' Story on Conf of Law § 641 647 Green L § 486 Juris Dormoy 3 Hagg L 67, Le v Pictou 30 Howells State Tr 515-673 When foreign law is allowed to be proved by oath of experts, he is allowed to refer to accredited authorities on the subject for refreshing memory Nelson v Lord, 8 Berr 527

Science or Art Expert testimony is usually thought of in connection with enquiry as to technical or abstruse scientific questions—questions requiring an essential to intelligent judgment, a special training of the mind—and this is the field in which the usefulness of such testimony is most often felt The physiology of human body and the condition and operation of any of its functions have been a fruitful field for this class of testimony Young v Malepeace, 103 Mass 50 Mckelvey v Fv § 138 So on questions of science or skill or relating to some art or trade persons instructed therein by study or experience may give their opinions The question is whether a certain blow was sufficient to cause death, the opinion of a surgeon is admissible State v Powell 7 N J L 249 So also where the question is whether two pieces of wood are parts of the same stick of natural growth the opinions of workers in wood are admissible Com v Joote 105 Mass 456 'Art in its legal significance embraces every operation of human intelligence, whereby something is produced out of nature and the term science includes all human knowledge which has been generalised and systematized and has obtained method, relations and the forms of law' Per Davis J in Atchison & Co v U S 15 Ct Cl 140

Physicians and Surgeons While it would be impracticable to deal with every department of science or art in which expert testimony might be given we purpose selecting those classes which in number and range of decisions may be said to cover practically the entire field Foremost among these is the expert testimony called for from medical and surgical practitioners and the following details of the various branches, upon which such evidence has been called for and received will disclose only portion of the area covered by the number of cases which increases with every discovery in either medicine or surgery The opinions of physicians and surgeons may be admitted to show the physical condition of a person, the nature of the disease, whether temporary or permanent the effect of disease or physical injuries upon the body or mind as well as in what manner or by what kind of instrument they were made, or at what time wounds or injuries of a given character might have been inflicted whether they would probably be fatal or actually did produce death the cause symptoms, nature and peculiarities of a disease, and whether it would be likely to cause death, the probable future consequences of injury, when the consequences anticipated are such as in the ordinary course of events may be reasonably expected to happen, and not merely speculative or possible. While it is improper to ask a physician how certain wounds or injuries were actually given, as this would be trespassing upon the province of the jury, he may be asked by what kinds of weapons wounds of a given description might be caused or whether wounds of a given character were caused before death (Enell, Med Juris 31), and after having made a post mortem examination, a physician may testify whether a woman was pregnant at the time of her death (State v Smith, 33 Me 369 = 54 Am Dec 478), or whether the conditions disclosed indicated the cause of death (Manufacturers Assn v Dorgan, 58 Fed 945). He may also testify as to the probable effect of a given course of treatment or medicines (Matteson v New York C R Co, 35 N Y 487), what would be proper treatment under a given state of facts (Wright v Hardy, 22 Wis 318), the probabilities of recovery from the effects of an injury (Wilt v Lukers, 8 Watts (Pa) 227), what under certain circumstances might cause death or a physical condition of a given character (State v Powell, 7 N J L 244) and as to questions of sanity or insanity (Gardner Peetage, Le March R, Davis v State, 35 Ind 496) also under a given state of facts insanity is real or feigned (State v Hayden, 51 Vt 296), and whether or not great mental anxiety and suffering would tend to develop insanity where there is an hereditary predisposition (Dearnet v Commonwealth, 75 Va 867). Upon the question of the general medical practitioner testifying in mental cases, there is a diversity of decision; in American Courts, the preponderance of authority being in favour of accepting, all educated and practising physicians as experts whether they have given special attention to the disease of insanity or not (Blup v Lau § 514). If they are practising physicians and have studied medical jurisprudence, the Courts are inclined to accept them, more especially as to the extent of the witness's acquaintance with the subject may always be inquired into, to enable the jury to estimate the weight of his evidence. It has frequently been held that the training and experience of physicians are such as to give them knowledge superior to that possessed by ordinary witnesses concerning the disease of animals, and partly on this ground and partly because of the difficulty of procuring other expert testimony upon the subject ordinary physicians are allowed to give opinions as to the causes, nature and effects of disease among animals (State v Sheets, 89 N C 543). As a preliminary question as to his qualification as an expert in medical witness may be asked whether the examination made by him was careful or merely superficial (Northern Pac R Co v Urtin, 158 U S 271). The evidence of an expert veterinary surgeon is admissible as to the proper treatment for a sick horse its condition and the cause of such condition (Welch v Fransoli, 46 Wash 530, Burr Jones 378). It is not the business of a medical officer to state whether the injuries he is speaking of amount to grievous hurt or not, but only to describe the nature of the injuries (Empress v Balwant, A W N 1883, 296). The evidence of a medical man, who has seen a corpse and made a post mortem examination, is admissible in an enquiry regarding the death to prove the nature of the injuries observed by him and as expert evidence as to the manner of the infliction of the injuries and as to the cause of death, whereas a medical man that has not seen the corpse can give only expert evidence (Roglani Sing v Empress, 9 C 455 = 11 C L R 369). So a medical man who has not seen the body and who had not been present at the post mortem could be asked to give his opinion about the cause of death, after placing before him the appearance of the body as spoken to by the medical man who made the post mortem examination, together with the signs spoken to by him as having been noticed by him when making the post mortem examination (Queen Empress v Meher Ali, 15 C 789). Where the general condition and state of health of a person in issue and it is sought to prove that owing to a particular disease from which he was suffering he was unable to write, isolated extracts from medical works ought not to be preferred to evidence of a medical

S 45 man who should be examined with reference to the symptoms deposed to by the witnesses and to whom extracts might be put Sheo Bahadur v Beni Bahadur, 6 O L J 178=51 Ind Cas 419

Testimony of physicians and others as to poisons Toxicology is regarded in some jurisdiction as part of scientific knowledge of physicians, and to a certain extent this is justified by the course of education of medical men. Thus it is that chemists and physicians, who are qualified by proper study and experience, may testify as to the nature of poisons and their effect on the system and the symptoms which they produce. But the fact that the witness is a physician does not necessarily qualify him to testify as an expert concerning the presence of poison in the human system since he may be wholly lacking in the requisite knowledge of chemical science. Although it is usual for experts to subject compounds to a chemical analysis before testifying whether they are poisonous or as to their ingredients and although this has sometimes been held indispensable, the better rule is that the opinion may be received, although this test has been omitted, it being a matter which affects the weight rather than the competency of the testimony State v Stagle 88 N C 630, Burr Jones § 379

Mechanics and machinists as experts When a witness shows himself expert in any particular art or craft to admit of an examination properly addressed to persons of skill in that department of industry, he is competent to give an opinion upon matters of which the jury could not be expected to judge accurately from the mere detail of facts Cole v Clark 8 Wis 328. Hence it is that the opinions of machinists and artisans may be received as evidence when they have by their experience gained an acquaintance with the subject not common to others and which may aid the Court or jury in coming to a conclusion Huggins v Southern R Co 148 Ala 153. Thus their opinions are admissible as to the proper mode of doing work, as in the erection of buildings (Harer v Fenney 36 Iowa 80) the proper mode of constructing machinery (Sheldon v Booth 50 Iowa 209) and the comparative merits of different machines (James v Hodson 47 Vt 127). So they may give their opinions as to the value of labour, services or materials necessary for a specific work (Hough v Cool, 69 Ill 581) or as to the time necessary to complete or perform it (Swain v Anglee 17 Cal 416 (4m)) or as to the proper mode of measuring or estimating such work (Shuttle v Amessey, 40 Iowa) or as to the mode of doing work in such manner as to comply with a certain contract (Ogden v Parsons, 2 How (U S) 167), or as to the amount or kind of work done or capable of being done by certain machinery (People v Golsworth) 130 Cal 600) or that which a certain force of men could do (Salvo v Duncan 49 Wis 151) or whether a certain mode of operating a given machine would be safe as well as whether the machine itself was safe (Gilbert v Guild 141 Mass 601) Burr Jones § 380

Experts in agriculture As illustrations of the same principle, the opinions of those skilled in farming and agriculture may be received as to the proper mode of cultivating and fertilizing land as well as to the qualities of soil the probable amount and value of the products or crops of land under given circumstances or the yield of a certain crop of the values of land, and of its use the probable amount of injury to crops occasioned by trespass or other causes also as to value age and weight of domestic animals, and as to the diseases and proper management of stock. Milk experts are competent to testify whether certain liquid exhibited to them looked and tasted like milk and water or not Burr Jones § 382

Insurers and insurance The opinions of persons specially skilled therein are admissible on questions arising out of the contract of insurance Laird v Expert of Op Ft 31 Thornton v Royal Exchange Ins Co Peake N P 26 Belvuth v Syllebotham 1 Camp 116. In the last case Lord Ellenborough in admitting the evidence said 'It was like examining a physician or surgeon to say whether upon such and such symptoms a person whose life was insured could at the time of the insurance have been in good state of health'

Other artists and scientists "Upon questions relating to arts or sciences the opinions of persons who have made the subject matter of inquiry the object of particular study and attention are admissible. The following have been held admissible — S 45

Handwriting Opinion evidence is admissible to prove handwriting. The reason for the exception is plain. Unless a signature or writing has been made in the presence of a witness who can afterwards identify it, the only possible proof of handwriting is opinion evidence, and opinion evidence of persons specially qualified to testify. McKeeley's Ev § 144. An opinion of an expert, based upon careful comparison by him of the disputed writing with a genuine specimen is generally held admissible. The English common law doctrine with regard to the subject will be found discussed fully in Doe v Sucker, 5 Ad & L 703. The Judges in that case were evenly divided (Lord Denman and Mr Justice Willes favouring, and Justices Coleridge and Patteson opposing) upon the question of admitting the testimony of an expert who had made an examination of admittedly genuine specimens on the first day of the trial, and was called to testify on the second, and at that time stated that he thought he had acquired a knowledge of the handwriting in question sufficient to enable him to tell whether the particular specimen was genuine. The Judges, however, recognize with unanimity the well established English common law doctrine that comparison of hands by the jury or by witnesses will not be allowed upon specimens introduced for that purpose. For purposes of comparison it is held that only original specimens may be used; press copies will not do. Lord Denman, in this case speaks thus of this class of evidence: "On the question whether handwriting, looked at by itself is genuine or forged the cases appear to me to have justly exploded the notion that bare inspection by the most skilful person can furnish means for forming an opinion. I do not indeed understand how such evidence could be rejected if a witness should swear that his habits gave him the requisite skill, but I do not think that either Court or jury would believe him, or place the least reliance on his opinions. Practically therefore this chapter may be considered as expunged from the book of evidence." "But where," says Mr H D Fries, "in point of reason, is the objection to a proof by comparison of hands as founded upon an inspection at the trial? It will surely be admitted that the

S 45 real object is the investigation of truth, and by the indiscriminate rejection of a means of establishing the truth, which in many instances must be more convincing than the evidence actually received, there is a frequent risk of the failure of justice. Every danger which may result from the case of forgery must operate at least with equal force when the deception is aided by the comparison being made, not with the immediate object of the senses, where the erroneous impressions of one person may be corrected by the more accurate inspection of another but with the traces in the memory errors and imperfections of which are beyond the reach of scrutiny. What is the common evidence of knowledge but an act of comparison—a comparison of the object presented to the sight with the object imprinted by memory in the mind with the image and copy of supposed reality? And when the comparison is made, not with this imperfect and fallacious copy, but with an undisputed original applied with the skill and experience of persons habitually devoted to similar enquiries, it is deemed not only a matter of technical caution but an essential point of constitutional liberty, to reject the assistance which it may naturally be expected to afford. An expert of the most accurate talents comparing the characters of admitted writings of an individual through a continued series of years with the character of a disputed piece can not be held to offer his opinion, whilst the knowledge and familiarity that the mind may be supposed to have acquired from the previous perusal of the very writings or even from the casual inspection of a single act is received and acted upon without objection. Mr H D Evans, Notes to Pothier II, 159 That note was written by Mr Evans in 1806. But even in 1836, we find that the scientific aspects of such testimony did not commend themselves even to a great Judge like Lord Coleridge. In Doe v. Suchermore 5 A & E 705 (1836) the learned Judge said: The test of genuineness ought to be the resemblance, not to the formation of the letters in some other specimen or specimens, but to the general character of the writing, which is imputed on it as the involuntary and unconscious result of constitution, habit or other permanent cause and is therefore itself permanent. And we best acquire a knowledge of this character by seeing the individual write at times when his manner of writing is not in question or by engaging with him in correspondence either supposition giving reason to believe that he writes at the time not constrainedly, but in his natural manner. Assuming that no dispute exists as to the genuineness of the standard or the fairness with which it has been selected (still) such a comparison leads to no inference as to the general character of the handwriting. Higmore § 1993. 'Though the opinion rule' says Prof Higmore then, would admit expert testimony, yet there is further urged an objection resting mainly on the inactive version of the earlier Judges to a novel method of testimony—an objection which the more explicitly it is framed the weaker its legitimate influence appears, namely the objection that the opinion of a handwriting expert is in general inferior to that of an ordinary person who has seen the party write or his correspondence with him. Higmore § 1993.

Objection based on unfair selection of specimen. An expert has no personal knowledge as regards the handwriting of a person in question. He is to give his opinion as regards the genuineness of handwriting by making comparison with an admitted specimen placed before him. Therefore in determining whether the witness's source of knowledge or opinion is adequate it has to be considered whether the specimens taken as indicating the type of writing are fair ones. Higmore § 1990. That that was also a ground of objection against expert testimony in Common Law Courts will be proved from the observation of Dallas J in Burr v. Hooper Holt N P 421 where he said: 'Comparison of handwriting has been rejected upon the ground that the specimens may be unfairly selected (and as such it may be) calculated to serve the party producing them and therefore not exhibiting a fair example of general character of the handwriting. See also the observation of Coleridge J in Doe v. Suchermore, 5 A & E 705. But this objection raised by the great Judges can be met by two different ways, namely (1) only admittedly genuine documents should be placed before the handwriting expert for comparison (vide Doe v. Suchermore, per Williams J) or (2) the documents to be placed before the expert should be limited to the documents which are already in the case. The effect of this is to determine the selection usually by the chance requirements of the litigation and not to leave it to a prejudiced choice from all sources. Idé Holland B, in R v Morgan, 1 Moo & R 134 Wigmore § 1999 In Lyon v Lyman, 9 Conn 61, Dagget J, further points out that this objection if valid, is equally applicable to the case of other handwriting testimony and indeed to all testimony whatever. In that case he observed "It is said by Starke that an unfair selection of specimens be made for the purpose of comparison. It is not suggested however, that any advantage would thereby be given to one party over the other. The same objection lies against the introduction of witnesses who are to testify to their knowledge of the handwriting. In both cases proof may be expected favourable to the party introducing it, and it will always be selected with that view. Wigmore § 1999

Objection on the principle of confusion of Issues. The last though not the least objection is based on the principle of confusion of the issues. The expert has got no personal knowledge of the specimen in question, so that the genuineness of the specimen must be proved like all other evidence. This additional proof of genuineness would so complicate and confuse the issues as to be undesirable and that therefore the expert's testimony, to which it is the essential foundation must fall with it. Wigmore § 2000 This is thus forcefully stated by Lord Coleridge J in Doedem Hudd v Snelmore 5 A & E 706. If the points which I have just supposed to be conceded (genuineness of specimen and fairness of selection) be brought into question, other and more serious objections arise to this mode of proof. If the genuineness be disputed a collateral issue is raised, and that upon every paper used as a standard,—an issue too in which the proof may be exactly of the same nature as that used in the principal cause, namely, merely comparison, with the additional disadvantage that the former standard is not produced and that the opposing party can avail himself of no counter proof.

If the fairness with which the standard has been selected is disputed this again must lead to a collateral inquiry in which the parties meet on unequal terms if no notice has been given (and no notice is required by our law) and which must tend to distract the jury, if notice be given and the discussion on the circumstances under which each specimen was written be fully gone into. It must always be borne in mind, in considering the rule of the English law on this subject, that it has reference to a trial by jury and that we have no provision for limiting the standard of comparison or regulating the manner of conducting the enquiry, both of which it seems, have been found necessary where such a mode of proof has been admitted. Wigmore Case Li, Case No 430

"In observing how this argument is to be disposed of," says Prof Wigmore "it must be remembered that there are three conceivable ways of supplying the fact of genuineness on the hypothesis of which the expert forms his opinion. (1) By testimony directed to the jury's consideration like all ordinary evidence—the jury, on retiring to consider the witnesses' opinion if the hypothesis of genuineness is proved and to ignore it like other hypothetical testimony, if the hypothesis is not proved, (2) By testimony directed to the Judge in the nature of proof preliminary to the admission of any piece of evidence and calling for the Judge's decision only, (3) By an admission of the opponent in the pleadings or for the purpose of the trial. Wigmore § 2000 It seems that the objection of Lord Coleridge is based on the assumption that the first of these modes as indicated by Prof Wigmore is the only one which is proper and possible and as such there is sufficient force in his Lordship's argument. But 'it is not a conclusive one because it proceeds on the old fallacy so common in our law of evidence that for the sake of avoiding a possible danger, or a harm likely to appear on one occasion in ten, a real and present good is to be rejected in every instance whatever.' Wigmore § 2000 But the better way to avoid this inconvenience is to choose the second mode of evidencing genuineness and proving it to the Judge. In University of Illinois v Spalding 71 N H 163—51 Att 731 Remick J thus said. The third objection—that to permit comparison with specimens not otherwise in evidence and admitted for the mere purpose of comparison, would introduce collateral issues, and confuse and distract the jury—is when applied to specimens neither admitted by the parties

S 45. nor found by the Court to be genuine, firmly grounded in reason and authority. The whole doctrine of comparison presupposes the existence of genuine standards. Comparison of a disputed signature in its use with disputed specimens would not be comparison in any proper sense. When the identity of anything is fully and certainly established you may compare other things with it which are doubtful to a certain whether they belong to the same class or not but when both are doubtful and uncertain, comparison is not only useless as to any certain result, but clearly dangerous, and more likely to be bewildering than to instruct a jury. If disputed signatures were admissible for the purpose of comparison, a collateral enquiry would be raised as to each standard and proof upon this enquiry would be comparison again, which would only lead to an endless series of issues each more unsatisfactory than the first and the case would thus be filled with issues aside from the real question before the jury. The true rule is that when a writing in issue is claimed on the one hand and denied on the other to be the writing of a particular person, any other writing may be admitted in evidence for the mere purpose of comparison with the writing in dispute whether the latter is susceptible of or supported by direct proof or not, but before any such writing shall be admissible for such purpose, its genuineness must be found as a preliminary fact by the presiding Judge upon clear and undoubted evidence. This involves indeed a marked departure from the common law. It does away with the common law limitation of comparison to standards otherwise in the case and hence with its exceptions and the controversy and confusion which have grown out of them. The value of comparison as a method of proof being now generally conceded juries being no longer too ignorant to derive benefit from the source and the danger of spurious specimens and the objections to collateral issues being fully met by requiring the genuineness of the standard to be determined as a preliminary fact by the trial Judge there remains it would seem, no satisfactory reason for the old limitations and exceptions. Higmore § 2000.

Thus stood the law in England down to 1854 when the Common Law Procedure Act of that year (17 & 18 Vict C 121 S 27) enacted that comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the Judge to be genuine, shall in civil cases be permitted to be made by witnesses, and such writings and the evidence of witnesses respecting the same may be submitted to the Court and the jury as evidence of the genuineness or otherwise of the writing in dispute. A few years later a section in precisely the same terms was incorporated into the Criminal Evidence Act 1865 (23 & 29 Vict C 18, S 8) so that the anomaly of a difference between the rules governing the admissibility of such evidence in civil and criminal cases no longer exists. Hills on Ev p 233.

Basis of expert testimony for proving handwriting. Manifest as are the points of difference in the infinite variety of nature in which one man differs from another, there is nothing in which men differ more than in handwriting, and when a man comes forward and says 'you believe that such a man is dead and gone he is not, I am the man' if I know the handwriting of the man supposed to be dead, the first thing I would do would be to say, sit down and write, that I may judge whether your handwriting is that of the man you assert yourself to be, if I know handwriting of the man with whom identity was claimed, I should proceed at once to compare with it the handwriting of the party claiming it. For that reason I shall ask you carefully to look at and consider the handwriting of the defendant, and to compare it with that of the undoubtedly Roger Pichborne, and with that of Arthur Orton. Pichborne Trial (Rex v Castro) charge of Chief Justice Cockburn (London Ed) p 762, Buller's New Prius 326 Peake's Ex 102 2 Evans Pothier on Obligations (3rd Am Ed) 156.

Men are distinguished by their handwriting as well as by their faces, for it is seldom that the shape of their letters agree, any more than the shape of their bodies. Therefore the likeness induces the presumption that they are the same. Buller's New Prius 236 2 Evans Pothier on Obligations (3rd Am Ed) 136. The general rule which admits proof of handwriting of a party is founded on the reason that in every person's manner of handwriting there is a peculiar prevailing character which distinguishes it from the handwriting of every other person" Strong v Breuer 17 Ala 706, 710 'The handwriting of every man has something peculiar and distinct from that of every other man, and is easily known by those who have been accustomed to see it' Peake's Et 192 S 45

"Caligraphic experts have for years asserted the possibility of investigating handwriting upon scientific principles, and the Courts have consequently admitted such persons to testify in cases of disputed handwriting. It is claimed that experiment and observation have disclosed the fact that there are certain general principles which may be relied upon in questions pertaining to the genuineness of handwriting. For instance it is asserted that in every person's manner of writing, there is a certain distinct prevailing character which can be discovered by observation, and being once known, can be afterwards applied as a standard to try other specimens of writing the genuineness of which is disputed. Handwriting, notwithstanding it may be artificial, is always, in some degree the reflex of the nervous organisation of the writer. There is in each person's handwriting some distinctive characteristic, which as being the reflex of his nervous organisation, is necessarily independent of his own will and unconscious forces the writer to stamp the writing as his own. Those skilful in such matters affirm that it is impossible for a person to successfully disguise in a writing of any length this characteristic of his penmanship." Rogers Op Cit 291 (292)

Who are experts in handwriting. The determination of this skill must of course depend on the discretion of the trial Courts as applied to the circumstances of each case. Forgery v Bank, 66 Ind 125. Various forms of test have been offered, no test should be regarded as absolute. In Doe v Sucker more, 5 A & F 749, Deman L C J said 'The witness must be conversant with the handwriting—a baker a printer, the officer of a Court of Justice to be entitled to any degree of authority' Wigmore § 2012. The following persons have been allowed to testify as experts in matters of handwriting—(1) Post Office officials (R v Coleman, 6 Cox 163, Philp Et 4th Ed p 356, Best Ev § 246), (2) Bank clerks, and (3) Lithographers. A solicitor can also give opinion as an expert if he has made a special study of the subject. R v Silverlock, (1894) 2 Q B 86. But police constables and police inspectors are not competent witnesses as experts. R v Crouch, 4 Cox 163, R v Hiltain, 9 Cox 448. R v Harvey 11 Cox 546.

When expert evidence to prove handwriting is admissible. The one thing required for the admission of the evidence of an expert witness as to handwriting is that the writing with which the comparison is made should be proved beyond question of doubt to be that of the person alleged. The evidence of an expert in handwriting is inadmissible, if there is no comparison with proved or admitted handwriting in open Court in the presence of party affected. Suresh Chandra v The King Emperor, 16 C W N 812=39 C 606=13 Cr L J 289=14 Ind Cas 753. It is the duty of the prosecution to adduce very satisfactory evidence to show that the documents given to the expert for comparison were in the handwriting of the person whose writing they purport to be. If the standard writings and the disputed writings were grouped separately before submission to the expert, and the expert knew what the prosecution wished to be proved, this circumstance would detract from the weight to be attached to the expert's testimony. Basrur Verkat Row v Emperor, 1912 M W N 125=11 M L T 93=14 Ind Cas 418=36 M 159. The report of the Government expert who never came into the witness box and whose report is not supported even by an affidavit is inadmissible in evidence and should not form the basis of the order directing the prosecution on a charge of forgery. Pearyal v Kedarnath, A I R 1923 All 601. Although it is true that under the Evidence Act comparison of handwriting is legitimate enough and the view of persons competent to express opinions may be in many cases of considerable value the opinions of those who have not carefully studied the art of caligraphy is not as a rule of very great utility. Indeed so uncertain and inexact is the science of the study of caligraphy that it has been for some years past the tendency to regard evidence even of experts as of somewhat inconclusive character. The mere fact that there is a resemblance between the signature alleged to be false and

S 45 A signature admitted to be genuine does not carry great weight. If a signature is denied the onus of proving it is on the party relying on its genuineness. Bathajer v Parmeshwar, 64 Ind Cas 274.

Value of expert testimony as regards handwriting. Some of the American Courts place very little value on such evidence. In a Michigan case, it was said "Every one knows how unsafe it is to rely upon any one's opinion concerning the niceties of penmanship. The introduction of professional experts has only added to the mischief instead of palliating it and the results of litigation have shown that there are often the merest pretenders to knowledge whose notions are pure speculation. Opinions are necessarily received and may be valuable but at best this kind of testimony is a necessary evil. Those who have had personal acquaintance with the handwriting of a person are not always reliable in their views, and single signatures apart from some known surroundings, are not always recognized by the one who made them. Every degree of removal beyond personal knowledge into the domain of what is sometimes called, with great liberality, scientific opinion, is a step toward greater uncertainty and the science which is so generally diffused is of very moderate value." Per Campbell J in Foster's Will, 34 Mich 21. Similarly in Turner v Hand, 1 Wall Jr 115, Mr Justice Grier said "Opinions with regard to handwriting are the weakest and least reliable of all evidence as against direct proof of the execution of an instrument." Turner v Hand, 3 Wall Jr 115. "The evidence of the genuineness of the signature based upon the comparison of handwriting and of the opinion of experts is entitled to proper consideration and weight. It must be confessed however that it is of the lowest order of evidence or of the most unsatisfactory character." Bosland v Blarath 33 Iowa 191, see also Whitaker v Parler 42 Iowa 583. Cowan v Beall, McArthur 221. So it is not safe to base conviction upon the opinion of an expert in handwriting where there is no corroboration. Sylant v King Emperor 2 A L J 444, Kalicharan v King Emperor, 6 A L J 184, Lalla v Emperor, 11 Cr L J 114. In re Jankata Rou 36 M 159. Gudhari v Emperor 86 Ind Cas 993. see also Sarajm v Haridas, 26 C W N 113. Jalal v Crown 18 P W R 1912. C1=15 Ind Cas 979. "Evidence of this kind" says Sir Alfred Hills "requires the most careful scrutiny. It is necessarily most often given by experts in handwriting. Experience shows that expert evidence of all kinds is so far apt to be misused as to require a great deal of watching, and much depends upon the mental characteristics of the witness—often not easy to ascertain. The great value of expert evidence as to handwriting is that the experience of an expert makes him quick to detect points both of likeness and of dissimilarity, which might easily escape an untrained observer. If these are substantial it is seldom that the Judge and jury especially with the aid of photography cannot follow the evidence and see for themselves how far it affords safe material for a conclusion. The experience of the editor as a Judge has certainly been that where this cannot be done the mere evidence of expert opinion is of little value." Hills On Lit p 233. To base a conviction on the evidence of an expert in handwriting as a general rule is very unsafe. There may be cases in which the handwriting is of such a peculiar character that the conclusion as to the identity of the writer is irresistible. Kali Charan v King Emperor, 6 A L J 184=9 Cr L J 498=2 Ind Cas 154. Comparison of handwriting is permissible in criminal no less than in civil cases. 2 Weir 759. But comparison of handwriting is a very hazardous test. Ambica v Vareswar 85 Ind Cas 72, =A I R 1925 Cal 145. A Judge should not himself compare signature without the help of other evidence. J C Galstaun v Sanatan Pal A I R 1925 Cal 485.

Finger impressions. Identification by finger prints has become a most important branch of criminal investigation and has proved to be of signal service both in the detection of crime and the identification of the offender. The system is new and had only just been introduced into this country when the last edition of this work was published and it is only quite lately that the conclusive nature of the evidence it affords has been appreciated in the Courts. It may be said now to have established its claim to admission and to trustworthiness. The process and especially the admirable system of classification make it perfectly simple to those who understand its technology. De-pite an appearance of complication, the system appears to be easily mastered by any person of intelligence in the course of a few months or even weeks' Wills Cr Ex 191. The reason for the identity of the finger prints is thus stated by the learned author: "The surface of a finger or thumb, however delicate is never even. It presents a series of tiny ridges separated by equally minute hollows. The ridges are dotted from end to end, at intervals by little pits which are the open ends of the ducts from sweat glands. The ridges are arranged with an infinite variety of detail, and two cardinal facts lie at the root of the process. The ridges and hollows are congenital, and from the cradle to the grave their arrangements—their patterns—never change" Wills Cr Ex 6th Ed pp 192 193. Vide the Indian Edition at pp 261 262, see also Henry on Finger Prints 11th Ed, pp 16 19. A witness expert in the subject must state that the system of interpretation used by him in inferring identity of marks was a system accepted in the profession. There are several such systems they differ chiefly in practical convenience only. The witness must further be able to state that the particular marks used as the basis of inference were distinct and numerous enough to afford an inference under the system which he employs, and also that the marks thus used for study were reproduced or transferred by some reliable process from the original object on which they were impressed. Wignmore § 114. The papillary ridges on the balls of the fingers and thumb by means of which the finger impressions are made, while proved to be almost beyond change from birth to death, are never wholly repeated in the case of the fingers of any other person, and they therefore furnish a surer test of identity, than any other comparable bodily feature. Where two prints made on different occasions, resemble one another in the minutæ and contain no points of disagreement an irresistible conclusion arises that they were made by the same finger. The evidence of identification is thus both positive and negative and confirmation from other sources is superfluous. Under section 45 of the Evidence Act, as amended by Act V of 1899, expert evidence may be given on finger impressions, while s 73 has been applied to them with necessary modifications, so as to permit of comparison being made for arriving at a finding on the basis of their decipherment. An expert may give his opinion on the point on which he is called upon to give his evidence. But he cannot go on and assert his mere opinion or belief, as if it were a fact within his knowledge. In this respect an expert witness is in a different position from a direct witness of fact. The value of ordinary or non expert oral evidence mainly rests on the credibility of the witness—his inclination and capacity, for telling the truth the value of expert evidence rests on the skill of the witness—the extent of his competency for forming a reliable opinion. Emperor v Saldeo, 3 N L R 1—5 Cr L J 220.

The accused was convicted of theft. He had three previous convictions. The previous convictions were denied by the accused and in order to prove them the prosecution produced certain finger impression slips and the finger print instructor at Rangoon was called. He took impressions of the accused's finger in Court and after having compared them with the finger impressions on sheets he produced from the finger impression bureau he declared that the accused must be the man whose finger impressions were on the sheets he produced and whose previous convictions were entered on those sheets. He did not personally know the accused and had not himself taken the impression on the sheets he produced. Held the previous convictions of the accused stated on the slips were not proved by the mere production of such slip. Hulbert v King Emperor, 4 L B R 125—7 Cr L J 406. Where the thumb impressions on a document were blurred, and many of the characteristic marks were far from clear rendering it difficult to trace the marks enumerated by an expert witness as demonstrating the correspondence between the thumb impressions in the document and those made by the accused in Court, held that, under the circumstances of the case, the evidence was not reliable and the jury were right in not accepting the evidence of the expert as conclusive. Emperor v Abdul Hamid, 32 C 759—9 C W N 520—2 Cr L J 250. A jury is not bound to accept the opinion of an expert upon thumb impressions without corroboration of their own intelligence as to the reasons which guided them to this conclusion.

S. 45. Per Girdi J in Ibid see also Basgit v Emperor, A I R 1928 Pat 129 Where the evidence to corroborate the testimony of an expert witness is of an unreliable character it is not proper to accept his evidence. Though the evidence afforded by the correspondence of thumb impressions is ordinarily of great value, it would be unsafe to convict on the mere result of a critical examination of the thumb impressions made by an expert. Per Henderson J in Ibid The question as to the identity of thumb impressions on two or more documents, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the thumb impressions are of one and the same person, is eminently a matter for the jury, and not for the Judge. Panchu Mandal v Emperor, 1 C L J 385=2 Cr L J 311. The deliberate opinion of an expert that two thumb marks exactly agree is on quite a different plane from an opinion as to handwriting. It is reasonable deduction from experience that no two human beings have the same thumb markings and, if no differences whatever can after the most careful examination, be found between one thumb mark and another, the conclusion is inescapable that the same thumb made both. Umadia v Crown 9 P R 1914 Cr. Dibbad v Emperor, A I R 1929 Lah 210. A comparison of thumb impressions is admissible under s 9 of the Evidence Act if the similarity of those impressions can establish the identity of a person, who is charged with having forged a document purporting to have been executed by another, with the latter, or under Cl (2) of section 11 of the Act, if their dissimilarity makes such identification improbable. Queen Empress v Fakir Vahomed, 1 C W N 33. If a finger print expert has not been cross-examined as to the grounds of his opinion and as to the test to which he had put a particular finger impression submitted for his consideration, the value and weight to be attached to such witness's evidence cannot be diminished by applying to it considerations to which the witness's attention was never directed. Sonuvar v Emperor 55 Ind Cas 273=21 Cr L J 257. The report of a finger print expert is inadmissible in evidence unless he is called in as a witness and subjected to cross-examination in open Court. Pattan v Baboo Singh, A I R 1924 Nag 183. A Court should be very chary in accepting an opinion of Finger Print Experts as to the age of a thumb mark as fixing the date of the document when such date is indirectly opposed to the date which appears upon the document itself so long as no serious extraneous testimony controverts the date which appears on the document. Ramlakhan v Dharamdeo 97 Ind Cas 335=A I R 1926 Pat 375. Under this section the opinion of an expert formed by comparison of the thumb impression of an accused taken in Court under Act XXXIII of 1920, s 5 with his thumb impression on deeds is admissible in evidence. Superintendent v Kiran Bala 30 C W N 373=43 Cr L J 79=93 Ind Cas 73=A I R 1926 Cal 531. There is no objection in law at all to the taking of accused's thumb mark if the Judge thinks it relevant at any time and a conviction for offence under s 409 of the Indian Penal Code based on a comparison of the thumb mark of the accused with his thumb mark in a document is not objectionable. Public Prosecutor v Kandasami, 50 M 162=98 Ind Cas 99=A I R 1927 Mad 696.

Value of expert evidence generally. Evidence of expert should be approached with considerable caution especially where much depends upon such evidence. Panchu Mandal v Emperor, 1 C L J 385=2 Cr L J 311. The opinions of experts are not binding on the jury for it is with the jury, and not with the experts, that the determination of the case rests. The weights due to their testimony is a matter to be determined by the jury, and it will be proportionate to the soundness of the reasons adduced in the support. Emperor v Ahl Prasanna, 1 C W N 465. The evidence of a skilled witness, however eminent, as to what he thinks may or may not have taken place under a particular combination of circumstances, however confidentially he may speak, is ordinarily a matter of mere opinion. Human judgment is fallible. Human knowledge is limited and imperfect. An expert witness, however impartial he may wish to be, is likely to be unconsciously prejudiced in favour of the side who calls him. The mere fact of opposition on the part of the other side is apt to create a spirit of partisanship and rivalry so that an expert witness is unconsciously impelled to support the view taken by his own side. Besides it must be remembered that an expert is often called by one simply and solely because it may be ascertained that he holds views favourable to his interest Hari Singh v Lachmi Devi, 3 Lah L J 110=59 Ind Cas 220 An opinion of an expert witness not based on any well defined inexorable laws of nature cannot be taken as decisive especially where there is direct evidence opposed to it Mansel v Emperor, 96 Ind Cas 641=27 Cr L J 977=A I R 1926 Lah 313

Expert evidence and commission Every witness must be produced at a trial, unless and until it is proved either to be actually impossible to produce him or to be so difficult to do so that it is under the circumstances unreasonable to insist on his production But petty inconveniences such as those to which a witness may be subjected by being summoned as a witness in a criminal case would not justify the issue of a commission especially when a previous conviction depended for its proof solely and entirely upon expert evidence Emperor v Kasim 15 C P L R 66 Cr The Assistant Mint Master of the Calcutta Mint is an expert witness, and the Court does not act illegally in allowing him to be examined on commission instead of insisting on his personal attendance Must Gill v Emperor 20 W N 377=12 O L J 497=88 Ind Cas 848=26 Cr L J 1232=A I R 1925 Oudh 616 But it is not satisfactory to examine an expert witness on commission and not in the presence of the accused The evidence of an expert has always to be carefully weighed but when given on commission its value is considerably reduced Nur Din v Emperor 10 Lah F J 235=108 Ind Cas 369=29 Cr L J 377=A I R 1928 Lah 538

The illustrations sufficiently exemplify the position that for this purpose res inter alios acta is receivable. North v. 22. So this section embodies a general rule which lays down that evidence of collateral facts cannot be received. Idem Taylor v. 1 § 337. If the point in dispute be whether a defendant was or was not in his right mind on a certain occasion, it is clear that after proof by a medical man, or in a civil case in admission by counsel, that madness is often of an hereditary character evidence tending to show that none of the defendant's ancestors or near relations had been insane, would be admissible in support of the negative proposition, and on a question of disputed paternity, after proving as a matter of science that children are apt to inherit the features or general appearance of their parents evidence will be received of personal resemblance between the party in question and his alleged father. *Bayot v. (Taylor § 337). In delivering the judgment Lord Mansfield said "As to the evidence respecting the situation of other harbours on the same coast we think that if there were no embankments it was admissible in illustration of Mr. Smeaton's (the expert) opinion but as to harbours in which there were embankments we think it was improper since idem ibi resolutum."

The question is whether a given letter is in the handwriting of A, a merchant in London.

S. 47.

B is a merchant in Calcutta, who has written letters addressed to A and received letters purporting to be written by him. C is B's clerk, whose duty it was to examine and file B's correspondence. D is B's broker to whom B habitually submitted the letters purporting to be written by A for the purpose of advising with him thereon.

The opinions of B, C and D on the question whether the letter is in the handwriting of A are relevant, though neither B, C, nor D ever saw A write.

Principle. In proving a document or a signature to have been written, two distinct kinds of evidence offer themselves, first, testimony by a person who saw the act of writing or some circumstances leading up or pointing back to that act, secondly, evidence of the kind of handwriting. The difference is that in any and in all ways of the second mode there is involved the establishment of a personal type or character of writing, and an estimate based on comparison, that the disputed writing belongs to the type and this is so whether we employ witnesses who know the type and examine the disputed writing (vide s. 43 and 47) or whether the tribunal is given the means of knowing the type and making the examination (s. 73). By the first mode we are not in any way concerned with the character of the person writing: the witness testifies directly to seeing the act done, just as he would testify to seeing a blow struck. By the second mode there is always an inference from the type to the genuineness of the disputed instance. Wigmore § 1991. So when the question is whether a particular document is written by A or not by the second mode there is merely a resort to A's type or character or habit of handwriting and an inference from the type to the genuineness of the disputed writing. This evidential facts the type of the handwriting involves an inference from a kind of habit or skill (of handwriting) to an act done (the specific writing). Just as we think, of a deed of violence, 'this man's character, his plan, his emotions would be likely to lead him to this deed' so we argue 'this man's handwriting would result in his penning such a signature as the one in issue. It is commoner to evidence the authorship of a signature by the direct testimony of those who declare it to resemble the general qualities of the alleged person's handwriting as known to them, there the style of writing is not expressly offered in evidence but is merely the ground of their competency to testify. When handwriting is offered circumstantially in evidence, it is expressly described or shown to the jury as the source of their inference (vide s. 73) for this only does the trait of handwriting become available for them as the basis of an inference. The difficulty that has arisen over handwriting evidence has not been over the relevancy of handwriting traits to show the authorship of writing but over the mode of evidencing them by circumstantial evidence, and that is by examining one or more specimens of writing of the person in question and drawing inferences as to its particular traits. Wigmore §§ 991, 993.

'For handwriting in manuscript the fundamental proposition of English law is that the general experience of an ordinary person is sufficient, in other words any person able to read and write is competent to form and to express a judgment as to the genuineness of handwriting. Where the witness is sufficiently qualified as to knowledge, i.e., where he has seen the person write or the like, no dispute is ever raised as to his experimental competency. Proper familiarity with the standard of comparison is all that is asked for, and no special skill in judging of writings is required. It is accepted law that the general experience of the ordinary person is sufficient, so far as experimental qualification goes. Why, then, does the question of expert qualifications in handwriting ever arise? Because when the specimens to be used are themselves before the jury, they may examine them to form an opinion as to the standard or type of writing, and hence the opinion of a person of ordinary experience only, based upon these specimens bring no better than that of the jury themselves, is not needed and is excluded by the opinion rule, and hence the only persons whose aid need be asked in studying the standards are those who have some special experience over and above that of the jury. Thus under the opinion rule, the question arises whether the person whose aid is offered is such a one as can contribute some skill not possessed by the jury.' Wigmore § 570.

'The rule as to the proof of handwriting, where the witness has not seen the party to write the document in question may be stated generally

S 47 thus. Either the witness has seen the party write on some former occasions or he has corresponded with him and the transactions have taken place between them upon the faith that letters purporting to have been written or signed by him have been written or signed, 'on either supposition the witness is supposed to have received into his mind an impression, not so much of the manner in which the writer has formed the letters in the particular instances as of the general character of his handwriting, and he is called on to speak as to the writing in question by a reference to the standard so formed in his mind. It is obvious that the weight of this evidence may vary in every conceivable degree, but the principle appears to be sound both in regard to the test of genuineness, and the acquisition of the means of applying it. The test of genuineness ought to be the resemblance, not to the formation of the letters in some other specimen or specimens but to the general character of the writing which is impressed on it as the involuntary and unconscious result of constitution, habit, or other permanent cause and is therefore itself permanent. And we best acquire a knowledge of this character by seeing the individual write at times when his manner of writing is not in question, or by engaging with him in correspondence, either supposition giving reason to believe that he writes at the time not constrainedly but in his natural manner. Per Colvile J in Doedem Mudd v Surkeimore 5 A & E 703

Scope of the section. The identification of handwriting as genuine involves the double testimonial knowledge already spoken of—in acquaintance by the witness with the type of handwriting in question, and an observation of the disputed specimen the witness comparing the two in his mind and stating whether the latter is to be regarded as genuinely an instance of the type in question. How to evidence the type of handwriting circumstantially—i.e. by individual specimens—is a different matter (vide ss 45, 73). The inquiry here concerns the mode of proving it by testimonial evidence, i.e. by a witness who declares that he is acquainted with the type of handwriting in question. To satisfy this situation the witness (1) must observe the specimen in dispute, and (2) must bring to this examination a knowledge of the type of writing with which it is desired to affirm or deny a connection. It is the adequacy of this knowledge which is here to be examined. When may the witness properly claim that his opportunities of observation have been such as to give him a fair knowledge of the general type or character of the person's hand? Wigmore § 693. The ordinary methods of proving handwritings are (1) calling as a witness a person, who wrote the document or saw it written, or who is qualified to express an opinion as to the handwriting by virtue of section 47 of the Evidence Act, (2) by a comparison of handwriting as provided in section 73 of the Evidence Act and (3) by the admission of the person against whom the evidence is tendered. Barindra v Emperor 14 C W N 1114 (1138)—37 C 467. Sarojini v Hanidas 26 C W N 113—34 C I J 373. Balaram v Md Sad 77 Ind Cas 872 (L), Khyruddin v Emperor, 53 C 372. As regards the first method when a witness, saw the very disputed document being written, he made no comparison. He saw the very act of writing as he might have seen the very act of ploughing in a field and he needs no knowledge of the general character of the writer's hand. This section deals with opinion evidence of non expert witnesses to prove handwriting. A person is considered qualified to testify to handwriting when he has seen the person whose handwriting is in question (1) with, or (2) in the ordinary course of business, has become familiar with such person's handwriting through the receipt of communications purporting to be written by him, or (3) when in the ordinary course of business, documents purporting to be written by that person have been habitually submitted to him. McKee's Ft § 145. This section lays down another real exception to the rule excluding hearsay evidence. The reason for the exception is plain. Unless a signature or writing has been made in the presence of a witness who can afterwards identify it, the only possible proof of handwriting is opinion evidence and opinion evidence of person specially qualified to testify. We have thus in proof of handwriting the same two classes of expert testimony which have been before referred to—that which is based on observation and that which is based on special training or education upon a particular subject.

S 47. knowledge they say they believe the letters and papers are of his handwriting. That, gentlemen is the only evidence that can be given of handwriting, except it happens that there be a person who saw the prisoner actually write the papers." Hensey's Case, 19 How St Tr 1341. In Hoper v Ashley 15 Ala 463, it was said "When the knowledge of the handwriting of a party is acquired by having seen him write, the usual enquiry of the witness is whether he has seen the party write and afterwards whether he believes the paper in dispute to be his handwriting. The course of examination involves two questions. First, whether the supposed writer is the person of whom the witness speaks; secondly, if he is the person, whether he wrote the paper in dispute. The first is a question of identity, the second a question of judgment, or a comparison in the mind of the witness between the general standard and the writing produced. This kind of evidence, it is said, like probable evidence admits of every possible degree from the lowest presumption to the highest moral evidence. It may be so weak as to be unsafe to act upon or so strong as in the mind of every reasonable man, to produce conviction. But whatever degree of weight his testimony may deserve,—which is a question exclusively for the jury,—it is an established rule that if he has seen the person write he will be competent to speak to handwriting, and thus, although the impression in the mind of the witness may be faint and inaccurate." Whether one could obtain a sufficient notion of the general character of a person's hand by seeing him write once only might well have been doubted. Tradition, however has handed down a fixed rule that seeing the person write once only is as a matter of law sufficient. Wigmore § 694 Garrells v Alexander, 4 Esp 37 Pouell v Lord, 2 Stark 164, William v Harrell, 8 C & P 381 Doe v Sudermore, 5 A & E 719 (730), Warren v Anderson, 8 Scott 384. The question is whether a certain document is in the handwriting of A. B has seen A write but twice. His opinion is admissible. De la Motte's Case 21 How St Tr 810. In an action on a foreign bill of exchange, the only evidence of the handwriting of the defendant was that of his attorney's clerk who was called by the plaintiff and who testified that he had seen the defendant sign the bill bond in the cause, but had never seen him write on any other occasion. The Court admitted his evidence. Garrells v Alexander 4 Esp 37. The question is whether a paper is in B hand. C has seen him write only once. His opinion is admitted. Hoine Toke's Case 25 How St Tr 71, Wellman v Horrell 8 C & P 380 Warren v Anderson 8 Scott 384. A was sued on a note which he denied ever having signed. To prove his signature, B who has seen A write but once and then only to receipt a bill which B had paid to him, was admitted. Redout v Newton 17 N H 71. In that case the Court observed "There is no rule of law that requires a witness called to prove the handwriting of a party should have seen the party write a large number of times. Handwriting like the countenance, form, gait and gesture of a party is recognized by some more readily than by other witnesses, and is in some person marked by more decisive and obvious peculiarities than in others. All that is requisite is to ascertain whether the witness has seen handwriting which by an infallible test he knows to be that of the party, and then he must upon his oath, declare if the writing exhibited appears to him to be that of the same party. The weight to be attached to such testimony must depend upon the ordinary tests of knowledge, the capacity of the witness and his disposition to tell the truth and the means that have been afforded him, whether from the intrinsic nature of the subject itself or the familiarity of the witness with it, to require the information he assumes to have. The witness to the genuineness of the defendant's signature to the note was therefore properly admitted." See also Hartung v People 4 Park C C 319 Dono Ghoe v People 6 Park C C 120 Lauson Expt & Op Ev p 336. Mr Evans said "I have known the admission of this evidence carried so far as for an attorney after the failure of other attempts to stand up and swear to a knowledge of the writing of the opposite party from having once looked over his shoulder when writing a letter at an ale house. Evans's Potheiv, Vol II, 160 see also Derriell's Case 5 Cr App 162. "It is true" says Prof Wigmore that one may even now be deemed incompetent if though he saw the act of writing done he in fact formed no idea of its character (De la Motte's Fr 21 How St Tr 810).

that a tendency is perhaps growing to leave the matter to the discretion of the trial Court, and that Judges have sometimes expressed dissatisfaction with a rule of such blind and unqualifying dogmatism. Nevertheless, the rule is a settled one." Ignore § 694

In Pouell v Ford, 2 Stark 161 where the witness had seen the party sign his name only once, on which occasion he did not write it at length, but used the initial of his christian name Lord Ellenborough said that, 'if the witness had seen the defendant write his name at full length although but once, it might have been sufficient if, from the exemplar lodged in his mind he could have sworn to a belief that the handwriting was the same, but that the evidence given was insufficient since the witness had never seen the defendant write his Christian name and that it was as necessary to prove the Christian name as well as the surname to be in the defendant's handwriting and that the one was not to be inferred from the other, any more than the rest of the name itself could be inferred, from proof that one or two letters were in his handwriting.' But ten years later in Leuis v Sapio, M & M 39, Chief Justice Abbott refused to be bound by this ruling. In this case, to prove the defendant to be the drawer of a bill signed L B Sapio, a witness testified that he had seen him write his name several times, but always thus, "Mr Sapio", and that he had never seen him write his usual signature or full name. The defendant's counsel objected citing Lord Ellenborough's ruling. But Abbott, C J said "I will not abide by any such decision as that. The witness has seen the defendant write his surname he believes the surname in the defendant's signature on the bill written by him. It is quite enough."

The law has defined no limit of time within which the handwriting, which is the foundation of the witness's belief, must have been seen by the witness. "When I first came into the profession," said Lord Eldon in Eagleton v Kingston, 8 Ves 424 (478) the rule as to handwriting in Westminster Hall, in all the Courts, was this. You called a witness and asked whether he had ever seen the party write. If he said he had whether more or less frequently, if ever, that was enough to introduce the subsequent question, whether he believed the paper to be his handwriting. If he answered that he believed it to be so, that was evidence to go to the jury. If he refused to answer to his belief, he was pressed perhaps too much, to form a belief but if he would not go to the length of belief his evidence went for nothing. Or you might ask a witness who had not seen him write for a length of time if you could not get a witness of a subsequent date you might call one who had not seen him write for twenty years, and if he said he believed it was the writing of the person that evidence might go to the jury, but to be affected by all the rest of the evidence, as it is the nature of all evidence to be more or less convincing." In Doe v Suckermore, 5 A & E 703, Patteson J said "All evidence of handwriting except where the witness sees the document written, is in its nature comparison. It is the belief which a witness entertains upon comparing the writing in question with an exemplar in his mind derived from some previous knowledge. The knowledge may have been acquired, either by seeing the party write, in which case it will be stronger or weaker according to the number of times and period and other circumstances under which the witness has seen the party write but it will be sufficient knowledge to admit the evidence of the witness (however little weight may be attached to it in such cases), even if he has seen him write but once, and then merely signing his surname."

The question is whether a certain paper was written by F W, who has not seen I write for nineteen years is called and his testimony is received. Horne v Toole's Case, 25 How St Tr 71, see also Warren v Anderson, 5 Scott 354 where the witness has seen the writer to write ten years before. So in Smith v Walton, 8 Gill 18 (Am) a witness was allowed to depose after six years. In that case the Court observes "The impression made on the mind of a witness who has seen a party write his name only in a single instance may be exceedingly faint and imperfect, but it is nevertheless testimony, provided the witness can declare, as he has done in the present case that from his knowledge of the character of the defendant's handwriting thus acquired he believes it to be genuine. This evidence, like all evidence founded on probability, is not every conceivable degree from highest to the lower order of presumptive proof. It is therefore a proper subject for consideration of a jury, who must determine what influence and weight is to be given under all the circumstances of the case to the opinion of a witness who places his belief upon a single instance. But in this connection it must also be borne in mind that some men may receive an extraordinary and lasting impression from the examination of a single signature, than others receive from a large number. Some too may retain the impression thus received after a lapse of years, while in others it would be obliterated after a lapse of days. In such case the law has fixed no limit to the measure of human capacity. Per Spencer J in Brackman v Hall 1 Disney 339. The quantity of writing that was seen is wholly immaterial. Higmore § 696. It is obvious that one who denies the genuineness of a writing, which an opponent affirms or, vice versa, will be tempted to form his writing to suit his claim if he writes after controversy for the purpose of showing the type of his writing. It is true that one cannot vary his handwriting entirely at his pleasure, but it is safe as a rule to accept no testimony found in such specimen, though the matter should be left to the trial Court's discretion. But no such objection attaches to specimens thus written at the opponent's request for here the opponent in effect takes the risk of the kind being feigned and waives the objection. There is moreover no objection to testimony based on an act of writing subsequent to the date of the disputed writing (if no controversy had arisen) the type of writing is always assumed to have been substantially the same, — an assumption forced but practically necessary. So too, the knowledge may be acquired after the witness saw the disputed writing — a question which becomes important when the original is lost. Higmore § 697.

When he has received documents etc — Ex Scriptis Olim Visis. A person is acquainted with the handwriting of another when he has received documents (e.g. letters) purporting to be written by that person in answer to documents written by himself or under his authority, and addressed to that person. Lauson Exp d Op Le Rule 48 Thomas v State 103 Ind 419 (1st) State v Hussey, 131 Mo 337. A witness who testifies that he never saw A write, but who narrates occasions when he received papers from A under circumstances which lead to no doubt that they were written by him, is competent to express his opinion as to the genuineness of A's signature to the note in suit. Sprague v Sprague 30 N Y 8 162 (1st). But a witness does not know sufficient knowledge to testify as to the genuineness of a signature where his knowledge was derived from the signature attached to a notice addressed to him, purporting to be signed by the person, but he did not see it signed, never saw her write, and it did not appear that she had acknowledged the signature to be hers, or that witness acted on it. Falbot v Hedge 5 Ind App 555 (Am). The question is whether a given letter is in the handwriting of A a merchant in London. B is a merchant in New York who has written letters addressed to A and received letters purporting to be written by him. The opinion of B on the question whether the letter is in the handwriting of A is admissible though he never saw A write. Thorpe v Gisborne 2 C & P 21 Lord Ferrars v Spurelen Fitz 195 Harrington v Fry 1 C & P 289, Maddison v Sanford 4 Camp 34 Gould v Jones, 1 W Bl 284, Murieta v Wolfhagen 2 C & K 744 Southern Lx Co v Thornton, 41 Miss 216, Parsons v McDaniel 62 Gr 100, Lauson Exp d Op Le 339. The question was whether a document was in A's handwriting. B had received letter purporting to come from A, and had answered one of them but had received no reply thereto. B was held not qualified to prove A's handwriting. Hebb v Maura Morris (Lower) 111. The witness in the present instance and the Court in the above case had received two letters purporting to come from the defendant, to one of which he had replied. Had the correspondence been continued the probabilities of imposition would have been so far rebutted as to render him a competent witness to prove the fact in question but if the receipt of two letters, and an answer by the witness before any reply has been made to the defendant, is sufficient to enable the witness to swear to the signature it will be a very easy matter to manufacture testimony of that nature. In some cases the rule as above is laid down with the qualification that the witness must have acted on the letters received by him. Sitor v Bolinger 39 Tex 411. In Mudd

v. Sufermore, 5 Ad & Ell 703, the leading English case on the legal mode of proving handwriting Hilliams J said "When speaking of the facts necessary to introduce knowledge of handwriting not from actual inspection, but from correspondence I adverted to an expression in frequent use, and which indeed, has almost grown into the currency of a proverb upon this subject, that the letter or letters must have been acted upon. If however, by this expression it be meant to imply that any business must be transacted or in any sense of the word yet done the observation is without foundation for nothing of the sort is necessary. Any thing from which the identity of the writer is established may suffice." In Cunningham v. Hudson River Rail 21 Wend 559, Banson J referred to this expression, objecting that the mere fact that a person had received a letter from a stranger on which he acted was no ground for presuming that it was genuine. Some acknowledgment on the part of the writer or other evidence going to show that the letter was really written by him he very properly thought, should also be required. "Standing alone," said he "the fact that the witness acted on the letters has no tendency to prove them genuine. It merely proves and that merely by inference that the witness believe<sup>d</sup> the letters authentic. His belief is of no importance, unless it is founded upon some good reason such a reason as will satisfy the jury as well as the witness. Although the fact that the witness has acted on the letters when standing alone is of no importance it may be of great value in a chain of circumstantial evidence. The act done in pursuance of the letters may be followed by such acts of approval or acknowledgment on the part of the supposed author as can only be accounted for on the supposition that he was in truth the writer of the letters."

The law in America on this point is thus laid down in a recent West Virginia Case. "The mere fact that he has received letters purporting to be from the person whose signature is in controversy is not sufficient unless there has been some admission or acquiescence equivalent to an acknowledgment on the part of the supposed writer other than the letters themselves, that the said letters are genuine and in the handwriting of the person from whom they purport to come. A person who has heard business correspondence with another, acted upon by both parties is competent to testify as to the handwriting of his correspondent although he may never have seen him write. But when the letters have no relation to business transactions but are letters of merely friendly or polite intercourse some acknowledgment of handwriting in some way other than the letters themselves on the part of the supposed writer, must be shown. The knowledge of one witness must be founded on some other means than the receipt and contents of the letters. The testimony of the witness Johnson was to the effect that he had known the plaintiff for fourteen or fifteen years, did not know whether he had ever seen her write, corresponded with her about fourteen years ago, received about a dozen letters in answer to his own, with her name signed to them had received no letters recently had some of the letters with her. The question was then propounded to him. From your knowledge of her handwriting, derived from having received letters from her, would you know the plaintiff's signature? The Court refused to allow this question to be asked, and rightly so for the law answers this question that the witness could not know her handwriting from the mere fact that he had received letters purporting to come from her. His knowledge must be extraneous to the letters sufficient to raise a presumption that the letters were not only from, but written by the person whose name was signed to them. But according to this section the mere fact that he has received letters purporting to be from the person whose signature is in controversy is sufficient to make his opinion relevant. [Vide illustration to the section.] Some admission or acquiescence equivalent to an acknowledgment on the part of the supposed writer that the said letters are genuine and in the handwriting of the person whom they purport to come will only add weight to the evidence. According to this mere exchange of correspondence alone is sufficient to justify belief in genuineness. This is also in accordance with the orthodox doctrine obtained in England. Ford Macquere Trial 4 How St Tr 653 685 Gould v. Jones 1 W Bl 384 per Lord Mansfield Earnes v. Prompous 7 T R 265; Owenston v. Hillon, 2 C & K 1 Maneta v. Holsham, 2 C & K 744 Tianer v. Case,

S 47 3 Cr App 103, 155=(1910) 1 K B 346 In the last mentioned case a document of consent signed by the Director of Public Prosecutions was put in. In admitting the document the Court said "It is sufficient if some body, for instance who has been in correspondence with the Director of Public Prosecutions says (I received this in ordinary course, and I believe it to be signed by the Director of Public Prosecutions)." All that the Court says is, that there must be some kind of proof of it, but it must not necessarily be proof of some body, who says, 'I have seen the gentlemen write which in the old fashioned days, at any rate, was the technical way of proving the signature.' Similarly in Batchelor Honeywood 2 Esp 715, Lord Kenyon said "If persons are in the habit of corresponding, and letters are received from one to the other, upon which any transaction takes place that may enable the party to swear to his correspondent's handwriting." The use of this class of testimony is comparatively new, its orthodoxy was not established until the last century. Higmore 8 699 For the earliest discussion on this point vide Lord Fevers v Spurley, Tilgibson 195, which was decided in 1731. That one is not acquainted with another's general writing does not disqualify him from proving his signature. Mr Kenley v Gayford 1 Jones L 94. The Court observed in that case "The testimony of K was clearly competent. The witness testified that he had corresponded with the merchant in New York whose signature was to be proved, by writing to him and receiving letters from him and in this way he had acquired a knowledge of his signature. The objection was 'the witness had not shown himself qualified to speak of it. It is written one of the above modes stated whereby the competent knowledge may be acquired and the witness professed that in that way he had acquired his knowledge of his operations.'"

When in the ordinary course of business, documents purporting to be written etc.—Ex Scripto Olim Visis. A person is acquainted with the hand writing of another when in the ordinary course of business, writings purporting to be written by that person have passed through his hands. Berg v Peterson, 49 Minn 420 (Am). Pottle v Rannet 98 N C 513 (Am). The clerk, as Lord Denman remarked in Mudd v Sacchero 5 Ad & El 703, "who constantly read the letters, the broker who was ever consulted upon them, is as competent to judge whether another signature is that of the writer of the letters as the merchant to whom they were addressed. The servant who has habitually carried letters addressed by me to others has an opportunity of obtaining a knowledge of my writing, though he never saw me write nor received a letter from me. A clerk comes from a merchant's counting house and proves the handwriting of a party by his knowledge of it acquired by his seeing the letters of the party which have been received at his master's counting house. It is frequently done. Rex v Stanley 5 C & P 219. Overton v Wilson 2 C & K 1, Rayburn v Belotti, 10 Mo 597. Tudford v Knott 2 Johns Ct 311. Rend v Hodgson 1 Grinch C C 491. In Johnson v Davene 19 Johns 134=10 Am Dec 198 the Court observed "To prove a party's signature it is not indispensably necessary that the witness should have seen him write. Phillips gives the true rule. The admission of the evidence must depend upon whether there is good reason to believe that the specimens from which the witness derived his knowledge were written by the supposed writer of the paper in question. In Tudford v Knott, (2 Johns Ct 214) it was held that the signature of the indorser was well proved by a person who had been in the habit of seeing his correspondence and from that believed the signature to be his. The witness in this case had received the plaintiff's notes all of which except one had been paid, the payment of the notes with his signature to them unexplained was a full admission that he had made and subscribed them. If then the witness had sufficiently observed to ascertain the direction and prevailing character of the handwriting he was in a situation to identify the plaintiff's signature and he ought to have asked if he believed the plaintiff's name to the receipts to be his handwriting. If he had answered that question affirmatively then the receipts should have been received in evidence. Larson Expt & Op 11 p 313. Where the genuineness of signatures to bank bills is disputed the evidence of bank officers through who handle similar bills pass duly, is obviously of highest value. Larson Expt & Op 11 p 313. "I think that a person who receives and pays away hundreds of bank notes has as good an opportunity of judging of the signatures upon them as if he had received a few letters from the persons whose signatures they are" Hall J in State v Chandler, 3 Hawke 390. Similarly all persons not connected with the bank, but who have frequently received and paid out bills purporting to be issued by it, and who have cashed such bills at the bank, are competent to testify to the signatures of the cashier and president on similar bills alleged to be forgeries although they have never seen either cashier or president write. Com v Carey 2 Pick 47. 'The objection' it was said in one American case, "that no one shall speak as to the handwriting of the President and cashier of the bank but one who has seen them write or has been in the habit of receiving letters from them in the course of correspondence is not a sound one. These signatures are known to the public, and persons who have been in the habit of distinguishing genuine from the counterfeit signature, and conversant in dealings in bank bills are as well qualified to determine their genuineness as persons who, in private correspondence have received letters from the person whose handwriting is in question." So no person is said to be acquainted with the handwriting of another when holding it the time in official position, signatures or writing of that person have come before him. It is settled every where that if a person has seen another write his name but once, he can testify and that he is equally competent if he has personally communicated with him by letter although he has never seen him write at all. But is the witness incompetent unless he has obtained his knowledge in one or the other of these modes? Clearly not for in the varied affairs of life there are many modes in which one person can become acquainted with the handwriting of another besides having seen him write or correspond with him. There is no good reason for excluding any of these modes of getting information, and if the Court on the preliminary examination of the witness, can see that he has that degree of knowledge of the party's handwriting which enable him to judge of its genuineness he should be permitted to give to the jury his opinion on this subject." Thus the signature of a justice of the peace may be proved by a recorder of deeds or his clerks who have seen it as a certificate on other papers in the office (Rogers v Rutter, 12 Wall 317), the clerks in a land office may become acquainted with the signatures attached to papers filed there (Goddard v Geominger, 5 Walls 209) the handwriting of an officer of the treasury department may be proved by a person who had corresponded with that officer, remitted money to him, and received his receipts (United States v Smison 3 P & W 437), or the handwriting of a surveyor by one who has seen many official plans signed and verified with his signature (Jones v Huggins, 1 Dev L 223), a notary public or a justice of the peace who has come across a person's writing in an official way may testify to its genuineness when found on other papers (Dungan v Beard, 2 N & M 400), and so may a clerk of the Court (Lates v Lates 76 N C 142), a jailer through whose hands letters signed by a prisoner were received from him to parties outside have passed, many, from this circumstance alone, form a sufficient knowledge of the prisoner's handwriting. State v Hastings 53 N H 460, Lauson Expt & Op Et 399. In order to prove the handwriting or signature of another person one must show that he is acquainted with the handwriting or signature of that person. Alt Jasoda v Janal 4 Pat 394 = A I R 1925 Pat 787. The evidence of a record keeper who examines and files all English papers that come to the office in the ordinary course of his official business about the handwriting of a person whose papers he has so filed on files 7 or 8 occasions is relevant under this section. The word "habitually" means "usually," "generally" or "according to custom." It does not refer to the frequency of the occasions but rather to the invariability of the practice. Emperor v Fande, 27 Bom L R 1031 = 89 Ind Cns 1042 = 26 Cr L J 1474 = A I R 1925 Bom 429.

Other means of acquaintance with a person's handwriting. A person is also acquainted with the handwriting of another when he has seen handwriting which that person has acknowledged to be his. Redd v State, 47 S W R 119. Lauson Expert & Op Et Rule 51, Smith v Sansbury, 5 C & P 196. There can be no question that an express acknowledgment by the purporting writer affords an adequate ground of belief in the authenticity of the writing received.

S 47 and this is generally accepted. Ignore § 700. A holder B's note, which he has acknowledged. A is qualified to testify to B's signature when attached to another note, or to testify his handwriting generally. Hammond v. Varian 51 N.Y. 398.

Signature of a Partnership firm. A witness may be acquainted with the signature of a firm without being able to identify the handwriting of either or any partner. Gordon v. Price, 10 Fred 387. It is of no consequence that the witness had no knowledge of the writing of the partner M, derived in any manner as would enable him to say with precision that he believed that M personally put the name of the firm to the bill for whether that person or any other duly authorised signed the bill the firm was in law the drawer, and the witness states his belief that as far as could be judged from the handwriting, this bill was signed by the same person who habitually made notes on the house of G. P. & Co., which the firm habitually took from the witness. The substance of the testimony is that whoever generally gave securities in the name of G. P. & Co.—whether as partner or a clerk—must have drawn the bill in question. This, we think, was sufficient to let the bill go to the jury, whose province it was to determine how much credit ought to be allowed to the judgment and integrity of the witness.

Belief of a witness as regards handwriting. A witness may testify to his belief that a writing shown him is in the hand of another person, though he cannot swear positively thereto. Lauzon Expert & Op. Fr. Rule 33, Com. v. Andrews 143 Mass. 23. In Garrels v. Alexander 4 F. & P. 210 decided in 1810 a person who was called to prove the signature of the defendant to a foreign bill said that he had seen the defendant write out once, that the signature on the bill was like what he had seen him write, but that he could form no belief on the subject. Lord Kenyon held that this was evidence to go to the jury and the plaintiff had a verdict. But this ruling was criticized by Lord Eldon in Engleton v. Kingston, 8 Ves. 474 who laid down that it was necessary that the witness should form a belief. Most of the American Courts have required more of the witness than did Lord Kenyon, but less than Lord Eldon. "Belief is stronger than opinion" and in the majority of the cases in America it is sufficient if the witness can say that he believes the writing in question to be or not to be in the hand of the supposed writer though he is not able to swear positively on the subject. In Hopkins v. Meggins 35 Me. 78 (Am.) the Court observed: "All that a witness called in such a case can be compelled to testify is that the handwriting in question resembles that of the person whose it purports to be in other words that it looks like it. From the resemblance between the signature before him as compared with those of the same person previously observed the witness has drawn the inference that they were made by one and the same individual. The strength of his belief will depend on greater or less degree of similarity. He can only testify to his own state of mind on this question. The language used is indicative of the strength of his belief was properly before the jury for their consideration and it was for them to determine its sufficiency to establish the fact which it was offered to prove. When the witness stated that he could not swear to the handwriting and the endorsement he was probably understood by the jury as referring to his own knowledge, and not as intending thereby to limit or restrain the testimony previously given and it is not for us to say that they misunderstood him. Though it may be proper to receive the testimony of a person who declines to express a decided belief will yet declare that he is of opinion or that he thinks the paper is genuine yet it is going a step further when the witness will only state that the handwriting is like a statement which may be perfectly true, but yet within the knowledge of the witness the paper might have been written by an utter stranger." Taylor Fr. § 1868.

Knowledge of handwriting acquired for the purpose of testifying. Knowledge of handwriting required for the purpose of testifying will qualify only where it is clear that there was no motive either in the writer or in the witness to manufacture testimony. Reese v. Reese 90 Pa. St. 91, Fueller v. Hyatt 114 Ind. 63; (Am.) Lauzon Expert & Op. Fr. Rule 33. The question arising on a trial was as to the handwriting of A, B was offered as a witness. It appeared that previous to the trial, A had written his name for the purpose of showing B his manner of writing it. B's evidence was rejected. Stranger v Searle, 1 Esp 15. In that case Lord Kenyon refused to allow the witness to testify, because he said the party might through design, write differently from his common mode of writing his name. On an indictment for sending a threatening letter, the only witness called to prove that the letter was in the prisoner's handwriting was a police officer, who, after the letter had been received and suspicions aroused was sent by his inspector to the accused to pry him some money and obtain a receipt, in order thus to get a knowledge of his writing. This evidence was rejected. R v Crouch & Cox C C 163. In delivering the judgment the Court observed 'Knowledge so obtained that is to say for such a thin purpose and under such a bias—is not such as to make a man admissible as quasi expert witness. He does not come to speak to a fact, but as a witness of skill to give his judgment upon a particular question. The only means he has had of acquiring a capability to favour such judgment are not such as to make him a competent witness in that particular.'

Witness's acquaintance with handwriting whether shifts the burden of proof.—Where a witness swears that he is acquainted with the handwriting the burden is on the opposite party to show that his sources of information were insufficient to qualify him. Henderson v Bank of Montgomery 11 Ala 855, Lauzon Expert & Op Fr rule 56. In proof of a document a witness stated that he was acquainted with the handwriting of the writer but he was not asked in examination in chief any question which would elicit any of the several matters indicated in the explanation to section 47 of the Indian Evidence Act (1 of 1872). The witness was not cross-examined in the point neither any objection was taken at that time. Held that his evidence was admissible. Shanlao v Ramji 28 B 58. The witness need not state in the first instance how he knows the handwriting since it is the duty of the opposite party to explore on cross-examination the sources of his knowledge, if he be dissatisfied with the testimony as it stands. Taylor § 1863. 'It appears to us that this is a correct exposition of the law in this country also though it is permissible and may often be expedient that the matters referred to in the explanation should be elicited on the examination in chief. We may here further point out that it is within the power of the presiding Judge and often may be desirable to permit the opposing advocate to interfere and cross-examine so that the Court may at that stage be in a position to come to a definite conclusion on adequate materials as to the proof of the handwriting.' Per Jenkins C J in Shanlao v Ramji supra at p 62. Therefore, where the witness has not been questioned on the trial as to his means of knowing a certain handwriting, no objection to the want of qualifications to so testify can be made on appeal. Ibid, Berryman v Dahlgren, 6 Rob 188, Smith v Walton, 8 Gill 81. So the evidence of a witness contained in a deposition that he knows a certain paper to be in the handwriting of a party is sufficient, on appeal where the opposite party has declined to cross-examine as to his means of knowledge. Whitner v Gould 8 Wall 485. So where the witness had stated that a certain letter was written by the prisoner but on cross-examination said "It looks like his handwriting, but I could not swear to his handwriting unless I saw him write" the evidence was held admissible on appeal. Gross v State 62 Md 180. When a witness has sworn that he knows the handwriting of the alleged signer of a note and that the note is signed by him, the defendant, he may on cross-examination be asked when he first saw the note and who showed him the note the questions tending to elicit from him the opportunities he had of examining the signature. Lauzon Expert & Op Fr 382.

Quantum and weight of evidence. The testimony of one witness to a signature who swears he saw the party sign the instrument, and whose credibility is not impeached will not be invalidated by the negative statement on oath of two witnesses made after a comparison of the disputed writing with others on file in the suit (Ell v Aorwood 7 La 103) nor is it held in Louisiana,

S. 48. can the oath of a party that a certain signature alleged to be his, is a forgery, be overcome by the testimony to the contrary of witnesses who had never seen the party write or even sign his name, but who express their opinion solely from the similarity and likeness to signatures of his which they have seen. Such evidence, it is very well said may just as well show the accuracy of the counterfeit as the genuineness of the signature in dispute. Robinson v. Arnel, 15 L.J. 261. In Murphy v. Hagerman Wright 292, the defendant's signature to a promissory note was alleged to be a forgery. Twelve witnesses testified to their knowledge of his handwriting, and gave their opinion that the signature to the note was his. Three witnesses, one a bank cashier, were of a contrary opinion. In charging the jury, Wright J said: "The greatest number of those who give you an opinion upon the signature think it that of the defendant, but counsel claims that superior skill and opportunity of the witnesses for the defendant entitle them to the most weight and particularly that the experience acquired by the cashier of the bank enables him to judge with the greatest certainty, of handwriting. It is true that experience and practice in judging of writing, as well as experience and practice in anything else will enable a witness more readily to form an opinion upon the subject of his experience, but the knowledge is not confined to particular stations—any person may acquire it. It appears to us involved in no mystery. The same powers of discrimination and of memory which enable us to distinguish faces and the difference between plants and trees is all that is required. We know with certainty the faces of our acquaintances though we have not always the power to describe particularly the points in the faces of different individuals or the minute particularities of any one. This skill is not limited to a knowledge of the face, while all the features or their expression remain as we have been accustomed to see them. We know the face, though derangement has imparted to it a new appearance, or when distorted by pain or disfigured by wounds and presented in an entire new light. It is the image of the whole face that impresses the memory. The faculties enable us to discriminate upon different plants and trees and to distinguish their varieties and the different species of the same general class. We duly meet those who with a single glance of the eye upon a tree can tell the precise kind of fruit it will bear, and we would implicitly rely upon their opinion, although if questioned, they were unable to describe accurately the difference between the several species. We judge of writings, as of other things, by its individual character as a whole. We must take the opinion of those witnesses altogether and judge of their testimony as under all the circumstances they shall appear entitled to weight, from their opportunity of knowing the defendants handwriting, and your estimate of their skill and judgment. A cashier of a bank is entitled to no more credit than any other person of equal skill. The jury found for the plaintiff." Lauzon, Expert & Op. F.R. 380.

48 When the Court has to form an opinion as to the existence of any general custom or right, the opinion as to existence of right or custom, when relevant, is to the existence of such custom or right, of persons who would be likely to know of its existence if it existed, is relevant.

Explanation -- The expression "general custom or right" includes customs or rights common to any considerable class of persons.

Illustration

The right of the villagers of a particular village to use the water of a particular well is a general right within the meaning of this section.

Principle The opinions of ordinary witnesses derived from the observation are admissible in evidence, when from the nature of the subject under investigation, no better evidence can be obtained, or the facts cannot otherwise be presented to the tribunal. Lambson, Op of Expert Pl. Rule 63 "Facts are frequently collective, where a combination of the known elements may be expressed in the form of a conclusion or inference. Such inference is received, not as founded on the judgment of a witness but as the result of his personal observation and knowledge, as an equivalent to a specification of facts, because necessarily involved." It is not the statement of mere opinion but of the result of personal observation and knowledge as to the collective fact. Ua, etc. L. Co v. Yarbrough, 83 Ala. 235 (10). So far as customs are concerned such persons, so to speak, the depositories of the customary law just as the text books are the depositories of the general law. Jag Mohan Das v. Mangal Das, 10 B. 528 (543).

Scope of the section. In Bu Luy v. Lu Santol, 20 B. 53 (59) Ranade J. and "Mere opinion evidence is entitled to no weight in such matters and the custom must be proved by specific instances" which plaintiff's witnesses have failed to adduce. (Rahmat Bai v. Hirbai 3 B. 34). See also Lachman Bai v. Ubar Khan, 1 A. 411. But in a latest Privy Council case it has been held that a tribal or family custom excluding a daughter or sister from inheritance in favour of a collateral may be proved by general evidence as to its existence by members of the tribe or family who would naturally be cognizant of its existence and its exercise without controversy. No specific instances need be proved. Umad Khan v. M. Chann Bibi, L. R. 6 P. C. 190 = 3 O. W. N. 93 = 6 Lah. 702 = 72 I. A. 379 = A. I. R. 1925 P. C. 267. A recital in a public record as to a statement made by a public servant with reference to a particular right by the Government would not be admissible under section 45 in a case where a specific right claimed by a particular individual and not a general right is being dealt with. Santarakshya v. Manoh, 51 Ind. Cas. 876. A general custom or general right may be proved by evidence, under this section by the opinions of persons who would be likely to know of its existence if it existed. Such opinions are relevant, but such opinions must be given by witnesses who give evidence. Maung On v. Maung Shue Dinn, 1 L. B. K. 50. So the statements made by persons who are in a position to know of the existence of a custom or usage in their locality, are admissible under this section. Saniatullah v. Pian Nath 26 C. 184. It is admissible evidence for a witness to give his opinion on the existence of a family custom, and to state as the grounds of that opinion information derived from deputed persons. But it must be the expression of independent opinion based on hearsay, and not mere repetition of hearsay. The weight of opinion evidence on the existence of a family custom would depend upon the position and character of the witness and of the persons on whose statements he has formed his opinion. Per Lord Duff in Gururudhara v. Supriandhuaja, 10 M. L. J. 267 (P. C.) = 23 A. 37 = 5 C. W. N. 33 = 27 I. A. 238 = 2 Bom. L. R. 831. On a question of the existence of a special custom in the Bahnula clan in Oadh excluding daughters from inheritance the village-ulart or village administration papers directed to be made by Reg. VII of 1822 and ascertaining and recording usages of this kind of the custom in question, were properly received in evidence under s. 35 of the Evidence Act though they had been prepared by the settlement officers. Do not and not by himself as required by the Regulation. Even if such papers were to be treated only as the recorded opinions of those who made them, as a custom, they would be admissible in evidence under s. 43 of the Evidence Act. Ichhay Kuar v. Mahpal Singh 5 C. 744 = 6 C. L. R. 599 = 7 I. A. 53 P. C. In Murammat Lal v. Murdhhar 3 A. L. J. 415 (P. C.) = 19 C. W. N. 52 = 1 L. 492 = 3 C. L. J. 594 = 23 A. 233. Su. Andreu Scott says: "The village-ulart in the North Western Provinces is applied to what is not a tribal or tribal importance document contained in the official record of the village administration. Entries therein properly made and maintained by the village administration officers who made them, have been held to be admissible in the case of Kuar v. Mahpal Singh 7 I. A. 53 P. C. = 19 C. W. N. 52 = 1 L. 492 = 3 C. L. J. 594 = 23 A. 233. The village-ulart is a document of a family custom, or, under s. 43 of the Evidence Act, a fact of such custom by persons likely to know of its existence."

S 48 that this section does not require that the person who holds that opinion should be called as a witness. Such opinion may be based on hearsay. Vide Per Lord Dary in Guadalupe v Suparandhuaya, 23 A 37=27 I A 238 supra. So according to their Lordships' opinion, recorded opinion based on hearsay is admissible in evidence. It is submitted with great deference that this interpretation of the section can neither be supported on principle nor on the proper construction of the wordings of the section. Sections 45 to 51 of Evidence Act lay down certain well known exceptions, where opinion evidence of a witness is admissible. But these sections are not in any way exceptions to section 60 of the Evidence Act which lays down that if it refers to an opinion or to the grounds on which that opinion is held it must be the evidence of the person who holds that opinion on those grounds. So "this section when read with section 60, post, requires that the person who holds the opinion should be called as a witness." (Vide Woodroffe Es 8th Ed p 411) Where any question of right or custom is to be decided, opinion of persons, who would be likely to know of its existence are, under this section admissible in evidence. Dalglish v Guaffa Mossam 23 C 427 followed in Saniatulla v Piran 8 C 184. The custom or right thus to be evidenced must relate to a considerable class of persons. Bayroni v Manalaula 12 C W N 74=9 Bom L R 1348=6 C L J 766=3 V L R 1=5 A L J 1=30 I A 1. Section 13 applies to all rights and customs, public and general, and refers to specific facts which may be given in evidence. Section 32 clause 1 refers to the reception of second hand evidence in cases in which the declarant cannot be brought before the Court whether in consequence of death or from other cause. This section refers only to general rights or customs not public. It refers only to the evidence of a living witness produced before the Court, sworn and subject to cross examination. Ordinarily speaking such a witness must in his examination in chief, speak to facts only, but under this section he will be allowed to give opinion as to the existence of the general right or custom. He will not be confined to instances in which he has personally known the right or custom exercised as a matter of fact. Custom is not a matter to be submitted to the senses. It is made up of an aggregated repetition of the same fact whenever similar conditions arise, and though a bare opinion is worth nothing, without which we can ascertain the data on which it is founded yet it is always to be remembered that section 51 is to be read with this section and that the grounds for the witness's opinions, are sure to be elicited in cross-examination even if they should not be elicited in the examination in chief or demanded by the Judge. A boundary between village, the limits of a village or town, a right to collect tolls, a right to trade to the exclusion of others a right to pasturage of waste lands, liability to repair roads, or plant trees rights to water-courses tanks, ghats for washing, rights of common and the like will be found the most ordinary in Mussul practice. Nort F 227

Customs. A custom is a particular rule which had existed either actually or presumptively from time immemorial and has obtained the force of law in a particular locality although contrary to and not inconsistent with the general common law of the realm. Tockwood v Wood 6 Q B 30, Halsbury Vol 1 p 218. A custom must be confined to a definite limited locality. It may import a general right in a district. Multer v Paylor 1 Burr 2305. For further annotations vide p 181

Right. "It may be difficult perhaps to define precisely the scope of the word right but I think it was here intended to include those properties only of an incorporeal nature, which in legal phraseology are generally called 'rights' more especially as it is used in conjunction with the word 'custom'." It is certainly used in that sense in subsequent parts of the Act (see section 18 and sub-section 1 of s 32) which deal with matters of public or general 'right' or custom and in section 13 the word is probably intended to include, both public and private right of that nature. Per Garth C J in Guya Lal v Lath Lal 6 C 171 (4 B) at p 156. In the me case Jackson J said "It seems to me a clear as anything can be that the rule here spoken of is something quite distinct from ownership." What is referred to in the section cited is evidently a right which attaches either to some property or to status in short, incorporeal rights which though transmissible are not tangible or objects of the bodily senses." But in the same case Mitter J in dissenting from the Full Bench gave a very wide interpretation to the word right. At page 180 he said "Then it has been said that in section 13 of the Evidence Act, the legislature intended to refer to incorporeal rights only, because in other parts of the Act, for example in ss 32 and 48, where the same word occurs in conjunction with the word 'custom' it has been used in that sense. In the first place, it is by no means clear that ss 32 and 48 deal only with incorporeal rights. It is not impossible to conceive of a corporeal right being of a public or general nature. It is true that in the generality of cases, such rights are incorporeal, but it is by no means confined to that class only." See also Pippu Khan v Rajon, 2 C W N 501 (F B), Collector of Goralhpur v Palal dhar, 13 A 1 (F B), Ranchodas v Bapu 10 B 439, Lakshman v Anurit 24 B 591, Ramdas v Apparau 13 M 14, Venkataram v Venkatareddi, 15 M 12, Tythalunga v Venkatara 16 M 194.

Person who would be likely to know The opinion must be of the persons who are likely to know of its existence if it existed. Jugmobandas v Mangaldas 10 B 528 (542). In Sariatullah v Priamath Nandi, 26 C 184, the question was whether occupancy right was transferable by custom. In deciding who are competent to prove customs under this section the Court observed "We think in the present case also the statements made by persons who were in a position to know of the existence of a custom or usage in their locality were admissible. For example a person, who had been in the habit of writing on deeds of sale, or one who had seen transfers frequently made would certainly be in a position to give his opinion whether there was a custom or usage in that particular locality, and I think that the opinion of such persons would be admissible." pointed out by the learned Judges under section 48 of the Evidence Act.

Explanation The Explanation excludes private rights from the operation of this section. "Opinion or reputation evidence is not receivable to prove such rights. They must be proved by facts such as acts of ownership. This kind of evidence is admissible to disprove as well as to prove a general right or custom. Nest Fr 227. In Hught v Patham 7 A & E 358 on appeal in 5 Cl & F 720 Collman J asked "Where boundary is proved by reputation what is the guarantee for sincerity?" Mr Stirling replied "The publicity of the transaction and the general interest in the fact being rightly ascertained." Collman J said "The principle on which I conceive the exception (of reputation as to public rights) rests in this—that the reputation can hardly exist without the concurrence of many parties interested to investigate the subject and such concurrence is the presumptive evidence of the existence of an ancient right of which in most cases direct proof can no longer be given." So "a reputation is admitted where public interest is concerned." Denman L C J in R v Antho bus 2 A & E 793. The terms 'public' and 'general' are sometimes used as synonymous merely with that which concerns a multitude of persons. Wells v Spale 1 M & S 690 per Baley J.

Opinions as to usages tenets etc, when relevant 49 When the Court has to form an opinion as to—

- the usages and tenets of any body of men or family,
- the constitution and government of any religious or charitable foundation, or
- the meaning of words or terms used in particular districts or by particular classes of people,
- the opinions of persons having special means of knowledge thereon, the relevant facts

Principle The matters mentioned in this section can only be proved by persons having special means of knowledge

S 49. Scope of the section The kind of evidence contemplated by this section must be the expression of independent opinion based on hearsay and not repetition of hearsay. It is admissible for a living witness to state his opinion on the existence of a family custom and to state as the grounds of that opinion information derived from deceased persons. Guruduttaya v Suparanduttaya 23 A 37=5 C W N 13 (P C)=27 I A 235=10 M L J 267 (P C)=2 Bom L R 831. Where a certain member of a family accepted a certain interpretation of a clause in a ghat-ul-az the fact is admissible in evidence as to how a custom applying to the family is interpreted by members of that family. Shafuddin v Namul Ali, 57 Ind Cas 8=A I R 1925 Oudh 688. Opinion of dead persons cannot be proved save under s 32. Protap Chandra v Jagadish Chandra A I R 1925 Cal 116. To prove a custom, opinion of persons having special means of knowledge is relevant under section 49 of the Evidence Act. Baynath v Rayu 12 O L J 571=2 O W N 872=L R 6, O 101.

Usages of trade, agriculture etc. When a trade usage is material to the issue the witness to prove it is not to state it by declaring that usage attributes a certain right or liability in certain circumstances. This of course is a violation of the opinion rule: the witness should state the tenor of the usage or practice, omitting any reference to the legal effect. Wigmore § 1951. But the mere assertion of a custom does not involve opinion. Conner v R. Co 146 Ind 430. Usage is a matter of fact, not of opinion so the conclusions or inferences of a witness as to its effect, either upon the contract or the legal title or rights of the parties are not competent to show the character or force of the usage. The effect is to be determined by the Court. Hoskins v Warren, 115 Mass. 514 535. The inquiry is not after the opinion of traders and merchants in respect to the law upon a given question, but after the evidence of a fact to wit the usage or practice in the course of mercantile business. Allen v Merchants Bank, 15 Wend N Y 482, 493. So a party may examine witnesses to prove a particular course of trade or other matters in the nature of facts but not to show what the law is. Ryan v Gardner 1 Wash C C 145 (149). It is sometimes said that a witness to trade usage may state only specific instances, or must at least mention one or more in support of his statement of the general practice. This notion is traceable to some remarks of Lord Mansfield and later Judges which do not justify it. Wigmore § 1951. In Edie v East India Co 1 W Bl 295 (297), 2 Burr 1216 (1222), Mansfield L C J said 'Many witnesses were examined by defendants to prove this usage but it did not appear that in any one fact the endorsement of such special endorsement ever lost the money by such omission [of the words or order] the evidence was only matter of opinion. So also in Cunningham v Fonblanque, 6 C & P 43 Parl J said "An usage of trade must be proved by instances" and cannot be supported by evidence of opinion merely." Similarly in Hall v Benson 7 C & P 711 (714), Tindal C J observed 'Is there any general course of business? Let your mind revolve over instances. I am not asking you whether it is just and proper, but whether there is any prevailing course of business.' But says Prof Wigmore 'there is no rule of exclusion. The usage is itself a fact and the opinion rule does not treat such testimony as in inference from data which can be adequately stated without the inference.' Wigmore § 1951. This view is in accord with the opinion of Lord Mansfield, in Camden v Coutley, 1 W Bl 417, where he ruled that insurance brokers and others might be examined as to the general opinion and understanding of the persons concerned in trade though they knew no particular instance in the fact upon which such opinion was founded. So the evidence of a well qualified witness as regards a trade usage who could not state individual cases is admitted inasmuch as the factum probandum is not a single isolated act or occurrence but the result or conclusion derived from a series of similar acts or circumstances creating and establishing in the mind of the witness a conviction or belief of the complex whole or comprehensive fact. Hamilton v Nicholson 13 All M s 351, Wigmore § 1951. Under this section opinion of a witness as regards trade usage is made explicitly admissible. Under section 13 specific instances of usage can be given in evidence. So under this section all usages of trade and agriculture can be proved by evidence of persons having special means of knowledge thereon Wigglesworth v Dallison 1 Sm L C 546

Family usage A custom is a rule which in a particular family, has from long usage obtained the force of law which must be ancient, certain and reasonable Hur Poshad v Sheodyal, 3 I A 259 (285), Ihria v Burren, 17 W R 316, Debendra v Putambai, 98 Ind Cis 43 A family custom must be established by clear and unambiguous evidence Abdul v Sona, 45 C 450 = 27 C L J 240 Lal Gajendra v Lal Mathura, 20 C W N 876, Nagendra v Raghu, W R (1864) 20 It may be proved under s 13 by specific instances. Under this section it can be proved by the opinion evidence of persons who have got competent knowledge of the same Family custom includes the custom of primogeniture, custom of peculiar descent in a family and other customary rights peculiar to a family

Tenants of any body of men This will include any opinion principle dogma or doctrine which is held or maintained as truth It will apply to religion, politics, science etc Aori Et p 228

The constitution and government of any religious or charitable foundation The opinions of persons having special means of knowledge as regards the constitution and government of any religious or charitable foundation are relevant under this section when the Court has to form an opinion as to the same Thus in Shore v Wilson, 9 Cl & F 355, where the founder of a charity in the early part of the eighteenth century, had in the deed of grant, described the objects of her munificence as 'Godly preachers of Christ's Holy Gospel' and it became necessary to determine a few years ago what persons were entitled to the charity, extrinsic evidence was admitted to show, that at that period of history a religious sect existed, who applied this particular phraseology, capable though it seemed at first sight of a far wider interpretation to Protestant Trinitarian dissenters and that the founder was herself a member of such sect Not Ex 228 In Hinckley v Thatcher, 139 Mass 477, where the bequest was to "the Authorized Agents of the Home and Foreign Missionary Societies" testator's religious opinions, as involved in his acts in connection with churches and religious societies were considered See also Att Gen v Pearson 7 Sim 290 (308) where the grant of land was for a meeting house, by Presbyterians for the worship and service of God The trustees and the majority of the congregation having later ceased to be Trinitarian in belief a bill to restrain the use of the land for non Trinitarian tenets was brought asking a decree for inquiry as to the tenets of the founders, for interpreting the terms of the trust and the 'tenets in general' of the founders were considered by Saduell V C

Meaning of words When local terms or phrases are employed where they are in use, the presumption is that parties understood their meaning, and employed them according to their local signification And to give effect to that agreement, the Court must know the sense in which they are employed Mayer v Walker 24 Ill 133 In such cases parol evidence is admissible to explain the meaning of words and phrases Burr Jones § 455 Parol evidence has been allowed to show the commercial meaning of the terms 'cotton in bales' Taylor v Briggs, 2 Car & P 525 'in the Month of October' Chaurand v Angerstein, Perke 43, Bissel v Beard 28 L R 740, 'highly honoured Lucas v Grouing 7 Trinit 161 'Balluc Sea' Udde v Walltan, 3 Camp 16 'bale', Eorissen v Penn 2 Com B N S 681 = 27 L J C P 29 = 3 Jnr N S 867, 'depart with convey Lethuier s case 2 Salc 443, Burr Jones § 455

Special means of knowledge Where witnesses, as members of a family, have special means of knowledge, as to the usages of the family, their evidence will be relevant under this section, so far as the existence of such usage is concerned Shyamanand Das v Rama Kanta 32 C 6 Such evidence is worthless unless it comes from persons who are shown to have some means of knowledge There is thus analogy between opinion evidence under this section and hearsay evidence of custom based on hearsay Vide Per Parle B in Crease v Barrett, 1 Cr M & R 929, per Parke B

50 When the Court has to form an opinion as to the relationship of one person to another, the opinion, expressed by conduct, as to the existence of such relationship, of any person who, as a member of the family or otherwise, has special means of knowledge on the subject, is a relevant fact

Opinion on relationship, when relevant

Provided that such opinion shall not be sufficient to prove a marriage in proceedings under the Indian Divorce Act*, or in prosecutions under section 494, 495, 497 or 498 of the Indian Penal Code†

(a) The question is whether A and B were married

The fact that they were usually received and treated by their friends as husband and wife is relevant

(b) The question is, whether A was the legitimate son of B. The fact that A was always treated as such by members of the family, is relevant

Principle. The question of presumption of relationship by conduct of parties often arises in cases of marriage and legitimacy. When the fact of marriage is in issue, subsequent conduct of the man and woman said to have been the parties to it is receivable to evidence the marriage. This conduct is traditionally spoken of as 'habit' and this common source of proof, with the reputation evidence which usually accompanies it, has come to be known by the phrase "habit and repute." The logical nature of the argument indicates it plainly to fall under the principle, that from the conduct of the man and the woman as married persons may be inferred their firm belief that they were at some prior time made husband and wife and from this belief may be inferred the fact. Hignore § 268. Upon an issue of the legitimacy of a child the conduct of the parents towards the child is admissible on the present principle, as involving an inference from the parents' conduct to their belief as to the fact on which the legitimacy depends (time of birth, time of marriage, identity of the child, and the like), and then from that belief to the fact itself. Hignore § 269. Similarly family conduct such as tacit recognition of relationship and the distribution and devolution of property is frequently received as evidence from which the opinion and belief of the family may be inferred. There is additional guarantee of its trustworthiness as opinion is to be evidenced by the conduct of the witness. Nort Li 229. The proviso is inserted as in divorce and bigamy cases the marriage must be strictly proved. Ibid p 230.

Scope of the section. This section is taken from section 649 of Taylor which is as follows: "Next family conduct—such as the tacit recognition of relationship and the distribution and devolution of property,—is frequently received as evidence from which opinion and belief of the family may be inferred, as resting ultimately on the same basis as evidence of family tradition. For since the principal question in pedigree cases turns on the parentage or descent of an individual, it is obviously material in order to resolve the question to ascertain how he was treated and acknowledged by those who are tuned towards him by any relations of blood or of affinity." The presumption in favour of wedlock is another instance of the rule omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta (all things are presumed to be rightly and solemnly done) Fox v Bearblock, 17 Ch D 499. It has its own special maxim seniper praesumitur pro matrimonio (The presumption is always in favour of matrimony) Powell Li 397. "By the law of England where a man and woman have long lived together as man and wife and have been so treated by their friends and neighbours there is a prima facie presumption that they really are and have been what they profess to be." Per Lord Cranworth in The Bredalbane Case 1 R 1 H L 40 at p 199. Iyle v Filwood, L R 19 Eq 93. This presumption of law is not to be lightly repelled and the evidence for repelling it must be strong, distinct satisfactory or conclusive. Per Lord Lyndhurst in Morris v Davis, 5 Cl & F 163. This was approved by Lord Cottenham in Piers v Piers, 2 H L Cas p 362, see also Langham v Thompson, 91 L T 680, George v Hayer, (1904) 1 Ch 456, Haynes v Caster, 91 L T 431, Cunningham v Cunningham, 2 Dow H L 507, De Thoren v Att Gen 1 App Cas 686. But according to English law in proceedings for bigamy, divorce, or damages for adultery, the marriages or ceremonies alleged by the prosecution or petitioner and upon which the proceedings are based, cannot be proved by reputation. Strict evidence thereof must be given. Cocle Et 91 citing Morris v Miller, 4 Burr 2057, Pouell 397, R v Wilson, 3 F & F 119. It is not necessary that the reputation of the neighbourhood should be uniformly and consistently in favour of the marriage. Lyle v Ellwood L R 19 Eq 98. Pouell Et 398. So also the legitimacy of a son is presumed from the conduct of the parent. Berkeley Peerage Case, 4 Camp 416. The scope of this section, leaving the exception out of consideration, seems to be that the person himself is not to be called to state his own opinion but that, when he is dead or cannot be called his conduct may be proved by others. The section appears to afford an exceptional way of proving a relationship, but by no means to prevent any person from stating a fact of which he or she has special means of knowledge. A husband or wife is not, therefore, precluded from proving his or her marriage. Quern v Subbarayan, 9 M 9=1 Weir 572. This section enacts a rule different from the law of England. According to English law general reputation is admissible to establish the fact of marriage, but section 50 is limited to opinion as expressed by conduct and there is no other provision in the Act making evidence of general reputation receivable. Seshammal v Kuppanayyanagar 91 Ind Cas 102= A I R 1926 Mad 475. Where the question is whether one person is related to another in any degree the facts that, according to the religious usage of the party, the names of particular persons are usually recited or omitted during the performance of ceremonies, and the observance of pollution, are instances of conduct within the meaning of this section and are admissible in evidence. Ramlalshna v Chhanna, 26 Ind Cas 110.

Relationship by marriage. The parties and sections of marriage and general reputation of the fact may be evidenced with as much strength and distinctness by actions as by words. Thus the former may appear by their elopement and return as married persons. Their visiting with families of respectability was successfully relied on in the claim to the Say and Sele Baronry, and was dwelt upon as a strong fact by Abott C J in summing up the evidence in the case of Beaz v Ward. A similar weight was ascribed to the fact of a husband procuring a woman to be presented at Court as his wife. J Hubbock's Succession, 247. The act of exchange of marriage consent, as constituting a marriage may conceivably be evidenced by various sorts of evidence, any one of which might suffice to persuade the tribunal in the absence of some special qualitative requirement. In the first place the conduct of the two persons, in living together in the manner usual for married persons is some circumstantial evidence that they exchanged consent at a prior time. This evidence from conduct is commonly spoken of as habit and it is something more than mere co-habitation or living together, because it signifies living together and behaving in every way with the evident belief and asumption that they have the rights and responsibilities of persons who have contracted a lawful marriage. In the second place repute of the community or neighbourhood that these persons have been lawfully married is a kind of testimony which is based partly on the parties habit as married persons, partly on contributions of personal knowledge by those who have witnessed the exchange of consent, and partly on the absence of contrary evidence which would naturally have come to light had it existed. This net result of the sifting of the facts by gossip and by interested investigation is summed up on the community's reputation, and this, though it would ordinarily be inadmissible by the Hearsay rule, is by long acceptance admissible under a special exception to that rule. Now these two sorts of evidence—habit and reputation—are commonly found available together, and are therefore commonly offered at the same time. They are admitted on distinct theories, the one being circumstantial in its nature the other testimonial, but in practice use they are generally found associated. Ignore § 2083. In Breadbanes Case L R 1 Sc App 182, 192, 196 211, Lord Chelmsford said "Habit and repute arise from parties cohabiting together openly and constantly, as if they were husband and wife and so conducting themselves towards each other for such a length of time in the society or neighbourhood of which they are members as to produce a general belief that they are really married." In the same case Lord Westbury said "Cohabitation as husband and wife is a manifestation of the parties having consented to contract the relationship inter se. It is a holding forth to the world by the manner of duly life, by conduct, demeanour and habit, that the man and woman live together, have agreed to take each other in marriage and to stand in the mutual relation of husband and wife, and when credit is given by those among whom they live by their relations, neighbours, friend, and acquaintances to these representations and this continued conduct then habit and repute arise and attend upon the cohabitation. The parties are holden and reputed to be husband and wife, and the law of Scotland accepts this combination of circumstances as evidence that consent to marry has been lawfully interchanged." Ignore § 2083. In cases other than mentioned in the proviso evidence of habit and repute alone would be sufficient to prove marriage. Leader v Barry, 1 E-p 353, Doe v Fleming 4 Bing 266, Mazuell v Mazuell Ecol 290 292 R v Stodland, 2 Burr Sett Cas 508. "The general rule is that reputation is sufficient evidence of marriage, and a party who seeks to impugn a principle so well established ought at least to furnish evidence in support of his position." Per Paley B in Doe v Fleming 4 Bing 266. Sherborne v Naper 2 Ridg W P C 221, Reed v Passer, Penke N P 231, 233, Evans v Moigan, 2 Cr & J 453 456, R v Mills 10 Cl & F 534, Goodman v Goodman, 4 Jur N S 1220 1224 contra Cunningham v Cunningham, 2 D W 482. Where the question is as to the legitimacy of a certain type of marriage contracted by the members of certain family, much may be gathered from the treatment recorded to the alleged wives and from the way in which they speak of themselves in official documents and petitions and legal proceedings in which they were parties. Evidence of this kind is conduct admissible under s 50 of the Evidence Act (illustration B) as it shows the repute in which such marriage was held in the family. Maharaja of Kolhapur v Sundaram Aiyar 48 M 1=A I R 1925 Mad 497, see also Abdul Razal v Aga Mahomed 21 C 666 P C, Khaja Hedayet v Rayan, 3 M I A 293, Mahabta v Ahmed 10 C L R 293.

The law relating to marriage in Burma is extremely lax. No ceremony of any kind is essential. Mutual consent is all that is required. In the absence of direct proof, consent may be inferred from the conduct of the parties or established by reputation. But when proof of marriage depends wholly or mainly on reputation the circumstances of the case must be scrutinised with some caution because the same word which is used to describe a woman lawfully married is applied by the Burmese to a woman living with a man on less honourable terms. Ali Me v Ali Shene, 16 C W N 529=39 I A 57=39 C 192=14 Bom L R 204.

Legitimacy as evidenced by conduct. In Berkeley Peerage case Sir James Mansfield remarked that "if the father is proved to have brought up the party as his legitimate son this amounts to a daily assertion that the son is legitimate." 4 Camp 416. Similarly in Kimbury Peerage Case, App to Lc Merchant's Peerage Cos 120 Lord Eldon said "Evidence of the conduct of the supposed parents of the child appears to me to be admissible evidence upon this question (of legitimacy)." My Lords, when two women each claimed a particular child as hers, and called upon a person to decide between them, he ordered that the child should be severed in two parts and that each take half the true mother instantly waived her claim and he decided upon that, that the child was hers. What is the lesson this story teaches? Not, perhaps, that mere declarations are evidence in such a case for such declarations may be made for a temporary purpose (in that case both women made declarations and one of course made false declarations) but it teaches that the conduct of a parent, the feelings of a parent—those feelings being inferred from such conduct—afford us some evidence assisting us in arriving at a right conclusion as to the matter in controversy. It has been argued at the bar that mere declarations of parents on such subjects are not admissible evidence to affect a question of legitimacy, and that conduct is precisely the same thing that it is substantially nothing more than a declaration, that it is only declaration by deed instead of word. I will not say that all simple declarations are evidence in such a case but I will say that the conduct of a husband and wife towards a person claiming to be their legitimate child is in some cases admissible evidence upon the question whether the husband and wife had sexual intercourse at such a time as by the course of nature that child might have been the fruit of that intercourse. It is often material species of evidence. It is not always but it is frequently a safe ground for inference, for it comes from the least suspicious source that is, from the very individuals who are the most interested to give a different testimony. If there ever was a case where circumstantial evidence of this description is admissible, it is this. In the same case Lord Redesdale said "Admission of a child by the reputed father and mother as their child is generally the only evidence of the fact even that the child is the child of the woman unless evidence of the persons present at its birth can be produced, and such acknowledgment is sufficient evidence if not rebutted by clear evidence to the contrary." Wignore § 269. So also the concealment of the birth of a child from her husband Haggrave v Haggrave, 2 C & K 701. The subsequent treatment of such child by the person who at the time of its conception was living in a state of adultery with the mother—and that the fact that the child and its descendants assumed the name of the adulterer, and had never been recognised in the family as the legitimate offspring of the husband—are circumstances that will go far to rebut the presumption of legitimacy which the law raises in favour of the issue of a married woman. Taylor § 649. Goodright v Saul 4 T R 356. Morris v Davies 5 Cl & Fin 163, Banbury Peerage Case supra. R v Mansfield, 1 Q B 144. Townshend Peer 10 Cl & Fin 290. Stehley v Spigg, 33 L J Ch 345. Again if the question be whether a person, from whom the claimant traces his descent was the son of a particular testator the fact that all the members of the family appear to have been mentioned in the Will but that no notice is taken of such person is strong evidence to show either that he was not the son, or at least that he died without issue before the date of the Will (Traen Peer 10 Cl & F 100 per Lord Campbell Robson v All Gen 10 Cl & F in 493—500) and if the object be to prove that a man left no children the production of his Will in which no notice is taken of his family and by which his property is bequeathed to strangers or collateral relations is cogent evidence of his having died childless. Huagale v Gascoigne 2 Phill 25. Opinion expressed by conduct is admissible under this section to prove legitimacy. Gopalasami v Arunachellam, 27 M 32.

Adoption. Under this section the conduct of parties is very strong evidence regarding the factum of an adoption. Mullangi v Venkatasubrammah 19 Ind Crs 740=25 M L J 373=13 M L T 515. Such evidence is also admissible where a person is treated as an heir. Maharaja Pertao v Maharani Subhao, 3 C 626 P C=1 C L R 113.

Proviso. The proviso is inserted because in divorce adultery and bigamy cases the marriage must be strictly proved—that is by the evidence of a witness who was present at the marriage, or by the production of the register or examined copy of the register or such other record as the law of the country or custom of a class, may provide. Ant R 230. Greenl Et Vol 3 § 204. In cases of bigamy proof of second marriage is not sufficient. Greenl Et Vol 3 § 205, U S v Miles 103 U S 304. But the marriage may be proved by the conduct. Com v Jackson 11 Bush (Ky) 679. Upon every charge of adultery, whether in an indictment or a civil action, the case for the prosecution is not made out without evidence of marriage. And it must be proof of actual marriage in opposition to proof of cohabitation reputation or other circumstances, from which marriage may be inferred and which in these cases are held insufficient for otherwise persons might be charged upon pretended marriages set up for legal purposes. Morris v Miller, 4 Burr 2059, expounded in Doug 174, Smith v

Huson v. Philp at 313 11, (1811) It is not sufficient to prove cohabitation and marriage by reputation (Catherwood v. Calson, 13 M & W 265, Roscoe Cr 137) In a libel for divorce the Court will require proof of the marriage even though the party accused makes default of appearance (Williams v. Williams 3 Greenl 135)

The rule of law underlying this proviso has its origin in Morris v. Miller 1 Burr 207 decided by Lord Mansfield in 1767. In that case the opinion of the Court was asked upon the following question, whether to support an action for criminal conversation, there must not be proof of an actual marriage, the fact was they were married at Mayfair Chapel, the register or books could not be admitted in evidence. Keith who married them was transported, and the clerk who was present was dead, so that the plaintiff could not prove the actual marriage by any evidence. Counsel for the plaintiff argued that 'we proved articles (of post nuptial settlement) cohabitation, name, and reception of her by every body as his wife, though we did not prove it by any register or by witnesses who were present at the marriage'. Lord Mansfield C.J. said "It certainly may be done so in all cases except two,"—namely bigamy and criminal conversation. The plaintiff's counsel then argued that the defendant's admission of the marriage sufficed. The defendant's Counsel argued that the reputation evidence (1) does not come up to the rule of being the best evidence in the plaintiff's power (2) it was not an actual or ceremonial marriage. Lord Mansfield C.J. observed 'Proof of 'actual marriage' is always used and understood in opposition to proof by cohabitation and reputation and other circumstances from which a marriage may be inferred. We are all clearly of opinion that in this kind of action, an action for criminal conversation with the plaintiff's wife there must be evidence of a marriage in fact acknowledgment, cohabitation and reputation are not sufficient to maintain this action. It shall not depend upon a mere reputation of a marriage, which arises from the conduct or declarations of the party himself. Inconvenience might arise from a contrary determination which might render persons liable to actions founded upon evidence made by the persons themselves who should bring the action. Perhaps there need not be strict proof from the register, or by a person present, but strong evidence must be had of the fact,—as, by a person present at the wedding dinner if the register be burnt and the person and clerk are dead'. Twelve years later the learned Judge thus justified his opinion in Birt v. Boulton, 1 Doug 171 (1774) (1779) 'An action for criminal conversation is the only civil case where it is necessary to prove an actual marriage in other cases cohabitation reputation, etc. are equally sufficient since the Marriage Act, as before. But an action for criminal conversation has a mixture of penal prosecution for which reason and because it might be turned to bad purpose by persons giving the name and character of wife to women to whom they are not married, it struck me in the case of Morris v. Miller, that in such an action a marriage in fact must be proved. Wignore Case Ex. cases nos 191 195. From the observations of Lord Mansfield in the above two cases it is clear that this requirement of proof of a marriage in fact is confined to two classes of case, namely (1) where the charge is a criminal one and (2) in the civil action of criminal conversation. The phrase proof of a marriage in fact' or actual marriage signifies proof by an eye witness i.e. either by the register containing the parson's entry or by the oral testimony of parson, clerk or some other person present at the ceremony. This mode of proof is accepted by Gibbs v. J. in State v. Wmley 14 N H 480 495 (Am). In criminal prosecution like indictment for bigamy adultery etc. direct evidence of the marriage is required and this may appear from the testimony of witnesses who were present at the ceremony. This constitutes proof of a marriage in fact and is merely direct evidence of the marriage as contradistinguished from cohabitation etc. which is indirect evidence of marriage. Ibid. It may be added that in Lord Mansfield's time the action of criminal conversation occupied a far more prominent position and was therefore more liable to abuse. Wignore § 2084. Nevertheless the rule of law as laid down by Lord Mansfield in the above two cases is applied uniformly in common law of England (Catherwood v. Calson, 13 M & W 260 (1844)). But the rule is not very sound and cannot be supported on principle. Ide Wignore § 2084. But the comparative infrequency of this action now a days has allowed the rule to continue without dispute Ibid § 2085 S 50.

The present law of England is thus stated by Stephen J "The facts that they cohabited and were treated by others as man and wife are not sufficient to prove a marriage in a prosecution for bigamy or in proceedings for a divorce, or in a petition for damages against an adulterer." But this seems to put it too broadly. The marriage and subsequent ceremony upon which the prosecution is based certainly cannot be so proved, but it may be that another marriage becomes material in such prosecution, and such marriage can certainly be proved by reputation, although it is proving a marriage 'in a prosecution for bigamy'. Thus in the case of R v Wilson, 3 F & F 119, the prisoner pleaded that when she went through the first ceremony alleged, the man was already married, and, therefore, the ceremony was void, and she had not committed bigamy. This marriage, so alleged by the prisoner, was allowed to be proved by reputation Codde Cas 192. Be that as it may, the Indian Legislature following the English rule excluded from the operation of the proviso the civil action for damages against an adulterer and included in it the offence of adultery (vide s 497, Penal Code) in as much as in India 'Adultery' is a criminal offence whereas in England it is a civil wrong. See also Stat 24 & 25 Vict C 100, § 57, Stat 20 & 21 Vic C 85 § 33. 'These exceptions rest on the ground that such proceedings, being of a penal nature, require the strictest proof and a further reason for the exception in the cases of adultery seems to be, to prevent parties from setting up pretended marriages for evil purposes.' Taylor § 172, Morris v Miller, & Burr 2057. After criticising Lord Mansfield's reasons for the exception in Morris v Miller, (supra) Prof Wigmore says "What is the peculiar immorality of the offence of bigamy? Usually, it is the deception of the other party to the marriage, by leading her (or him) into a void and un sanctioned relation and by afterwards deserting for another, as well as the injury to the progeny by placing them in the world without rights of legitimate children. Now this deception and desertion and social wrong are equally consummated by a relation appearing in habit and repute to be a marriage, even though it be not a valid one. The moral meanness of that man and the social consequences of his misconduct, are equally reprehensible, whether or not his first marriage could be proved by an eye witness and whether the marriage be legally binding or not. If it was not, it ought to have been. That the law of Evidence, instead of applying the equitable maxim that what ought to have been done will be treated as having been done, should let him go free of the charge of bigamy, precisely because he did not do the honest and lawful thing is a singular instance of haeret in corthce. As the rule of Evidence is confessedly based on a moral tenderness for the accused, it would seem that this moral tenderness should not be shown to a person whose conduct is equally reprehensible in any case. The more meritorious opponent in a civil case, whether it be a wife, or heir, or creditor, may be deprived of his alleged rights upon proof of marriage not consisting in eye witness testimony. It is a scandal to be more cautious and tender in favour of an opponent in that particular criminal charge in which the opponent has placed himself on a level of moral meanness below that of the least meritorious opponent in any civil case." Wigmore § 2084.

Under the proviso to this section, in proceedings of the kind therein specified opinion relevant under that section is not by itself sufficient to prove marriage which must in consequence, be proved in some other way. Mathana v Ialteh, 5 P R 1891 Cr. So where proof of marriage is an essential element of a crime as in the case with s 498 Penal Code, the marriage must be proved in the ordinary way, i.e., by other and more reliable evidence than that of the mere opinion of a person who as a member of the family or otherwise has special means of knowledge. Queen Empress v Subbarayan 9 M 9=1 Weir 572. This is in accordance with the principle that strict proof should be required in all criminal cases. Empress v Ialith 5 A 233-A W N 1893 1. Empress v Pitambar 5 C 566. But that principle is sufficiently satisfied inasmuch as in criminal cases a rule has grown up that the persuasion must be beyond a reasonable doubt. Wigmore §§ 2084, 2407. But never the less under

S 51 this section in all prosecutions for adultery under s 497 Penal Code the marriage must be strictly proved Gopal v Emperor, 4 Bur L J 107=A I R 1910 Rang 328 So the existence of a legal marriage has to be proved before a conviction under s 497 or s 498 I P Code can be sustained In such a case under this section the Court while not directed to exclude evidence of opinion as expressed by conduct, must not base a finding that such a marriage has taken place upon the evidence of opinion alone Outside that, the Court is at perfect liberty to arrive at a decision whether a legal marriage is in existence upon all relevant and admissible evidence which is placed before it in due course of law Raghupat v Emperor, 28 Cr L J 311=4 O W N 172=A I R 1927 Oudh 140 To justify a conviction under s 497, Penal Code the actual fact of the marriage between the complainant and the woman must be proved in some way or another Emperor v Bahu Dhondi, 17 Bom L R 75-16 Cr L J 213=27 Ind Crs 837 see also Empress v Aishad, 13 C L R 120, R v Inhabitants of Brampton, 10 East 282 R v Allison R & R 109, R v Manuwarung, 26 L J M C 10, Emperor v Dal Singh, 20 A 166, Gopal v Emperor, A I R 1925 Rang 328 In divorce cases as well marriage should be proved strictly Prem Chand v Hira A I R 1927 B 394

An expert may give an account of experiments performed by him for the purpose of forming his opinion

Principle The mere opinions of the witnesses are entitled to little or no regard, unless they are supported by good reasons, founded on facts which warrant them in the opinion of the jury If the reasons are frivolous or inconclusive, the opinions of the witnesses are worth nothing' Per Washington J in Harrison v Rouan 3 Wash C C 587 "Opinion is no evidence without assigning the reason for such opinion" Per Duncan J in Rambler v Fryon, 7 S & R 94 Higmore § 1917

Scope of the section In all cases in which opinion of experts is receivable, the grounds or reasoning upon which such opinion is based may also be inquired into Phip Et 4th Ed 362, Gout of Bombay v Meruani 10 Bom L R 907 (913) So it is clear that an expert may state his reasons for his opinion Sexton v North Bridgewater 116 Mass 200 Wood v Sawyer, Phill (A C) 276 Physicians may describe the symptoms that would be apparent and would ordinarily accompany an injury such as plaintiff sustained Cole v Fall Brook Coal Co, 53 N E 670 Where an expert testifies to the value of a certain piece of land, he may be asked the question, 'How did you get at your opinion of the market value?' Hawkins v City of Fall River, 119 Mass 94 But in Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs v Charlesworth 23 I A 121 (130)=26 B 1 their Lordships point out 'It is quite true that in all valuation, judicial or other, there must be room for inferences and inclinations of opinion which being more or less conjectural are difficult to reduce to exact reasoning or to explain to others Everyone who has gone through the process is aware of this lack of demonstrative proof in his own mind and knows that every expert witness called before him has had his own set of conjectures of more or less weight according to his experience and personal sagacity In such an inquiry as the present relating to subjects abounding with uncertainties and on which there is a little experience there is more than ordinary room for such guess work and it would be very unfair to require an exact exposition of reasons for the conclusions arrived at In a proceeding to assess damages for taking property for a street a witness testifies that in his opinion the market value of the property is enhanced by the widening of the street He is then asked to state the ground and reasons upon which his opinions are founded He should be allowed to give the reasons' Dunlop v Inhabitants 13 Gray 535 In that case the Court observed 'The ground on which an expert, a person of large experience in any particular department of art, business or science is permitted to testify to his opinion, is that from his larger experience and more exact observation of facts and the connection between certain appearances and their causes and results he is able to draw correct conclusions from circumstances which a man of ordinary knowledge and experience could not do.

The circumstances on which such an opinion may be founded are either facts of general notoriety assumed to be known to all persons of skill and experience in the department to which they pertain and which when explained, may be comprehended and applied by any person of good understanding, or it may be founded on facts proved. Such general facts, assumed to be generally known without specific proof, because they are capable of being known and understood without any such proof to all inquiries, are vastly too numerous to define, but the point may be illustrated by saying that they are such as the elements and forces of physical nature, the structure, capacities and functions of the human and other animal bodies, the common powers, propensities and passions of human nature and the impelling and governing motives to human action. As these are capable of being comprehended when explained, without specific proof, it appears to the Court that the witness should be permitted to explain the grounds and reasons of his opinion to the Court and jury, they may readily perceive the force of his reasoning, the soundness or fallacy of his logic and therefore judge of his capacity to give an opinion on the subject and the correctness of his conclusions and consequently the weight due to his opinion. But it is objected that the admission of this evidence would open the door to evidence entirely incompetent, by allowing the witness to state facts on which the opinion is founded—facts not proved by competent evidence. This objection seems to us to be founded on a misconception of the manner in which the investigation is to be conducted, and the testimony of experts received and applied. It assumes that the facts will be taken to be true because the witness has stated that he founds his opinion upon them, but this is quite a mistake. In order to obtain facts the opinion of a witness on matters not depending upon general knowledge but on facts not testified of by himself, one of two modes is pursued either the witness is present and hears all the testimony, or the testimony is summed up in the question put to him, and in either case the question is put to him hypothetically whether if certain facts testified of are true, he can form an opinion and what that opinion is? The jury will then be instructed, if the truth of such fact is contested, to consider whether the fact on which such opinion rests is proved to their satisfaction, if it is, then to give such weight to the opinion resting on it as it deserves, but if the fact be not proved by the evidence, then to give the opinion no weight. This is necessary to enable the jury, upon the true theory of jury trial, to decide all questions of fact upon competent evidence laid before them. But the consideration submitted in the argument in opposition to this view, namely, that the opinion may be given on the assumption of facts not proved is a strong additional reason why the grounds and reasons of the opinion should be stated in order that the jury may see that it is not founded on hearsay, general rumour, or facts of which some evidence may be given but being controlled by other evidence are not found true by the jury. This inquiry has been more frequently made in cross-examination, yet we are of opinion that it is competent evidence in chief. It is, in fact, this general knowledge on the specific facts judicially proved from which the jury draw their ultimate conclusion, though in matters of science they may be aided by the more exact observation and the larger experience of the trained expert." Larson expert & Op L pp 270, 271

CHARACTER WHEN RELEVANT

Character meaning of Character is a combination of qualities distinguishing a person, the individuality which is the product of nature, habits and environment. Standard Dictionary. So it is a combination of the peculiar qualities impressed by nature or by habit of the person, which distinguish him from others. Webster's Dictionary. "Is a man honest, is he good natured, is he of a violent temper, is he modest and retiring or impudent and forward—the all constitutes traits of character and are facts." Per Pearson v Bottoms & Kents, 3 Jones L 160, 11 Wynmore § 52

Meaning of Character under the Act In explanation to section 50, the Legislature state that the word 'character' includes both reputation and disposition. This is very misleading. 'That actual character' says Prof Wigmore is distinct from reputation of it, and the latter is merely evidence to prove former ought to be a truism. But the common use of the word character in the senses both of actual disposition and of reputation has led to obscurity of language in judicial opinions, and has thus tended to remove the emphasis from the distinction. When we argue that a defendant probably did not commit a forgery because his disposition was honest, or that a witness probably is speaking falsely because he is mendacious in disposition we are arguing from his moral constitution, which in its turn becomes a fact to be proved, and when we then resort to reputation or individual opinion or particular conduct we are resorting to it as evidence from which we may make some inference of the actual trait. Wigmore § 1608. Reputation is the estimation in which a person is held by others, especially the popular opinion, whether favourable or the reverse. Standard Dictionary. 'Character lives in a man reputation outside him.' Holland Gold Foil, C 19 p 219. 'Character is like an inward and spiritual grace of which reputation is or should be the outward and visible sign.' R G White, Words and their uses C 5 p 99. But it must be noted in this connection that there is some difference between a person's character and a person's general character. The term 'character' was normally applied to the actual qualities and not to the community's estimate of these qualities. More over the term 'general character' which it was sometimes applied to the latter to distinguish it from the former when spoken of at the same time was also and commonly applied to the former alone,—especially to make the second distinct on or to distinguish the general traits themselves from the 'particular acts instancing them'. This latter meaning (i.e. general disposition as opposed to the inadmissible particular acts showing it) seems to have been the original and natural source of the phrase and the orthodox application of it. Wigmore § 1951 (e), Layser's Trial, 16 How St Tr 246. In this sense the general character means general or abstract trait is distinguished from particular instances of it. So 'general character of a witness according to this sense means his qualities as a man generally. But now the term "general character" is used in the sense of reputation. A graphic definition of reputation which there is called general character, was given by Erskine. He described it as the low spreading influence of opinion arising from the deportment of a man in society. As a man's deportment good or bad, necessarily produces one circle without another and so extends itself till it unites in one general opinion, that general opinion is allowed to be given in evidence.' State v Lanton 78 N C 216, Burr Jones § 158.

Scope of Sections 52 to 55 The framer of the Act has dealt with the sections under the heading 'character when relevant'. But in the explanation of section 55 he has indicated how the character of a person can be evidenced. We have shown clearly that the definition of the Legislature that character includes both reputation is not only misleading but erroneous. Character and reputation are quite different things although in some cases the term 'general reputation' has been used for the term 'character'. But there are two distinct problems of evidence about character in which the common use of one word for two ideas has caused confusion. (1) Is a person's disposition—i.e. a trait or group of traits, or the sum of his traits—relevant and admissible for certain purposes? (2) Whenever it is so admissible as an evidentiary fact and thus becomes in its turn a proposition to be proved, how is it to be evidenced? The first question is essentially one of Relevancy, though auxiliary policies often come in to exclude relevant character. The second question however is ruled in an entirely different quarter: it has nothing to do with character as an evidentiary fact, but with the mode of proving character assuming it to be properly movable either as an evidentiary fact or as an issue. Wigmore § 52. So far as the first point is concerned character is offered as an evidentiary fact in sections 52 to 51. But the character of a person may also be a fact in issue (vide explanation to section 54 and section 55) and in the latter contingency character not in the strict sense of disposition but character in the sense of general character' or "reputation" may also be a fact in issue, as in the case of defamation. Whenever a party's character is itself a fact in issue whether in the sense of disposition or reputation, and whether it be in a civil proceeding or in a criminal case proof of that character is always admissible. Taylor § 375, Best § 208. But when a party's character is required to be proved not as a fact in issue but as an evidentiary fact, it is generally excluded. So the general rule is that from a party's character his conduct can not be presumed. So in civil cases a party's character as an evidentiary fact is wholly excluded. Such evidence can be given only in such cases, where the amount of damages depends on the character of a party. Good character of an accused as an evidentiary fact is admissible under section 53, from which the probability or improbability of his imputed conduct can be ascertained. When evidence of his good character has been offered, evidence of his bad character is also admissible. But the bad character of a party in a criminal case may also be a fact in issue. In such a case of course, evidence of his bad character is always admissible. These are the questions which are essentially one of relevancy. Now we come to the second phase of the question, i. e. how the character is to be evidenced. Two special problems which the second question raises are concerned with the Hearsay Rule and with the Opinion Rule. The Hearsay Rule concerns the question whether Reputation Hearsay, when offered to show character forms an exception to that rule and on what conditions the exception is allowed—what constitutes reputation, from how many people must it arise, in what place and at what time and so on. (Vide notes under s. 55 infra). The Opinion Rule raises the question whether individual testimonial opinion or estimate of character is obnoxious to that rule, and operates (if so applied) to exclude the testimony of individuals on personal observation of another's character. Wigmore § 72. "A witness called to prove them (traits of character) can only give the opinion which he has formed by his observations of the conduct of the person under peculiar circumstances. Has a man the estimated character or reputation of being honest or of being good natured, or passionate, or humane or cruel—this general character as it is called is also a fact: it is the opinion which those who are acquainted with him have proved in respect to his several traits of character. This is also a mode of proving real character, which is the object in view. But it is objectionable, because it is a mere approximation and does not arrive at the fact itself. The opinion of a man's acquaintances that he is honest or good natured, etc. does not prove that he is so. Still this mode of proof is less objectionable than that which depends on the individual opinion of witnesses: therefore it is admissible in more instances than the other. Per Pearson J in Bottoms v Kent 3 Jones L 160, Wigmore § 72. For further discussion on this point vide notes under s. 55 infra.

52 In civil cases the fact that the character of any person

In civil cases, character	concerned is such as to render probable or to prove conduct im-	improbable any conduct imputed to him is puted, irrelevant	irrelevant, except in so far as such character appears from facts otherwise relevant

Principle Evidence of a party's character in a civil suit is irrelevant for two fold reasons namely, (1) A party's character is usually of no probative value and (2) it should not be admitted as it tends to confuse the issues and to prejudice the jury. Wigmore § 64. The first ground is thus forcefully stated by Farler J in Houghtaling v Kellerhouse 2 Barb (N. Y.) 119. "But in a civil suit where the personal rights of opposite parties are to be weighed in a nicely adjusted balance, no proof except that relating to the facts in controversy should be admitted to turn the scale. Here the rejection of evidence is on the ground of remoteness or want of reasonable connection between the principal and evidentiary fact. Best Fr 5th Ed § 255. "In criminal cases evidence of good character of the accused is most properly and with good reason admissible in evidence, because there is a fair and just presumption that a person of good character would not commit a crime. But in civil cases such evidence is with equal good reason not admitted, because no pre-emption would fairly arise in the very great proportion of such cases for the good character of the defendant that he did not commit the breach of contract or of civil duty, alleged against him. Such evidence is also excluded on the grounds of (i) confusion of issues, (ii) unfair surprise or (iii) undue prejudice. In many civil cases the exclusion of character evidence rests also upon the danger of leading the jury into collateral inquiry which will confuse and obscure the real issues. McKelvey's Est § 116 "It is not only in contravention of the fundamental rule that evidence shall be confined to the issue to admit such testimony, but it would be infinitely dangerous to the administration of justice." Per Hosmer C J in Stout v Converse 3 Conn 345. Higmore § 64. In Wright v McKee, 37 Vt 163, Aldis J said "Many considerations concur in rejecting such evidence in civil cases. Evidence of this character has but a remote bearing as proof to show that wrongful acts have or have not been committed, and the mind resorts to it for aid only when the other evidence is doubtful and nicely balanced, it may then perhaps suffice to turn the weighing scale, very rarely can it be of substantial use in getting at the truth. It is uncertain in its nature, both because the true character of a large portion of mankind is ascertained with difficulty, and because those who are called to testify are reluctant to disparage their neighbours—especially if they are wealthy, influential, popular or even only pleasant and obliging. It is mere matter of opinion, and in matters of opinion men are apt to be greatly influenced by prejudice, partisanship, or other bias of which they are unconscious and in cases which are not clear they are apt to agree with the first one who speaks to them on the subject or to form their opinion upon the opinions of others. The introduction of such evidence in civil cases wherever character is raised would make trials intolerably long and tedious and greatly increase the expense and delay of litigation. It is a kind of evidence that is easily manufactured, is liable to abuse, and if in common use in the Courts, is likely to mislead as to guide right." Higmore § 64.

Scope of the section. The term "person concerned" is vague, but this section it is presumed, refers to the character of parties to the suit and not to the character of witnesses and represents the old state of the law, according to which in actions unconnected with character, the character of either of the parties is irrelevant and evidence introduced with the sole object of exposing the character of a party to the view of the Court is excluded. Of course, the Court may form its own conclusion as to the character of the parties or witnesses from their conduct as exhibited by the relevant facts proved in the case and it is perfectly legitimate for a Court to draw, from the opinion which it has so formed of the character of a party or witness, the inference that he might probably enough have been guilty of the conduct imputed to him or that he is not worthy of credit. In ordinary action on a contract it would be clearly irrelevant to offer evidence of a party's personal disposition or reputation for cruelty. Such evidence could throw no light upon the question at issue—did he commit a breach of his contract to repair plaintiff's house or mend his clothes? Nort Est p. 230. It seems hardly credible, says Prof Burdett Jones "that in this twentieth century cases have still to be decided and text books written about the reception of evidence of character in ordinary suits yet only so recently as in 1910 there was an illustration of the necessity for appellate watchfulness." An action to recover land was brought by two brothers named Quinnally against Temple and others. The plaintiffs were the sons and heirs of John Quinnally who died in 1835. The defendants claimed title under a deed from one Forbes to one Barrett dated 1837 containing a recital that it was "of land which he (Forbes) purchased from John Quinnally by deed bearing date October 7 1836, now delivered to the present purchaser who hereby acknowledges the receipt thereof. The question submitted to the jury, therefore was whether the recital in the deed to Barrett that Quinnally had conveyed the land to Forbes was true or untrue. Unless the jury was satisfied of its truth they were instructed to find for the plaintiffs. The defendants to sustain and support the truth of the recital were permitted to prove against the objection and exception of the plaintiffs, that John Forbes who conveyed to Barrett was a man of good reputation for honesty and firmness in his business transactions, and that the witness never heard 'his integrity in land transactions questioned' Evidence as to the general character of John Forbes was offered and received, of course, on the theory that a man of good character for fairness in business transactions would not probably represent by a recital in a paper signed by him that the land had been conveyed to him when it had not been. Circuit Judge Shelby said 'If, as a witness on the stand he had testified to the recited facts the same argument would apply—that his statement would be supported and strengthened by proof of his general good character for truth and veracity, yet it is well settled that evidence of good character of a witness whose character has not been attacked is not admissible. Until an attack is made on it the character of a witness is not in question. The same is true as to the character of a defendant in a civil suit where the nature of the action itself does not involve his general character therefore evidence of his character cannot be received to contradict an imputation of dishonesty or fraud. Even if the position of Forbes was analogous to that of a witness his evidence could not be bolstered and supported no attack having been made on him by proof of his general good character' Quinnally v Temple, 176 Fed 67, Burr Jones § 148. The California Code of Civil Procedure laid down the law in the following words: § 2053. Evidence of good character of a party is not admissible in civil action until the character of such party has been impeached or unless the issue involves his character. However just the inferences which might in many cases be drawn as to the merits of the controversy from the character of the parties such inferences are too vague and unreliable for that degree of certainty which should prevail in legal tribunals. So character is not relevant in civil action for assault and battery (Thompson v Church, 1 Root 312) nor in actions for trespass (Cummins v Crawford 88 Ill 312) trover (Wright v McKee 37 Vt 161) negligence (Commonwealth v Worcester, 3 Pick 462), or divorce (Wood v Herndon, 5 Port 382) nor in an action by physician for fees (Jeffries v Harris 3 Hawl 4, 105), nor is evidence of plaintiff's bad reputation relevant in civil action for assault and battery (Dolan v Breuer 77 Ill 280). Burr Jones § 148. Evidence of character in such cases has but a remote bearing as proof to show that the act in question has or has not been committed. It is uncertain in its nature, because true character is ascertained with difficulty and those who are called to testify are reluctant to disparage the influential and often too willing to disparage one under a cloud. Circuit Judge Selby in Quinnally v Temple, supra said "At best such evidence is a mere matter of opinion and in matters of opinion, witnesses are apt to be influenced by prejudice or partisanship of which they may be unconscious or by the opinions of those who first approach them on the subject. The introduction of such evidence, in civil cases, to bolster the character of parties and witnesses who have not been impeached would make trials intolerably tedious and greatly increase the expense and delay of litigation. In the words of the great Poet: Reputation is an idle and most false imposition oft got without merit, and lost without deserving." Othello Act II, sc 3. If in all cases of contract and tort such evidence were to be received the result would be more dependent on the popularity of the party than on the merits. The testimony would consist largely of matter of opinion and be greatly affected by bias and partisanship and would cause intolerable delay and expense. In a civil action for assault the proof was offered of defendant's character as a quarrelsome man. The Court said:

The general character is not in issue. The business of the Court is to try the case and not the man and a very bad man may have a very righteous claim. Thompson v Church 1 Root (Conn) 312. For still more obvious reasons, the character of the parties is generally irrelevant in actions on contract. Battle v Landenslayer 81 P 116. In actions based on negligence it is irrelevant to prove that the plaintiff or the defendant has on similar occasions been careful or negligent, in like manner it is irrelevant to show that either party has hitherto had the reputation of being prudent or negligent. Franny v Tuttle, 1 Allen 157.

Except so far as such character appears from facts otherwise relevant. Of course the Court may form its own conclusion as to the character of the parties or witnesses from their conduct, as exhibited by the relevant facts.

proved in the case, and it is perfectly legitimate for a Court to draw, from the opinion which it has so formed of the character of a party or witness the inference that he might probably enough have been guilty of the conduct imputed to him or that he is not worthy of credit Not Et 230

Where character evidence is admissible There are of course many cases in which character is a fact in issue or a relevant fact For instance, in an action for libel if the libel consisted in attributing bad qualities to the plaintiff and the defendant justified, the existence or non existence of those qualities it would be a fact in issue "Character as employed in these sections includes both reputation and disposition (Ide s 55) It must be distinguished from the 'state of mind' to which reference is made in section 14 and which (Ide illustration (k)) may be relevant in judging of the probability of conduct Cun Ev § 204 So it is clear that where the general character of a party is itself in issue proof may be received of what that general character is Taylor § 307, Best Et § 258, Phap Et 4th Ed p 167 Martin v Hardesty, 27 Ala 458 'In civil cases, says Poff Wigmore 'orthodox principle has seldom been abandoned in rulings upon the character qualities usually in issue,—the competence of an employed as to carefulness the professional competence of a physician to skill the mental capacity of a testator as to sanity, and the like in short the non moral traits of character is distinguished from the moral traits of peaceableness honesty, charity and general goodness, which usually come into question for a defendant in a criminal case As to the former class of traits, the orthodox rule in England was followed in America and per on knowledge and opinion was admitted' Wigmore § 1984, see also R v Williamson 8 C & P 635 R v Long Pelham's Chronicles of Crimes Ed 1891 II 217 227, Greville v Chapman 5 Q B D 738, R v Whitehead, 3 C & K 201, Ramadge v Ryan, 9 Bing 333 Biemer v Freeman 10 Moo P C 306 412 So also where the question was whether a governess was "competent, lady like and good tempered" while in her employer's service, witnesses were allowed to assert or deny her general competence, good manners and temper Fountain v Hoelle, 3 Q B 5 Brue v Biral Gelle 3 Ex 692, King v Waring 15 Esp 14 Jones v James 18 L J 243 Phap Et 4th Ed 167 And in such cases particular instances may be mentioned Best Et 258, Wharton Et § 19 Phap Et 4th Ed 167 In certain cases the evidence of character may be relevant for an assessment of damage, in such cases such evidence is admissible Ide s 12 p 176, In such a case no evidentiary use is made of character it merely plays a part in the legal issues of the case and the nature of the litigation must be looked to in determining whether character is so involved Wigmore § 54

Character in action for fraud Where the nature of a civil action does not involve the general character of a party evidences as to that character can not be offered to contradict an imputation of dishonesty or even of fraud The transaction presented in an ordinary civil case must depend upon its circumstances and not upon the character of the parties In such a case no matter how serious a moral delinquency may be involved in a fact and how much the establishment of that fact may affect a party's reputation he can not invoke the aid of his previous reputation to disprove the fact Smith v Phinckel 1 Strich (S C) 372 The doctrine has been announced in a few cases in American Courts that if a party is charged with fraud or other act involving a moral turpitude and the charge is based only on circumstantial evidence he may rebut the charge by proof of his good character Henry v Brown 2 Floss (Conn) 213 State v Beck 17 Minn 211 Town end v Grave 3 Page 155 Holker v Stephenson 11 p 284 Quay v Terry 3 Caine (N Y) 1120 Greenleaf has said 'And generally in cases of tort whenever the defendant is charged with fraud from mere circumstantial evidence of his general good character is admissible to rebut it' Green Et § 54 But this view is contrary to the clear weight of authority and does not seem to be his Upon any recognized principle of the law of evidence Instances are constantly arising both in actions in tort and contract where the nature of the parties are called in question but the fact does not in any legal sense render the general character of such parties relevant to the issue It is a far safer rule that, in conformity to the general rules of evidence in civil cases each transaction should be ascertained by its own circumstances and not by the character of the parties. The rule may be considered as settled that in civil suits evidence of character is not admissible except where it is directly in issue and when from the nature of the issue such evidence is of special importance. Whether the act charged or complained of be indictable or not is not material. Ward v. Heiridon 5 Port (Aln) 382. Burr Jones § 151. The Indian Legislature has left no doubt on this point by excluding all evidences of character by this section where the character is not in issue or relevant to issue. So character evidence has been held irrelevant in actions for robbery, to set aside probate of a Will on the ground of fraud on an insurance policy when the defence was over valuation for fraudulent burning of the property, for false representation as to the solvency of another for incurring a debt or other obligation for maliciously burning property for assault and battery for embezzlement for malicious mischief for fraudulent conveyance of property, for criminal conversation, for false arrest and imprisonment, for malicious prosecution for divorce on the ground of adultery and for procuring a deed of fraud. Burr Jones § 153. To some extent the reputation of parties is liable to be affected by any litigation but this is not ground on which evidence of character is held material in such actions as slander seduction and others which have already been referred to. In Smets v. Plumet 1 Strob (S C 372), the reason for excluding character evidence is thus stated "If in every case when an act of dishonesty is imputed the imputation may be met by such evidence then there are few cases into which such evidence might not be introduced trials would be insupportably tedious and the result of a trial would as often depend upon the popularity of a party as upon the merits of his case." Burr Jones § 155. The law on the subject is thus laid down by Fry C B in All Gen v. Bouman 2 B & P 532 note (a) "I admit this evidence in a civil suit. The offence imputed by the information is not in the shape of a crime. It would be contrary to the true line of distinction to admit it which is this that in direct prosecution of a crime such evidence is admissible but where the prosecution is not directly for the crime but for the penalty, as in this information, it is not. If evidence of character were admissible in such a case as this it would be necessary to try character in every charge of fraud upon the Excise and Custom House Laws."

In criminal cases, previous good character relevant

Principle "The object of laying the latter (character) before the jury is to induce them to believe from the improbability that a person of good character should have conducted himself as alleged and that it was a case of or misrepresentation in the evidence on the part of the prosecution." Per Patterson J in P v. Stannard 7 C & P 671. In the same case per J J "It is evidence to induce them to say whether they think it probable that a person with such a character would commit the offence." It is evidence of character then as indicating the probability of his doing so. It is not evidence of character as essentially relevant. "This presumption arises from the general experience that a person who has uniformly been of good character and whose course of conduct will depart from it only in cases of great temptation and upright course, but they are exceptions to the general rule that a person may be overcome by temptation and fall into crime. The influence of the presumption arises from the fact that it is a presumption supported by direct and positive evidence. It will be of great avail to control the mind of the jury. It will be strong and clear. If the evidence is such that it is a presumption against the defendant, the presumption from proof of good character will be of great weight and will be of great avail to the jury in acquittal." Conway v. Percival 22 S 71 (1865).

Origin of the rule Character being thus relevant it follows that an accused may offer his good character to evidence the improbability of his doing the act charged. But up to the beginning of 1800 S, its admissibility was not recognized in this absolute form. The admission of such evidence was subject to the following limitations namely, (1) character evidence was admissible only in capital cases (2) such evidence was admissible only in doubtful cases to turn the balance of evidence and (3) when the charge of the offence was admitted such evidence was not relevant. The following passage occurs in F M C Nalley's Evidence 370 (1802, Ireland). 'It has been heretofore held that a prisoner cannot examine to character except in favorem vite, when charged on a capital indictment but the rule is now widely extended in cases of misdemeanours. And this appears to have been the ancient practice. In R v Brown, 1793, the point appears finally settled. Lord Carleton C J C P and he had conversed with many of the Judges on the subject now before the Court, who thought as he did, that evidence of such a nature might be very material; for example, suppose a man of very great property indicted for perjury when the object to be attained by the perjury was a mere trifle, for instance a shilling or suppose a man to be charged with a riot or assault who was known to be of a peaceable and quiet disposition, evidence of character in such cases, directly encountering the nature of the charge in the indictment, must be of the first importance. Lord Kilwarden, C J A B agreed with Lord Carleton and observed that the reason generally assigned for the admission of such evidence in capital cases only was altogether unsatisfactory to his mind. It was said to be in favorem vite, but he had no conception, according to the principle, of sound sense and right reason, that character could be evidence in a case affecting the life of a man and yet not evidence in a case affecting his freedom his property, and his reputation. Wigmore Cas Pt Case No 21 Wigmore § 56. As regards the second limitation that such evidence was limited to doubtful cases only, the following charges to the jury of Lord Ellenborough in Darison's Trial, 31 How St Tr 217 are pertinent. 'If you do not know which way to decide character should have an effect. But it is otherwise in cases which are clear. If it could be permitted to operate where a crime is clearly proved, it would always be brought forward because there is hardly any one who has not at some time maintained a good character. If the evidence were in even balance, character should make it preponderate in favour of a defendant but in order to let character have its operation, the case must be reduced to this situation. Wigmore § 56 see also R v Broadhurst 13 Cr App R 125. But now it is well settled that an accused in a criminal case can always adduce evidence of his good character in his defence. In Commonwealth v Hardy (1807) 4 Mass (317) (Am) Patterson C J, said 'that he was of opinion that a prisoner ought to be permitted to give in evidence his general character in all (criminal) cases, for he did not see why it should be evidence in a capital case and not in case of an inferior degree. In doubtful cases, a good general character, clearly established, ought to have weight with a jury but it ought not to prevail against the positive testimony of credible witnesses. When the defendant chooses to call witness to prove his general character to be good the prosecutor may offer witnesses to disprove their testimony. But it is not competent for the prosecution to go into this enquiry until the defendant has voluntarily put his character in issue and in such cases there can be no examination as to particular facts. Wig Cas Et No 22 Wigmore § 56.

Scope The prosecution in a criminal case is not allowed to resort to the accused's bad character as a basis of inference of his guilt the reason being that such evidence is too likely to move the jury to condemnation irrespective of his actual guilt of the offence charged. R v Boulton Leigh & C 23 (40). But the accused himself may always invoke his good character as tending to disprove his commission of the offence no matter what the grade of the offence and no matter how strong the evidence against him. Green v Green 1 Cr 11 (11). The character by which ever party offered must be as to the specific trait—e.g. honesty violence charity etc involved in the fact charged. Per Erskine in Hardy's Trial 21 How St Tr 1076. It has already been stated that the rule with respect to the use of character evidence in criminal cases was in early times confined to capital offences. Cannemi v People 16 N Y 501 (507). It arose out of a desire to give the accused person every chance and it was considered that evidence of good character might justify an inference that the accused would not have committed the crime charged and that therefore the crime was not in fact committed by him. The rule was subsequently extended to all criminal cases. All Gen v Bouman (1791) 2 Bar & P 532 note (a). Upon the trial of an information against X for keeping false weights and for offering to corrupt an officer X offered testimony as to his character. The evidence was excluded, on the ground that it was not a criminal but a penal action. Eyre C B said "I cannot admit this evidence in a civil suit. The offence imputed by the information is not in the shape of a crime. It would be contrary to the true line of distinction to admit it, which is thus that, in a direct prosecution for a crime, such evidence is admissible but where the prosecution is not directly for the crime, but for the penalty as in this information, it is not." The Courts generally have refused to extend the principle beyond cases which were strictly criminal in their nature. The evidence in its nature is circumstantial and is to be given such weight as the jury think proper. It has no peculiar value beyond other circumstantial evidence, nor on the contrary is its effect limited to cases where on the other evidence, the jury are left in doubt. It is to be treated just as other circumstantial evidence, and is to be considered with and as a part of the whole case. Ramsen v People, 43 N Y 6. Without it other evidence may be convincing and yet in itself may be the foundation for that doubt which is necessary to an acquittal. People v Moett 23 Hun (N Y) 60, 65. "This is" says Mr. Norton "generally speaking of importance only where there is a legitimate doubt as to the prisoner's guilt, in which case such evidence is entitled to weight. When evidence was given as to the good character of a boy who had been clearly found guilty of theft, an Irish Judge summed up "Gentlemen of the Jury there stands a boy of most excellent character who has stolen six pairs of silk stockings." See also R v Turner, 6 How St Tr 613, Nott Li 231. So also in Com v Webster 5 Cush (Mass) 295 = 52 Am Dec 711 the Court observed at p 325. But, where it is a question of great atrocious criminality the commission of the act is so unusual — so out of the ordinary course of things and beyond common experience it is so manifest that the offence if perpetrated must have been influenced by motives not frequently operating upon the human mind — that evidence of character and of a man's habitual conduct under common circumstances, must be considered far inferior to what it is in the instance of accusations of the lower grade. Against facts strongly proved good character cannot avail. So we have many times found the proposition laid down in substance that where the act is one of great and atrocious criminality, and is strongly proved by other evidence, there evidence of good character cannot avail. This is erroneous as a statement of a principle. What is in the mind of the Court is, without doubt, that under such circumstances, evidence of previous good character would be of little weight. The very fact that it is competent to go to the jury shows that it may avail. Whelley's Li § 118. In Com v Webster 5 Cush (Mass) 291 the Court in the latter part of the judgment also said. But still even with regard to the higher crimes, testimony of good character, though of less avail is competent evidence to the jury, and a species of evidence which the accused has a right to offer. See Cannemi v People 16 N Y 501, 505-507. Now the accused's character in criminal cases is always admissible. Whether, when admitted, it should be given weight except in a doubtful case or whether it may suffice itself to create a doubt is a mere question of the weight of evidence, with which the rules of admissibility have no concern. Wigmore § 56.

It is to be observed that, where character evidence is admissible, there is a limit to the sort of evidence which will be received. A person's character is made up of many different traits. One trait, for example that he is a passionate, quick tempered person may properly lead to an inference that he might have committed some crime of violence charged against him, while it would have no bearing upon the question of whether he had been guilty of a larceny or forgery. Hence it is that proof of character where it is allowed should be, and is generally, confined to those particular traits which have some logical connection with the nature of the offence charged. Griffin v State, 74 Ohio St 55. In Dorsey Trial, 6 How St Tr 539, 552, where the accused was charged with seditious publication evidence was adduced by the prisoner that he was a faithful member of the trained bands. In disallowing this evidence, Hyle L. C. J. said: "Do not mistake yourself. The testimony of your civil behaviour, going to church, appearing in the trained bands, going to Paul's being there at common service,—this is well. But you are not charged for this. A man may do all this and yet be a naughty man in printing abusive books to the misreading of the King's subjects." In Jurges Trial, 32 How St Tr 1007, Abbott J. said: "As far as my experience goes, the enquiry into character is always adopted to the charge. So where a man is charged with unnatural crime evidence that he paid his bills regularly would be inadmissible." Per Mr Justice in urging in Hardys Trial, 24 How St Tr 1076, Horne Toles Trial 25 How St Tr 348: "The object and effect of such evidence is to disprove guilt by furnishing a presumption that the defendant would not have committed the offence and hence the character sought to be proved must be such as would make it unlikely that the party would do the controverted act." Per McClellan J. in Morgan v State, 83 Ala 224.

It is needless to dwell on the fact," says Mr McKelvey "that the character proved must be character prior to the time of the commission of the offence. This is implied from the very purpose for which the evidence is admitted." McKelvey's Ev § 118. But the above statement of law is not correct. Character at an earlier time is as much relevant as character at a later time, in of the deed in question. This relevancy depends on the assumption that it was substantially unchanged in the meantime. Character at the earlier or later time is offered not to prove or disprove the act in question but to prove the character at the time when the deed in question was done. All that is required is that the character must relate to a period proximate to the period of the supposed offence. R v Sanderson, 14 How St Tr 596. Similarly character in one place stands on precisely the same footing as character in another place. The person is the same wherever he is, and it is with the person that the truth is concerned. Most of the doubts, however, raised by a variation of time or of place have no concern with relevancy, but with the hearsay use of reputation to evidence character. Thus a reputation 'post litem motam' may be untrue, unworthy, a reputation in a community other than the prisoner's home may be ill founded. Wignore § 60. So far as this section is concerned which deals with relevancy those questions do not arise and more so as under the Indian Evidence Act character includes both reputation and disposition. No importance can be attached to evidence of good character where the case against the accused is clear. When it is doubtful some weight must be given to it. Queen Empress v Nur Mahomed, 8 B 223.

Effect and operation of evidence of good character. Good character should be permitted to operate as a positive, appropriate and substantial defence. No distinction should be made in application and effect, between evidence to prove exculpatory facts and evidence to prove the character of the accused. State v Murry 118 Mo 7, 25, State v W. Nally 87 M 644. Rex v Stannard 7 C & P 673. Both rests on the same basis. A man's good character is a fact making strongly for the inference that he is innocent and not a mere make weight to be thrown in the scale if his guilt is trembling in the balance. Underhill Cr Ev § 79. Though good character is of especial importance when the incriminating evidence is wholly circumstantial it is not to be rejected or even disregarded when the evidence against the accused is direct. State v Rodman 62 Iowa 456=17 N W 663. And, except in a few early cases (Rex v Turner, 6 How St Tr 565 613. Com v Webster, 5 Cush 295) its admissibility has never been limited to doubtful cases, or to those in which the other evidence was contradictory or unconvincing. Underhill Cr Ev § 79. It has been usual to treat the good character of the accused as evidence to be taken into consideration only in doubtful cases. Juries have generally been told that where the facts proved are such as to satisfy their minds of the guilt of the party character however excellent is no subject for their consideration, but when they entertain any doubt as to the guilt of the party, they may properly turn their attention to his good character. It is, however, submitted with deference that the good character of the party accused, when satisfactorily established, is an ingredient which ought always to be submitted to the jury together with the other facts and circumstances of the case. The nature of the charge and the evidence by which it is supported will often render such ingredient of little or no value but the more correct view seems to be, not in any case, to withdraw it from consideration but to leave the jury to form their own conclusion upon the evidence whether an individual whose character was previously unblemished, has or has not, committed the particular crime for which he is called upon to answer. 2 Russ C. 75. The correct rule is that in all cases a good character, if proved to the satisfaction of the jury must be considered. People v Van Dam 10 Mich 125.

Good character, though never conclusive may acquit if it creates a reasonable doubt. Though evidence of good character should always receive due consideration the fact that the defendant has established a high character for peace or honesty furnishes no reason why the jury must believe the evidence offered on his behalf if it is weak and contradictory. State v Brown 34 S. Car 11 15 (Am). The rule is that evidence of good character must always be considered not alone but in connection with all the evidence bearing upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused. The jury have no right to separate it from the mass of the testimony and to say that they believe the accused has a good character and that therefore they will disregard all the evidence of guilt. Sweet v State, 75 Neb 263. But while proof of unblemished character alone may not be sufficient as against proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, evidence of good character should go to the jury without language of disparagement by the Court, to be considered with all the evidence and not independently of it. Springfield v State 96 Ala 81. In a criminal case the circumstances may be such that an established reputation for honesty and integrity would create a reasonable doubt of guilt and require an acquittal though, aside from such reputation the evidence might be convincing, and justify a verdict of guilty. Underhill Cr. Ch. § 80. If the evidence of guilt is so convincing that it precludes a reasonable doubt, an acquittal will be justified if the evidence of good character considered in connection with all the other evidence, raises a reasonable doubt. Commonwealth v. Cate, 220 Pa St 138 (Am). Evidence that the accused is a man of good character considered in connection with the other evidence may be sufficient to create a reasonable doubt of guilt where such a doubt would not otherwise exist. The verdict of the jury, however is to be based upon the whole evidence, and if, after considering carefully the evidence of good character, the jury still believe the accused is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt they are justified in rejecting the evidence of good character. Broune v. United States, 26 C. C. A 31. The mere fact that a person has enjoyed the confidence of his superiors or that he had in fact led a life of honesty during the past is no reason to suppose that he will not succumb to temptation at the close of his career but before a man of this type and such antecedents is adjudged guilty the evidence against him must be of an unimpeachable character. Mangat Rai v. Emperor, 10 Ind L. J 262=29 Cr L J 710.

54 * In criminal proceedings the fact that the accused person has a bad character is irrelevant, unless evidence has been given that he has a good character, in which case it becomes relevant.

Explanation 1—This section does not apply to cases in which the bad character of any person is itself a fact in issue.

S 54. Explanation 2—A previous conviction is relevant as evidence of bad character

Principle "(Character) is strictly relevant to the issue, but it is not admissible upon the part of the prosecution because, as my brother Martin says, if the prosecution were allowed to go into such evidence, we should have whole life of the prisoner ripped up, and, as has been witnessed elsewhere, upon a trial for murder you might begin by showing that when a boy at school the prisoner had robbed in orchard and so on through the whole of his life, and the result would be that the man on his trial might be overwhelmed by prejudice instead of being convicted by that affirmative evidence which the law of this country requires. The evidence is relevant to the issue, but is excluded for reasons of policy and humanity, because although by admitting it you might arrive at justice in one case out of a hundred, you would probably do injury to the other ninety nine." Per Willes J in R v Routon, Leigh & C 520, 540. In the same case Martin B said "There would be great danger that the prisoner would be tried on the evidence of character, instead of on that bearing more directly upon the offence charged." Evidence of character and previous conduct of a prisoner being matters of prejudice and not direct evidence of facts relevant to the charge against the prisoner, ought not to be allowed to go to the jury (Queen v Bylunt Nath, 10 W R Cr 17; R v Tubenfield, 10 Cox 1; Amrita Lal Ma v Emperor, 42 C 957). But after a defendant has attempted to show his good character in his own defence, prosecution may in rebuttal offer as evidence his bad character. Illegitimate § 38. The reason for the reception of this evidence is thus stated by Paul J in R v Routon supra "If the prisoner, having a bad character misleads the Court, the false impression should be removed." See also Per Alderson B and Campbell C J in R v Shrimpton, 2 Den, Cr C 327. In Ford Mansfield's phrase, the defendant by going into his own character "gives a challenge to the prosecutor." Charles v Periam, 2 Ath. 833 (330).

Old Section Before the amendment of the section by Act III of 1891, s 6 the section ran as follows: "In criminal proceedings, the fact that the accused person has been previously convicted of any offence is relevant, but the fact that he has a bad character is irrelevant unless evidence has been given that he has a good character in which case it becomes relevant." (Explanation This section does not apply to cases in which the bad character of any person is itself in fact in issue). So under this section as originally framed, previous convictions are in every case admissible against an accused person (Queen v Impress v Kutch Chunder Das, 14 C 721; 2 Weir 760; Empress v Sulha, A W N 1886 47 but see Koshun Dosadh v Empress 5 C 768=6 C L R 219). Where a man is being tried upon a specific charge unless within the four corners of the law proof of a previous conviction is allowed for the purpose of proving guilty knowledge, or whatever it might be, no question ought to be permitted and no evidence allowed to show that this is a man of bad and dishonest character. But if the accused at his trial chooses to put in issue the question of his good character it is then competent to rebut such evidence by giving evidence of general civil reputation (Queen Empress v Hughes 11 A 25=A W N 1891 170).

Scope of the present section As a general rule the badness of the character or reputation of the accused is not in fact in issue or relevant to the issue and it is not permissible to show that he is of bad character or that he has a general disposition to commit the same kind of offence as that of which he is charged. It is not competent for the prosecutor to adduce evidence tending to show that the accused has been guilty of criminal acts other than those covered by the indictment for the purpose of leading to the conclusion that the accused is a person likely from his conduct or character to have committed the offence for which he is being tried (Milroy v The Queen 11 A 11 (1891) A C 57). The reputation of the accused may be made relevant to the issue by the accused if he introduces evidence to show that he is of good character. In all criminal proceedings the accused is allowed to call witnesses to speak of his good character (vide s 53). Issue Cr Law p 217. The reason for excluding evidence of the accused's bad character by the prosecution is thus stated by Sir James Fitzjames Stephen in his general view of the Criminal Law of England at pp 309-310. A man's general bad character is a weak reason for believing that he was concerned in any particular criminal transaction, for it is a circumstance common to him and hundreds and thousands of other people, whereas the opportunity of committing the crime and facts immediately connected with it are marks which belong to very few perhaps only to one or two persons. If general bad character is too remote a fact from the particular transactions of which that general bad character is the effect, are still further removed for proof, accordingly it is an inflexible rule of English Criminal Law to exclude evidence of such transactions. Hoodoffes 2d ed p 451. Under this section the fact that the accused has a bad character is irrelevant and cannot be admitted whether elicited by the prosecution or by the defence. Ma Myin v King Emperor, 6 L B R 4-9 Cr L J 376-2 Ind Cas 349. The law in India was the same even before the passing of the Indian Evidence Act. Queen v Mahim, 6 B L R App 108=15 W R 37 Cr, Queen v Behary 7 W R 7 Cr, Queen v Phoolchand 8 W R Cr 11, Queen v Gopal Thakoor 6 W R Cr 72, Queen v Dylant, 10 W R Cr 17, Queen v Kulum Shrikh, 10 W R Cr 39, Reg v Tammi 2 B H C 125. But this section has no bearing whatever upon the question of the relevancy of a previous conviction after an accused has been convicted of the offence with which he has been charged and for the purpose of enhancing the sentence to be passed upon him. Nga Ol Gyn v Queen Empress, L B R (1872-1892) 419, Emperor v Ismail 16 Bom L R 934-26 Ind C 997=16 Cr L J 83, Queen Empress v Nga Pui Pon L B R (1893-1900) 93, Nasir v Emperor 7 P R 1897 Cr, Queen Empress v Nga You 5 B R (1892-1896) Vol I 52. So a trying Magistrate ought not to take any previous conviction into consideration for the purpose of establishing the charge upon which the accused was tried and deciding as to the guilt of the accused in respect of the offence for which he was tried. Queen Empress v Nga Pui, L B R (1893-1900) 93.

Where evidence of the good character of an accused person has not been given evidence of his previous bad character is irrelevant at any stage of a criminal proceeding. Ida v Empress, 15 P R 1883 (C B), Nga Po v K 8 Cr L J 411. Such evidence is only relevant where the accused has shown that he has a good character or where the bad character of any person is itself a fact in issue. Nasir v Empress 7 P R 1895 Cr. Except for the purposes of awarding enhanced punishment in cases falling within the provisions of s 75 Penal Code evidence of previous convictions after amendment by Act III of 1891 s 6 stands upon the same footing, as regards admissibility, as other evidence of bad character. Nasir v Empress, 7 P R 1895 Cr, Emperor v Allomaya, 5 Bom L R 805=28 B 129, Emperor v Ilurped 5 Bom L R 1034. In a trial for an offence under s 101 where the character of the accused is not in issue evidence of bad character or reputation is not admissible and therefore evidence of previous convictions cannot be adduced. Mankwa Parse v Queen Empress 27 C 139=4 C W N 97. The good or bad character of the accused whenever relevant must be with respect of the species of crimes charged against him. R v Ranton Leach & C 520 (537), Captain Kudd's Trial, 14 How St Tr 116. Evidence of bad character cannot be given for the purpose of showing that the accused were of such a disposition that they were likely to commit the crime charged. But that prohibition does not in any way affect the evidence which is required to prove a motive for the crime which is otherwise relevant. Jagua v Emperor, 5 Pat 63=93 Ind Cts 884=7 Pat L J 396=A I R 1926 Pat 232.

In England the law makes a distinction between the question of the guilt or the innocence and the question arising after the conviction of assessment of the punishment which ought to be imposed upon him. For the first question the rules of evidence are strictly enforced and only matters properly relevant to that question can be proved. Evidence of the bad character of the accused including evidence of previous convictions is generally inadmissible, though in special cases it may be admissible. But in assessing punishment the Court takes into consideration not only the nature and circumstances of the crime itself but matters extraneous to that crime. There may be matters concerning the accused himself

S. 54 such as his character and antecedents, or matters which have no direct relation to him, such as the state of the crime in the country generally or in the particular locality. And in regard to this second question the ordinary rules of evidence do not apply or at least are greatly relaxed. The Indian law has adopted the policy of leaving the assessment of sentence in the main to the discretion of the Court trying the case. This section of the Evidence Act has no bearing whatever upon the question of the relevancy of a previous conviction, after an accused has been convicted of the offence with which he has been charged it is relevant for the purpose of enhancing the sentence to be passed on him. Empeior v Aga Ba, 111 Ind Cas 453=29 Cr L J 869=A I R 1928 Rang 200 (F B).

Accused person's bad character is irrelevant. The evidence merely to prove that the accused person's character is such that he is likely to commit the act of cheating with which he is charged is not admissible. Gudhari v Crown, 26 P W R 1910 Cr =6 Ind Cas 964=11 Cr L J 428. So the prosecution can not show the bad character of the accused in the first instance, i.e. before he offers to prove his good character. Telsenhat v State 30 Tex App 675. Underhill Cr L § 76. 'The rule and practice of our law in relation to evidence of character rests on the deepest principles of truth and justice. The protection of law is due alike to the righteous and unrighteous. The sun of justice shines alike for evil and for good the just and the unjust. The crime must be proved, not presumed, on the contrary, the most vicious is presumed innocent until proved guilty. The admission of a contrary rule even in any degree would open a door not only to direct oppression of those who are vicious because they are ignorant and weak but even to the operation of prejudices as to religion, politics character profession manners, upon the minds of honest and well intentioned jurors. Per Vesilant Sen in People v White 24 Wind 674. Wigmore § 56. So character in the sense of reputation or disposition is not relevant when it is offered against the accused. R v Cole 1 Phil Ec 509. The whole philosophy of the subject is thus summarised by Perham J in People v Shea 147 N Y 78 (Am) when he said 'Two antagonistic methods for the judicial investigation of crime and the conduct of criminal trial have existed for many years. One of these methods favours this kind of evidence, in order that the tribunal which is engaged in the trial of the accused may have the benefit of the light to be derived from a record of the whole past life of the accused his tendencies his nature his associates his practices and in fine, all the facts which go to make up the life of a human being. This is the method which is pursued in France and it is claimed that entire justice is more apt to be done where such course is pursued than where it is omitted. The common law of England however has adopted another and, so far as the party accused is concerned a much more merciful doctrine. In order to prove his guilt it is not permitted to show his former character, or to prove his guilt of other crimes merely for the purpose of raising a presumption that he who would commit them would be more apt to commit the crime in question'. Wigmore § 57. Similarly Doe J in Da Ling v Westmoreland 52 N H 401 (406) said 'There is an exception (which is a peculiarity of precedents of English origin) excluding relevant evidence of a defendant's general and notorious disposition to commit such crimes or torts as that with which he is charged. That such evidence is relevant the law acknowledges by receiving in criminal cases and in some civil cases evidence of a defendant's good character in his favour and allowing such evidence to be rebutted and by receiving evidence of the character of witnesses and of other persons. The exclusion of such evidence is a plain departure from the general principle which admits relevant and material evidence. There is reason to believe that this exception originated in a usurpation of legislative power by English Judges led by merciful impulse to mitigate the cruelty of a bloody criminal code by throwing obstacles in the way of its operation'. Wigmore § 57. Evidence of bad character can not be given for the purpose of showing that the accused were of such a disposition as they were likely to commit the crime charged. But after a defendant has attempted to show his good character in his own aid prosecution may in rebuttal offer as evidence his bad character. Wigmore § 58.

committed without a dishonest intention. Imperor v. Kahlitwar 25 P.W. 1 R. 313-102 Ind. Cr. 192-28 Cr. L. J. 756. The presumption arising from evidence of good character and of the fact that an accused person is an educated man of good family connection which would render it prima facie unlikely that he would be guilty of crimes of violence, cannot be pressed too far in the case of offences originating in extreme political feeling. Jure Inanna Thapar v. M. I. J. 17-11 Cr. L. J. 30-1 Ind. Cr. 700. But in other cases the good character of an accused person and the insignificance of the gain which would result from the offence committed by him are circumstances which in criminal cases have occasionally great weight but neither of them can dispose of clear and undisputed facts. Government of Bengal v. Buresh Chunder 16 C. 310.

Explanation I. This section is not applicable in case when the bad character of the accused itself is a fact in issue. Khalawan v. Emperor, A. I. R. 1924 Oudh 450. Such bad character of an accused proves a fact in issue under chapter VIII of Part IX of the Criminal Procedure Code. So far as section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code is concerned the evidence that is required to justify an order under that section must be evidence that would prove that the accused by his general reputation or otherwise comes within the category of one of the classes of that section. Sher Zaman v. Emperor 10 P. R. 1899. The fact that the accused had a bad character is not irrelevant under s. 54 of the Evidence Act when the evidence relating to it is not given for the purpose of showing that the accused was a bad character and was therefore likely to commit offences of the kind of which he has been convicted. Daulat Ram v. Emperor 2 Ld. L. J. 653. Evidence that one of the men (accused) ran cocaine and gambling dens long before the existence of the conspiracy which was the subject of the charge, was held admissible the prosecution can bring that one of the accused were first thrown together by frequenting or running such dens and that they continued to meet at such places for the purposes of the conspiracy charged. Sidat Singh v. Emperor 46 C. 700-50 C. L. J. 255-51 Ind. Cr. 3. If the evidence of a bad character is introduced in order to establish a relevant fact which cannot be proved otherwise the evidence of bad character is admissible. Thus where evidence is given in case of murder to prove that the accused had committed theft though it may be excluded as being evidence of character it is admissible to prove a motive or is evidence to prove habit and association. Khalawan v. Emperor, 5 O. W. N. 760-A. I. R. 1924 Oudh 450.

Explanation II. Whenever under this section evidence is regarded bad character of an accused is admissible his previous conviction is also admissible evidence of his bad character. But in other cases evidence of previous conviction is not admissible unless accused produces evidence of his own good character. Such evidence of the previous conviction of an accused person amounts to evidence of bad character. Fela Jhur v. Emperor 5 Pat. L. J. 706-60 Ind. Cr. 531-22 C. L. J. 219. The evidence of previous conviction may be considered in enhancing the sentence after the charge is proved. Lahim But v. Emperor 5 O. W. N. 124-109 Ind. Cr. 349. Upon the conviction of an accused the Court has to determine what punishment to award and to do this should take into consideration not only the nature and gravity of the offence committed but also the character of the accused. The bad character of the accused then becomes a fact in issue. Evidence of bad character being admissible as affecting the sentence evidence may be given only of general reputation and general disposition and not of particular acts by which reputation and disposition is shown. Evidence of previous conviction is an exception to this rule. Evidence of departmental punishment is inadmissible for the above purpose. Aaga Po v. Queen Empress L. B. R. (1893-1900) 502. The object of this section is to lay down that evidence of bad character including a previous conviction is a rule irrelevant to help to establish an accused person's guilt but not to lay down that it may not be taken into account in passing sentence. Sufan v. Emperor A. I. R. 1929 M. L. 506. Emperor v. I mail 39 B. 326-26 Ind. Cr. 995.

Character of prosecutor when relevant In a prosecution for rape, or for attempting to commit rape or for indecent assault, the accused is entitled to cross-examine the prosecution, and to call evidence in order to show that she has a general bad character in respect of chastity or morality, as for instance to prove that she is a common prostitute. R v Clarke, 2 Starke 241, R v Baker, 3 C & P 589 Wills Pt 2nd Ed p 59. In all cases of this character the assent of the witness to the act is the material matter in issue and on that question the defence generally rests on circumstantial testimony. In determining that question which is purely a mental act it is important to ascertain whether her consent would from her previous habits be the natural result of her mind or whether it would be inconsistent with her previous life and repugnant to all her moral feelings. Such habits as are imputed to the witness by this inquiry have a tendency to show such consent as the natural operation of her propensities and rebut the inference or necessity of actual violence. See Isham in State v Johnson 25 Vt 511, Wigmore § 62, R v Ryam 2 Cox C 115, R v Assumption, 1 Cox Cr 18, R v Clay 3 Cox C 116 R v Roberts 2 M & R 512 Fry § 363. He may also cross-examine (s. 15 infra R v Martin 6 C & P 362) and give evidence (Reg v Raley 15 Q B D 181, R v Coleridge 11 Cox 410) of specific acts of immorality with himself as they are held to be relevant upon the question of consent. Wills Pt 2nd Ed 56. Further than this he may cross-examine her as to specific acts of immorality with other men but in this case evidence may not be called to contradict her answers and she may even decline to answer at all. R v Hodgson R & R 211 R v Holmes L R 1 C C 331. If evidence of bad character is called by the accused the prosecution may call evidence to rebut it. Wills Pt 2nd Ed 56.

55 In civil cases the fact that the character of any person

Character as affect is such as to affect the amount of damages affecting damages which he ought to receive, is relevant

Explanation—In sections 52, 53, 54, and 55, the word "character" includes both reputation and disposition, but *except as provided in section 54,] evidence may be given only of general reputation and general disposition, and not of particular acts by which reputation or disposition were shown

Principle A principle of the law of damages is involved, i.e. whether compensation shall be regulated according to a certain fact, namely, quality of reputation: if yes, reputation becomes material, if no reputation is immaterial, and will not be considered. Wigmore § 70

Scope of the section Character is often by the substantive law of the case, a part of the issue and is not used as tending to prove any other fact. In such a case its admission involves only a question of that substantive law and no question of evidence. Greenl Et § 14(d). Where the character of a person affects the amount of damages such character is a part of the issue. Where A sues B for defamation and the issue is as to the proper amount of compensation the question arises whether it is fair to measure his compensation by the quality of his original actual standing in the community, and in particular whether the fact that he had little or no reputation to lose may be considered as good reason for diminishing the damages accordingly. It must be noticed that the cases generally deal not with actual character but with reputed character and further more that this reputation is not offered evidentially, but as an element brought into issue by the law of the case. Wigmore § 70. It is obvious that on the principle so generally accepted for an action of defamation (vide infra) the plaintiff's reputed character may be considered, in mitigation of damages in any other action in which the law of damages recognizes the

S 55 harm to reputation as one of the elements of recovery. This has always been conceded for the actions of seduction, criminal conversation, indecent assault, breach of promises of marriage, malicious prosecutions, etc. Higmore § 70

Character evidence in suits for defamation. Whether, in an action for defamation, evidence impeaching the plaintiff's previous general character as showing that at the time of the publication he laboured under a general suspicion of having been guilty of the charge imputed to him by the defendant, is admissible as affecting the question of damages is a point which has been much controverted. On the one hand it is urged, that the admission of such evidence would be cruelly unjust, as it would throw upon the plaintiff while seeking redress in a Court of Justice for a specific injury the difficulty of showing an uniform propriety of conduct during his whole life, and would give the defendant an opportunity under pretence of mitigating the damages of continuing and aggravating the original calumny, and that too, under circumstances when, from the absence of any plea of justification, his opponent was utterly unprepared to disprove the aspersion. Taylor § 359. "Therefore there is full concurrence of opinion amongst the whole Court that such general evidence of bad character is not admissible and that principally on the grounds that a party cannot be expected to be prepared to rebut it, and that if it were to be received, any man might fall a victim to a combination made to ruin his reputation and good name even by means of the very action which he should bring to free himself from the effects of malicious slander." Per Graham B in Jones v Stevens, 11 Price 235, 256, 269. In the same case Garrow B said: "If ever it should (become the law that such evidence should be admissible) the libeller will become a much more general character than we find him now, for he will derive protection and impunity from the apprehension and dread, with which the object of his malice would naturally be possessed of resorting for redress to Courts of Justice to vindicate his name, where it would be permitted to the defendant to bring forward testimony of general bad character which from its nature it would be impossible to disprove, whereby they in effect become the means of putting the libels of which they complain on the records of the Courts of giving a wider circulation to the calumnies contained in them." Higmore § 70. So it is further contended that if such evidence was admissible any man might fall a victim to a combination made to ruin his good name, even by means of the very action which he should bring in order to free himself from the effects of malicious slander, that timid though well conducted men, would consequently not choose to vindicate their characters in Courts of Justice, and thus libellers would enjoy a most dangerous impunity. Taylor § 359. To this it is replied with much force, that though the arguments on the other side would be entitled to great weight if the question respected the right of proving particular acts of misconduct they do not apply where evidence is offered of merely general reputation, that every man who demands compensation for the ruin of his good character ought to be prepared to rebut any evidence of his general bad character, that the danger of admitting testimony of this kind is only imaginary since the witnesses on cross examination might be compelled to state the grounds of their belief that as any failure in the evidence would probably much increase the damages witnesses would scarcely be called, except in support of a decisive case, that the law will not presume the existence of criminal conspiracies to ruin reputations and cannot be moulded to suit the convenience of irrational timidity that to estimate the extent of the injury which a plaintiff has sustained and consequently the amount of damages to which he is entitled the jury must first ascertain what was the real value of his character at the time when it was attacked by the defendant, and, that they can best, if not only arrive at a safe conclusion on this point, by inquiring what opinion was previously entertained respecting him by those with whom he was personally acquainted. Taylor § 360 citing Richards v Richards, 2 M & Rob 577. Lord Leicester v Waller 2 Camp 241. Bell v Parle 11 Ir Law R N 541. The reputation cannot be said to be injured where it was before destroyed, so where the plaintiff has previously extinguished his own character he has no basis for an action to recover compensation for the loss of character and its consequential damage. The law considers him as bringing an action of damage to a thing which does not exist Holt's note to Holt's N P 308, Wigmore § 70, Williams v Callendar Holt N P 301, Emer v Marie, per Lord Ellenborough, cited in 2 Camp 253 The reason for the admission of such evidence is thus given by Care J in Scott v Sampson, L R 8 Q B D 491 "Speaking generally, the law recognizes in every man a right to have the estimation in which he stands in the opinion of others unaffected by false statements to his discredit, and if such false statements are made without lawful excuse and damage results to the person of whom they are made, he has a right of action The damage however which he has sustained must depend entirely on the estimation in which he was previously held He complains of an injury to his reputation and seeks to recover damages for that injury, and it seems most material that the jury who have to award the damages should know if the fact is so, that he is a man of no reputation To deny this would, as is observed in Starkie on Evidence, be to decide that a man of the worst character is entitled to the same measure of damages with one of unsullied and unblemished reputation A reputed thief would be placed on the same footing with the most honourable merchant a virtuous woman with the most abandoned prostitute To enable the jury to estimate the probable quantity of injury sustained, a knowledge of the party's previous character is not only material but seems to be absolutely essential It is said that the admission of such evidence will be hardship upon the plaintiff, who may not be prepared to rebut it, and under the former practice, where the damages could not be pleaded to, and general evidence of bad character was allowed to be given under a plea of not guilty there was something in this objection, which however, is removed under the present system of pleading which requires that all material facts shall be pleaded, and a plaintiff who has notice that general evidence of bad character will be adduced against him, can have no difficulty whatever, if he is a man of good character in coming prepared with friends who have known him to prove that his reputation has been good" Wigmore § 70, Englishman v Lippatt Rai 37 C 760=11 C W N 713 See also *Knobell v Fuller, Per Add C1s 134, Newsum v Carr 2 Stark R 70, Plesshaw v Robinson 2 St Ev 641 Moore v Oastler, 2 St 641, Maubry v Barber, 2 St Ev 641, Airlman v Onley, 2 St Ev 306 (n), contra, Jones v Stevens, 11 Price 235, Wauthman v Weaver, D & R N P C 170, Cornwall v Richardson Ry & M 307, see also notes under s 12 at p 170 supra The American view on this point is thus stated by Prof Greenleaf "In most jurisdictions the former argument has prevailed, and the defendant may show the plaintiff's bad reputation in mitigation Several distinctions, however, may be noted (a) If the general issue is pleaded, the amount of damages is generally in issue, and the result in almost all jurisdictions is as above, (b) if a particular of truth is pleaded, some Courts hold that to allow the defendant to show the plaintiff's reputation would in effect be merely to allow him to attack the plaintiff's character instead of properly proving his plea, and (c) this is even maintained by some where the charge is a general one—e.g. A is a fraudulent person—where the general character is thus in issue on the plea of not guilty Stuart, 1 T R 748 (d) in the Courts admitting the plaintiff's reputation as a further difference arises as to whether (d') his general bad reputation alone may be used, or (d') only his reputation for the particular trait involved in the defamation e.g. honesty chastity, etc, or (d') both Greenleaf *§ 14 (d)

Seduction Character evidence of the daughter is admissible in an action for seduction for here the disgrace to the father is usually the loss of his daughter's reputation may therefore be shown by evidence of her previous bad reputation Dodd v Norris 3 Camp 519, Carey v Hill 1 E & 601, Williams v Callendar § 75 The father's own reputation is immaterial Id. In such an action another element of damage is the loss of society of the daughter if the injured party is other than the father Id. If the daughter is married the damage is none the less if the daughter was a person of good character before the seduction *v Forehand, 1 Mo 711, 5 Mo 117, 11 Mo 117, 12 Mo 117, 13 Mo 117, 14 Mo 117, 15 Mo 117, 16 Mo 117, 17 Mo 117, 18 Mo 117, 19 Mo 117, 20 Mo 117, 21 Mo 117, 22 Mo 117, 23 - § 55. mitigation of damages and specific acts of intercourse with other men may be shown Smith v. Withburn, 17 Iowa, 39 (Am.) When a father claims damage the daughter's character is not admissible under this section, although it is so under section 12 supra. I vide the next topic

Criminal Conversation. In an action for criminal conversation, the wife's previous bad reputation may be shown Starkie Pt. 1 of H 303, Higmore § 73. In such a case the husband's own reputation is immaterial, that a distinction is to be made as to his actual conduct or character for this, while not necessary an excuse for the defendant may well serve in mitigation, in as much as the loss of his wife's virtue can mean little to a person of his behaviour, than the reputation is here received as evidence of actual character Higmore § 73. According to Justice Field, the person whose character is in question is under this section assumed to be the same as the person who claims damages Field, Pt. 6th Id 201. Therefore under this section the wife's character is not admissible although it is relevant under § 12 supra. The husband's general character for morality may be proved because in such a case he can claim very little damage for the loss of his wife's society Taylor § 362, Jones v. James 19 I. L. N. S., Narracott v. Narracott, 33 L. J. P. & M. 61.

Indecent assault. The reputed character of the plaintiff in an action for indecent assault is immaterial. Here both the actual and the reputed character would have no bearing Gross v. Brodrecht, 21 Ont. App. 637. The plaintiff's character for unchastity is always receivable Miller v. Curtis, 18 Ala. 127. 'The mental sufferings of a vulgar and licentious woman from an indecent assault would be less than that of a modest and virtuous woman' Mitchell v. Wolf, 13 R. I. 61, Higmore § 75.

Breach of promise of marriage. The bad character of the plaintiff, in an action for breach of promise of marriage is clearly in issue both as a defence and according to circumstances in mitigation of damages. But for defence purposes it has to be proved. The general reputation of a woman for unchastity is no bar to her action for breach of promise of marriage. To constitute unchastity a defence the defendant must not only prove her to be actually unchaste but also that he had no knowledge of such unchastity at the time of making the promise to marry Tobes v. Hanchett 68 Vt. 319 (Am). The rule in such cases is that if any man has been paying his address to one that he supposes to be a modest person and afterwards discover her to be a loose and an immodest woman, he is justified in breaking any promise of marriage he may have made to her, but to entitle a defendant to a verdict on that ground, the tribunal must be satisfied that the plaintiff was a loose and immodest woman and that the defendant broke his promise on that account, and they must also be satisfied that the defendant did not know her character at the time of the promise, for if a man knowingly promise to marry such a person he is bound to do so. And therefore if the plaintiff has been guilty of criminal intercourse with another, and such fact is unknown to the defendant at the time of contract, he may prove it as a defence. It makes no difference when the unchastity occurred whether before or after the promise to marry so long as it was unknown to the defendant at the time of the promise in the former case, and that he did not waive it or request in it in the latter but took the most expeditious method of rescinding and cancelling his contract for that good reason Burr Jones § 151. In Williams v. Fisher 119 Iowa, 252 Bishop C. J. says "It is a correct doctrine, most certainly that where a man discovers after entering into a contract for marriage—the rule is the same, of course, the parties being reversed—that his fiancée is a woman of unchaste or immoral character he may, at his election renounce the contract and may plead such fact as justification of his conduct in any Court of law or equity. The principle involved is akin to that upon which the doctrine of implied warranty rests. But if the plaintiff has been seduced first by the defendant under promise of marriage, he cannot be heard to prove her bad character. The rule was thus stated by Parker J. in Boydton v. Kellong 3 Mass. 189 (Am). "It appears from the declaration in this case, that the plaintiff has been seduced by the defendant and that pregnancy was the consequence of the seduction. This of itself, would degrade her in the estimation of the public, and the defendant wishes to avail himself of this degradation, a consequence of his own misconduct, to avoid the plaintiff's action, or to reduce the sum she may recover in damages. No argument can show the absurdity of such a proposal in a stronger light than a bare statement of it. A gentleman, under pretence of courtship, pursues a lady to seduction, leaves her to suffer the pain and ignominy which necessarily follow, and when she appeals to the laws of her country for pecuniary satisfaction even that, inadequate as it is, is to be resisted or reduced, by urging her ignominy as a reason why she should not recover. To permit such a defence would be a reproach upon the administration of our law. Burn Jones § 151 (a)

Malicious prosecution. In actions for malicious prosecution, the defendant may show the general bad reputation of the plaintiff as known to him when he launched the prosecution. Martin v. Hardy 27 Alb 458 (Am.)

Explanation. The meaning of the explanation is not very clear. Character may not include reputation. Character may be evidenced by reputation. 'That actual character is' says Prof. Wigmore "distinct from reputation of it, and the latter is merely evidence to prove the former ought to be a truism." Wigmore § 1608. The term 'character' when more strictly applied, refers to the inherent qualities of the person, rather than to any opinion that may be formed or expressed of him by others, the term 'reputation' applies to the opinion which others may have formed and expressed of his character, so that as has been remarked in some of the books, when treating of this subject a man's character may be really good when his reputation is bad, and, on the other hand, his reputation may be good when his character is bad. But, as we have before intimated, the terms when used in connection with this subject are generally used in contradiction to this distinction, the term general character being used in legal signification, as it is frequently used in common parlance to express the opinion that has generally obtained of a person's character, the estimate the community generally has formed of it. Per Caldwell J. in Bucklin v. State, 20 Oh 23 (Am.), Wigmore § 1608. Similarly in Wright v. Chaffordville 142 Ind 636 (Am.), Jordan J. said 'Counsel seemingly confuses real character—that which is actually impressed by nature traits or habits upon a person—with what is generally termed reputed character. Reputation may be evidence of character, but it is not character itself. That which a person really is must be distinguished from that which he is reputed to be.' Wigmore § 1608. So it is clear that the real meaning of this explanation is that the term 'character' as used in sections 52, 53, 54 and 55, has been used in the sense of disposition as well as reputation and to prove the disposition of a person, evidence of his general disposition is to be given and to prove his reputation, his general reputation is to be proved.

English law. Under the English law the term 'character' was normally applied to the actual qualities and not to the community's estimates of these qualities. Wigmore § 1981. In Thomas Hardy's Trial 24 How St Tr 999 evidence was admissible to the effect "I have always esteemed him as a man of a mild and peaceful disposition." Similarly in Alexander Davidson's Trial 31 How St Tr 186 Lord Ellenborough said: "The correct inquiry is as to the general character of the accused and whether the witness thinks him likely to be guilty of the offence charged in the indictment." Wigmore § 1981. See also Trial of Cooper, Vasson, Stephens and Rogers 13 How St Tr 1180 ff. Fernley's Trial 11 How St Tr 106, Sir John Lush's Trial, 13 How St Tr 40, Butler's Trial 13 How St Tr 1260. So the witness constantly spoke from personal knowledge alone, and often (though less frequently) from personal knowledge plus reputation but to speak from reputation alone is regarded in the 1700's as improper. On this point the law in England was afterwards changed and allowed reputation alone. Wigmore § 1981. In Jones's Trial 11 How St Tr 310 (1809) Lord Ellenborough C. incidentally said "It is reputation, it is not what a person knows." But the isolated phrase above in Jones's Trial somehow caught the attention of later tract writers and being misunderstood has proved a great tumbling block. Wigmore § 1981. The practice and the rule in England to the middle

S 55 of the 1800s are thus plain. The statements of the early and classical writers (all writing from experience at the bar) are equally clear when we understand the usage of the term character in this connection. Peake Et 8 (1802), McVally Et 321 (1811), Starke Et 1st Ed Vol II, 366 (1824), Phillips Et 1st Ed 72, 108 (1811). That personal belief, estimate, or knowledge—under whatever name—was proper and unquestionable testimony to character seems clear enough as the law and the practice throughout the whole period. Higmore § 1931. In 1865 R v Roulton Leigh & Co 20=10 Cox Cr 25 was decided by a Court consisting of 13 Judges two (dissenting) Cockburn C J in delivering his judgment said. It is laid down in the books that a prisoner is entitled to give evidence as to his general character. What does it mean? Does it mean evidence as to his reputation among those to whom his conduct and position are known, or does it mean evidence of disposition? I think it means evidence of reputation only. No one ever heard of a question put deliberately to a witness called on behalf of a prisoner as to the prisoner's disposition of mind the way, and the only way the law allows of your getting at the disposition and tendency of his mind is by evidence as to his general character founded upon the knowledge of those who know anything about him and his general conduct. Now, that is the sense in which I find the word 'character' used and applied in all the books of the text writer of authority upon the subject of evidence. When we come to consider the question of what in the strict interpretation of the law, is the limit of such evidence I must say that, in my judgment, it must be restricted to this: the evidence must be of the man's general reputation, and not the individual opinion of the witness. The witness who acknowledged that he knew nothing of the general character and had no opportunity of knowing it in the sense of reputation, would not be allowed to give an opinion as to a man's character in more limited sense of his disposition. Pollock C B, Williams, Barlbun, Byles, Keating Mellor, and Shee J J and Martin, Channell and Piggot, B B concurred and Earle C J and Hilles J dissented. But in the same case Earle C J said. What is the principle on which evidence of character is admitted? It seems to me that such evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing the disposition of any party accused, and basing thereon a presumption that he did not commit the crime imputed him. Disposition can not be ascertained directly, it is only to be ascertained by the opinion formed concerning the man which must be founded either on personal experience or on the expression of opinion by others, whose opinion again ought to be founded on their personal experience. The question between us is, whether the Court is at liberty to receive a statement of the disposition of a prisoner founded on the personal experience of the witness, who attends to give evidence and state that estimate which long personal knowledge of and acquaintance with the prisoner has enabled him to form. I think that each source of evidence is admissible. You may give in evidence the general rumour prevalent in the prisoner's neighbourhood, and according to my experience, you may have a more personal judgment of those who are capable of forming a more real substantial guiding opinion than that which is to be gathered from general rumour. I have never seen a witness examined to character without an enquiry being made into his personal means of knowledge of the character. The evidence goes to the jury depending entirely upon the personal experience of the witness who has offered his testimony. Suppose a witness to character were to say, 'This man has been in my employ for twenty years. I have had experience of his conduct, but I have never heard a human being express an opinion of him in my life. For my own part I have always regarded him with the highest esteem and respect and have had abundant experience that he is one of the worthiest men in the world.' The principle the Lord Chief Justice has laid down would exclude his evidence and that is the point where I differ from him. To my mind personal experience gives cogency to the evidence whereas such a statement as 'I have heard some persons speak well of him' or 'I have heard general report in favour of the prisoner' has a very slight effect in comparison. Again to the proposition that general character is alone admissible the answer is that it is impossible to get at it. There is no such thing as general character, it is the general inference supposed to arise from hearing a number of separate and disinterested statements in favour of the prisoner. But I think that the notion that general character is alone admissible is not accurate. It would be wholly inadmissible to ask a witness what individual he has ever heard give his opinion of a particular fact connected with the man. I attach considerable weight to this distinction because in my opinion the best character is that which is the least talked of. The arguments of Mr Taylor upon this branch of the case have commanded my assent. They are strongly confirmed by the case of Rex v. Davidson 31 St Tr 99. In that case Lord Ellenborough held that the personal experience of a witness or his opinion founded upon his personal experience, was admissible. According to my recollection there were thirteen witnesses to character called in that case, and five or six gave evidence of very considerable personal experience of the prisoner, so as to show the means they had had of forming an opinion upon his disposition. The first witness stated the length of time that the prisoner had been employed under government and in other situations, and he was not interfered with till he came to the statement of a specific transaction. Then Lord Ellenborough stopped him, saying that particular facts were not admissible. Each of the witnesses was asked as to his means of knowledge and his opinion of the prisoner's disposition and Lord Ellenborough says 'the correct inquiry is as to the general character of the accused and whether the witness thinks him likely to be guilty of the offence charged in the information.' This is very strong proof that the practice is to stop a witness when he refers to particular facts only, but leave him at liberty to give his opinion founded on those facts. In this particular case the question was 'what was the character of the prisoner? and if the answer had been 'I knew him when I was his pupil and I say that his character is bad' and it had stopped there, it would in my opinion have been unobjectionable. It was a statement of personal experience, and the witness gave his answer according to the general inference which he had drawn from that experience. But the witness added a specific fact—the opinion of his brothers. Strictly that specific fact was not admissible, but in a grave case involving a very important question I cannot rest my decision on the particular answer. Wills J also said 'I apprehend that the man's disposition is the principal matter to be inquired into and that his reputation is merely accessory and admissible only as evidence of disposition. The judgment of the particular witness is superior in quality and value to mere rumour. Numerous cases may be put in which a man may have no general character—in the sense of any reputation or rumour about him—at all, and yet may have a good disposition. For instance, he may be of a shy retiring disposition, and known only to a few, or again, he may be a person of the vilest character and disposition and yet only his intimates may be able to testify that this is the case. One man may deserve that character (reputation) without having acquired it, while another man may have acquired without deserving it. In such cases the value of the judgment of a man's intimates upon his character becomes manifest. In ordinary life, when we want to know the character of a servant we apply to his master. A servant may be known to none but members of his master's family, so the character of a child is known only to his parents and teachers, and the character of a man of business to those with whom he deals. According to the experience of mankind one would ordinarily rely rather on the information and judgment of a man's intimates than on general report and why not in a Court of law? The evidence in this particular case was of a very peculiar character because the prisoner was charged with an offence which would not only be committed in secret if it were committed at all but would be likely to be kept secret by the persons who were subjected to it. Such being the case, in order to ascertain the prisoner's character for morality and decency, the persons of whom you would inquire would be those who had been within reach of his influence—persons who would not be likely to communicate his conduct to the neighbourhood or to one another."

In R v Davidson 31 St Tr 99, Lord Ellenborough himself afterwards (Col 183) put the final question to a witness "From your knowledge of Mr Davidson's character and conduct, do you think him capable of committing a find? In the next year (John's Case, 31 How St Tr 309, 310) Lord Ellenborough said 'What was his (the accused's,) general character for integrity in the question? And again after the following question and answer During the time you did know him, what was his general character for integrity? During the whole time I know him I considered him a man not only of unexceptionable but of a most honourable character—Lord Ellenborough It is reputation it is not what a person knows There is hardly one question in ten applicable to the point It is very remarkable, but there is no branch of evidence so little attended to' In 1794, in Hardy's Case, 24 How St Tr 999, there is a passage in the examination of witness John Carr, which shows what was then regarded as the true rule, and how common it was to disregard it 'How long have you known Mr Hardy? Upwards of twenty years—Have you known him well during that time? Yes—what character has he borne during that time? The character of a sober, peaceable, honest worthy man—From what you know of his character, is he a man at all likely to rise in disturbance, or commit any acts of violence? Never—Mr Attorney General That is a question never put Mr Gibbs It is a question, I never heard any objection to—Lord Chief Justice Eyre I have often heard it put, and often heard it objected to it is certainly not a strictly regular question, you are to ask his general character, and from thence the jury are to conclude, whether a man of such a character would commit such an offence at the same time, in justice to the question I must say I have known it asked a hundred times, I have very often myself objected to it—Mr Garrou If it had not been for the observation that it never was objected to it would not have been objected to' See the remarks of Ruffin C J in Downey v Murphy 1 D & B 85 the learned and important article of Professor Wigmore in 32 Am Law Rev 713, on 'Proof of character by personal knowledge or opinion Its History' Much reason is there shown for the view, that until a recent period character meant disposition, and the term "General character" imported only a contrast with particular acts Thayer Cas Ev p 280 see also Wills Trial 15 How St Tr 650, Huggins Trial 17 How St Tr 349, Acton's Trial 17 How St Tr 500, Captain Goodes Trial 17 How St Tr 319—1063 Dolan's Trial 28 How St Tr 1067 R v O'Donnell, 7 State Tr 637 (693), R v O'Connor, 4 State Tr 930, 1161 Ward's Trial 9 How St Tr 299 See James Fitzjames Stephen in his Digest of Evidence Note XXV as well as in his History of Criminal Law Vol I p 450 observed "One consequence of the view of the objection taken in R v Routon, is that a witness may with perfect truth swear that a man who to his knowledge has been receiver of stolen goods for years has an excellent character for honesty, if he has had the good luck to conceal his crimes from his neighbours It is the essence of successful hypocrisy to continue a good reputation with a bad disposition and according to R v Routon the reputation is the important matter The case is seldom if ever acted on in practice The question always put to a witness to character is, what was the prisoner's character for honesty, morality, or humanity, as the case may be nor is the witness ever warned that he is to confine his evidence to the prisoner's reputation It would be no easy matter to make the common men of witness understand the distinction The case expressly decides that if a man gains a reputation for honesty or morality by the grossest hypocrisy he is entitled to give evidence of it which evidence cannot be contradicted by people who knew the truth Similarly the following passage occurs in § 300 of Taylor v Evidence "The rule (i.e. the rule laid down by Corbett C J in Ex v Routon)—which appears to rest rather on authority than on reason,—would probably have been rejected long ago by Courts, had it not been for two causes First the rule in practice is seldom strictly enforced and next it has to a certain extent been modified by the Judges Aware that the better character is generally that which is the least talked about (Per Corbett C J in R v Routon) they have found it necessary to permit witnesses to give negative evidence in the subject and to state that they never heard anything against the character of the person on whose behalf they have been called Nay some of the Judges have gone so far as to assert that evidence in this negative form is the most cogent proof of a man's good reputation Ibid

Rule under the Indian Evidence Act The Indian Legislature leans to the opinion of Earle C J and Willes J in Ret v Routon, 34 L J M C 57 who held that evidence of character extended to disposition as well as to reputation. Nort E p 234. In Richmond v Aoruel, 96 Com 582=115 Atl 11. Wechsler C J said "Character might be proved in three possible ways (1) The estimate in which the individual is held in the community, that is, his general reputation as to the trait in question (2) The opinion as to this trait of those who have known the individual and had the opportunity to know whether he possessed this trait or not (3) The acts of the individuals under somewhat similar circumstances from which his character as to this trait may be inferred. The evidence of general repute affords the basis for an inference as to the actual character, whether it be the entire character or a single trait of character. Method 1 is generally recognized (in England and in America) as an established method of proving character. Method 2 is permitted in some jurisdictions (of the United States of America) but in most it is denied. Whether or not one was of quick temper will require proof of a mental characteristic and this is the proof of a fact. No one knows so well about this fact as he who has known the person and had the opportunity to determine it. How much more convincing is such evidence than that of a witness who testifies to the general repute of this person as to this mental characteristic? His testimony is based upon hearsay and quite likely rumour and gossip. If mental characteristic is a fact there is no valid reason why this fact may not be proved by any witness who knows what it is. Personal observation and personal knowledge are a more trustworthy reliance than general reputation. We think the decisions which we have referred and others to which we need not refer, require the admission of evidence of character from those who know." Wigmore § 1936. Similarly in State v Lee, 22 Minn. 109 Derry J said "As it is the fact of disposition which is important and material, there can be no reason why this fact may not be proved by any witness who knows what it is. There is certainly no reason why general repute is any better or more satisfactory evidence of disposition than the testimony of one who knows what the disposition is from his personal observation. Whether the witness knows what he pretends to know in regard to the disposition of a person in question whether his opportunities for acquiring such knowledge have been sufficient or his ability to acquire it has been competent, are matters which there is no practical difficulty in testing, either upon a preliminary or cross examination, or both." Wigmore § 1936, see also Englishman v Lappat Rai, 37 C 760=14 C W N 713.

Except as provided in section 54. The character evidence as is contemplated in section 54 is not confined to general disposition or general reputation. The character or disposition offered whether for or against him must involve the specific trait related to the act charged. Wigmore § 59. "The object and effect of such evidence is to disprove guilt by furnishing a presumption that the defendant could not have committed the offence and hence the character sought to be proved must be such as would make it unlikely that the party would do the controverted act." McClellan J in Morgan v State 88 Ala 224 (Am), Wigmore § 59.

Reputation Since reputation is looked to merely as evidence of the character reputed it follows that the reputation is hearsay testimony, for it is the expression of an opinion on the part of the community used testimonially, but uttered out of the Court and not under cross examination. It is therefore admissible if at all, as an exception to the Hearsay rule. It has been said in an opinion often quoted [Id. Per Lord J in Waller v Moors 122 Mass 504 (Am)] that reputation is admissible as a fact, i.e., as circumstantial evidence, but this is the merest error. Reputation is a testimonial evidence, i.e., the assertion of a number of persons used as the basis of an inference to the truth of the fact asserted and the true nature of this use cannot be obscured by calling it a fact. It is true that reputation is not always and necessarily used as hearsay, i.e., as a testimonial assertion. It may be a part of the very issue, as where the reputation of a plaintiff is in issue to determine the damages in an action for defamation, or where the reputation of a house of ill fame is in issue, in these and similar cases, the reputation is the fact to be proved irrespective of the actual character reputed. Hignore § 1609. The topics that concern this subject are chiefly as follows: (1) The time of the character provable, (2) the nature and formation of a reputation, (3) the persons qualified to testify to reputation, (4) the cross examination of such witnesses to reputation.

Time and character of the Reputation. Character is continuous quality, not quickly changed or changeable. The character of a person at another time may well be considered as evidencing his character at the time in question. As regards prior character the correct view is that character at any preceding time is inadmissible provided it is not too remote in time to have real probative value. As to subsequent character the question is a different one. A person's character after a certain time is equally indicative of his character at that time as is his character at a prior time and no difficulty on this score arises. But, from the point of view of the unworthiness of the reputation used as evidencing the character, an objection may be suggested to a reputation obtaining post litem motam, i.e. after trial begun or after controversy started, especially in the case of the accused person's reputation, for unfounded suspicions engendered by the accusation may have contributed to colour the reputation and render it untrustworthy. Greenl Ev § 161 (d).

Nature and formation of Reputation. In enquiry into the limitations affecting the nature and formation of a reputation it must be remembered that reputation is used only by way of an exception to the Hearsay rule, and that it must therefore take such a solid and definite shape as to be worthy of attention and to justify the exceptional resort to such evidence. Mere rumour is of course not reputation. A reputation involves the notion of the general estimate of the community as a whole—not what a few persons say nor what many say, but what the community generally believes. Kimmel v Kimmel, 3 S & R 337. It is not necessary that the community as a whole or a given proportion of them should have been heard to speak on the subject, it is what they believe that is important. Pielens v State 61 Mass 567. Further more, their belief may be as well indicated by their silence as well as by their utterance, and accordingly the fact that no one has been heard to say anything against the person's veracity or honesty or other quality in question is universally deemed to be equivalent to a reputation attributing that virtue to the person and therefore to be admissible. The reputation, moreover, can be supposed to be trustworthy only so far as it has arisen among those who have had opportunities of ascertaining the person's character i.e. it must be predicated of the persons among whom he dwells not of persons in a different place or in a place where he has merely sojourned, the form of the question usually refers to the opinion in the neighbourhood or the community but the sanctioned phrasings vary. Greenl Ev § 461 (d).

The persons qualified to testify to reputation. The witness to reputation must be one who by evidence in the community, or otherwise has had an opportunity to learn the community's estimate, and the preliminary enquiry whether he knows the person's reputation is usually insisted upon. Whetherbee v Norris 103 Mass 566. A person who leaves out of the neighbourhood is therefore not qualified and it has been doubted whether a person who has merely visited the neighbourhood for the express purpose of learning the reputation is qualified. Manson v Hartland 4 Esp 102. Douglass v Tousey, 2 Wend 354 contra, Boulkes v Sellway 3 Esp 236, Greenl Ev § 461(d).

Cross examination of a witness to reputation. In testing a witness who speaks of good character it will expose the untrustworthiness of his testimony if he admits that rumours of misconduct are known to him for the knowledge of such rumours may well be inconsistent with his assertion that the person's reputation is good. Per Parke B in R v Wood, 5 Jur 225. Accordingly the propriety of inquiry whether he has not heard that the person whose reputation he has supported has been charged with this or that misdeed has usually been conceded. On a similar principle a witness impeaching reputation may be tested on cross-examination by requiring him to specify the sources of his information, and in particular the persons whose remarks have served to give rise to his assertion that the reputation is bad, because there is practically no other effective way of exposing a false or unfounded assertion of a bad reputation. Weels v Hall, 19 Conn 377. This practice seems to be generally conceded to be proper. The preceding two principles apply in the proof of a defendant's or other person's reputation as well as of a witness's reputation. Green v Ep § 461(d).

General Reputation, meaning of. It is commonly said that the reputation must be "general", that is, the community as a whole must be agreed in their opinion, in order that it may be regarded as a reputation. If the estimates vary, and public opinion has not reached the stage of definite harmony, the opinion cannot yet be treated as sufficiently trustworthy. On the other hand, it must be impossible to exact unanimity, for there are always dissenters. To define precisely that quality of public opinion thus commonly described as 'general' is therefore a difficult thing. Wigmore § 1612. A reputation, to be provable reputation at all must be a general reputation. It may be either one of two opposites, for instance either good or bad. It cannot be intermediate,—that is partly one, and partly the other for that would not be general and there would then be no general reputation either way. But, if it be not general, then obviously it does not exist as a fact, and evidence can not be received to show a partial, limited or qualified repute. The existence of a diversity of opinion is one of the means by which a witness may know there is general reputation, but this means of knowledge, apart from the fact that there is or is not a general reputation and as a totally independent circumstance is not the thing to be proved. Per Mc Sherry J, in Jackson v Jackson, 82 Md 17=93 Atl 817. Although when witnesses are examined as to general character their testimony is not of much value as to habits of a suspected person, unless they can in support of their opinion, adduce instances of the misconduct imputed, when the question is only as to his repute, the evidence of witnesses, if reliable is not without value, though they may not be able to connect the suspected person with the actual commission of the crime. In the matter of the petition of Pedda Sua Reddi, 3 M 235=2 Weir 54.

General Disposition. Here the character is applied to the actual qualities and not to the community's estimate of these qualities. The term 'general character' means the "general traits as distinguished from the 'particular acts' instancing them. This meaning of 'character' (i.e. general disposition as opposed to the inadmissible particular acts showing it) seems to have been the original and natural source of the phrase and the orthodox application of it. In Lagers' Trial 16 How St Tr 246 various discreditable facts being offered to discredit a witness, the Counsel was stopped, on objection by Priatt L C J who said 'Mr Hungerford you know what the rule of practice and evidence is, when objections are made to credit and reputation of the witness, you can not charge him with particular offences. For if that were to be allowed, it would be impossible for a man to defend himself. You are not to examine to the particular facts to charge the reputation of any witness, but only in general you are to ask what his character and reputation is. You know, if there be any objection to him to his general character, he can answer them, but if objections are grounded on particular charges of his being a base or infamous, and an ill man, not having any notice of this it is impossible for him to defend himself'. Wigmore § 1981. In R v Cobbit, 2 State Tr N S 789 873, Lord Tenterden C J said 'The proper inquiry for a gentleman who has known Mr C many years is as to his general character, not as to any individual or particular acts. You may ask who have been acquainted with you what their opinion is of your character and your views on subjects connected with this publication. Then witness is to testify, e.g., "I have known him personally for five years, and I think him quite the reverse of a man likely to incite labourers to outrage". Wigmore § 1981. In Alexander Davison's Trial, 31 How St 186 Lord Morra sworn was asked "From your Lordship's general knowledge of his conduct is he a person whom your lordship would think capable of committing a fraud?" "Certainly not." Lord Ellenborough said "The correct inquiry is as to the general character (i.e. disposition) of

- S 55 the accused and whether the witness thinks him likely to be guilty of the offence charged in the indictment" In the same case his lordship himself put the following question to Sir Andrew Hammond "From your knowledge of Mr Divisons character and conduct, do you think him capable of committing a fraud?" So it is clear that evidence may be given of general disposition and not of particular acts by which the disposition is shown Aga Po v Queen Empress L B R (1893 1900) 352 Evidence as to a person's general disposition based on the opinion of the particular witness—such opinion being the result of the witness's personal experience and observation—will also be evidence as to his character But the evidence need not show that such general opinion is based on the personal knowledge of the man by his neighbours generally, nor does it show that such general opinion has been publicly expressed by his neighbours Durga Singh v King Emperor, 5 O C 203

PART II

ON PROOF

CHAPTER III

FACTS WHICH NEED NOT BE PROVED

S 56.

Fact judicially noticeable need not be proved

56 No fact of which the Court will take judicial notice need be proved

Scope of Part II In part I of the Evidence Act, what facts may, and what facts may not be proved in a civil or criminal case has been dealt with. After ascertaining that question, the framers of the Act now proposes in this part to deal with the question what sort of evidence must be given of a fact which may be proved, or in other words this part shows the manner in which a fact in issue or a relevant fact must be proved. Some facts need not be proved at all, because the Court will take judicial notice of them, if they are relevant to the issue. But where a fact requires proof, the rule is that it must be proved either by oral or documentary evidence. Every fact except (speaking generally) the contents of a document, must be proved by oral evidence. Oral evidence must in every case be direct, that is to say, it must consist of an assertion by the person who gives it, that he directly perceived the fact to the existence of which he testifies. Documentary evidence is either primary or secondary. Primary evidence is the document itself produced in Court for inspection. Secondary evidence varies according to the nature of the document. In the case of private documents a copy of the document, or an oral account of its contents is secondary evidence. In the case of some public documents, examined or certified copies, or exemplifications, must or may be produced in the absence of the documents themselves. Whenever any public or private transaction has been reduced to a documentary form, the document in which it is recorded becomes exclusive evidence of that transaction, and its contents cannot, except in certain cases expressly defined be varied by oral evidence, though secondary evidence may be given of the contents of the document. See Dig. Ev. Introduction pp. xiii, xiv

Proof The terms "evidence" and "proof" are often used in such a manner as to include at one time the media by which facts are established, and at another the effect or conclusions produced by the testimony. It is true the attempt has frequently been made, but without great success, to distinguish between the terms "evidence" and "proof". The latter term in its more popular meaning more often refers to the degree or kind of evidence which will produce full conviction, or establish the proposition to the satisfaction of the tribunal. More accurately, proof is the effect or result of evidence while evidence is the medium of proof. Best Ev. § 10 "Proof is that quantity of appropriate evidence which produces assurance and certainty. Evidence therefore differs from proof as cause from effect. Hills Cr. Fr. 2, 3, Greenl. Fr. 1 The words "evidence" and "proof" are often used as synonymous, in strictness however the latter is an effect of the former. "Proof is that which convinces, evidence is that which tends to convince." Jastr. Embell. v. Warshawski 120 Mich. 677 = 79 N. W. 935 (Am.) Burr Jones § 4

Scope of Chapter III "The second chapter having decided what facts are relevant we proceed to show how a relevant fact is to be proved. In the first place the fact to be proved may be one of so much notoriety that the Court will take judicial notice of it or it may be admitted by the parties. In either of these

S. 56 cases no evidence of its existence need be given Chapter III, which relates to judicial notice, disposes of this subject It is taken in part from Act II of 1855 in part from the Commissioner's Draft Bill, and in part from the law of England Draft Report of the Select Committee—The Gazette of India, July, 1, 1871, Part I p 273 'We have observed' says Prof James Bradley Thayer "that not all the matter of fact which Courts and juries rest upon, in deciding cases, needs to be communicated to them by the parties Much in every case is known already, and much is common to all cases, such things are assumed, stated and reasoned upon without discussion Often, also, much of which there might, in point of mere theory be a doubt will, as a matter of established practice be allowed by the Court in the first instance without formal proof And there is much which belongs to a dubious and arguable region as to which a Court may or may not proceed in this manner Thayer Pre Et 277

In another case proof by evidence may be dispensed with, namely, where the opponent by a solemn intra judicial admission has waived dispute This is known as Judicial Admission Wigmore § 2565

Facts which need not be proved Stephen in his Digest of the Law of Evidence (1st and 2nd editions,) Chap VII originally dealt with 'judicial notice' under the general head of 'Proof' and the special head of 'Facts which need not be proved' as in this Act For this he was taken to task by an acute critic (in 20 Solicitors Journal 937), who suggested that since Stephen's art 93, relating to the burden of proof, declares that whoever desires a judgment as to any legal right depending on the existence or non existence of facts which he asserts, must prove that those facts do or do not exist," and since art 59 (about judicial notice) declares that some facts asserted by a party need not be proved by him,—the true place for this last was that of an exception to the art 93 This led Stephen in his third edition to change the special head of Chap VII from 'Facts which need not be proved' to 'Facts proved otherwise than by Evidence' (his definition of 'evidence' art 1 being (a) the statements of witnesses in Court and (b) documents produced in Court) and called forth certain remarks in the preface to the third edition [Little and Brown's Ed (1877) 26] By proof I mean the means used of making the Court aware of the existence of a given fact, and surely the simplest possible way of doing so is to remind the Court what it knows already It is like proving that it is raining by telling the Judge to look out of the window It has been said that judicial notice should come under the head of burden of proof, but surely this is not so The rules as to burden of proof show which side ought to call upon the Court to take judicial notice of a particular fact but the act of taking judicial notice, of consciously recalling to the mind a fact known but not for the moment adverted to, is an act of precisely the same kind as listening to the evidence of a witness or reading a document that is it belongs to the general head of Proof As regards all this one or two things may be briefly remarked (a) "The general head of Proof, and the means used of making the Court aware of the existence of a given fact," include the whole topic of legal reasoning they spread far beyond the law of evidence The same reach belongs to the burden of proof So that both Stephen and his critic recognize the wide scope of judicial notice (b) It seems a very inadequate conception of the subject of judicial notice to speak of it as "a means of making the Court aware" of a fact it has to do not merely with the action of the Court when the parties are seeking to move it but when alone and acting upon its own motion To read a document in Court or listen to a witness there is to deal with evidence and so when an object is submitted to the Judge's inspection in Court But the true conception of what is judicially known is that of something which is not or rather need not be unless the tribunal will take it, the subject of either evidence or argument—something which is already in the Court's possession, or at any rate is so accessible that there is no occasion, unless the Court ask for it to use any means to make the Court aware of it, something which it may deal with quite unimpeded by any rules of law In making this investigation the Indian is emancipated entirely from all the rules of evidence laid down for the investigation of facts in general Mailby Notes to Indian Evidence Act London Henry Rowde 1897 (c) There is sometimes confusion between judicial notice and inspection or the dealing by a Court with what

Bentham calls "real evidence"—a thing submitted directly to the senses of the tribunal, as in Stephenson v The State, 28 Ind 272 (1867) where the trial Judge had decided the question whether the appellant was over fourteen years of age by simply inspecting him. He certified to the upper Court that "as the defendant being present in Court, presented the appearance of a full grown man such proof (i.e. other evidence) was not required." But the upper Court describes the situation as one where "no proof whatever was offered as to the age of the defendant." "The Judge was not a witness, and the state is not entitled to avail itself of his knowledge, except upon matters of which the Court takes judicial notice." The real ground of the Court's decision here (granting a new trial) appeared to be that when a jury or trial Judge decides a question of fact in this way a party loses the benefit of his exceptions, because there is no way of presenting the evidence to an Appellate Court in such a manner as to enable it to judge of "the reasonableness of the impression" made upon the mind of the lower tribunal. It is difficult to assent to the Court's conception of what took place at the trial, or their view that it is impossible to have the full benefit of exceptions when the trial Court avails itself of "real evidence." Stephen's illustration of proving that it is raining by telling the Judge to look out of the window," is another instance of the use of real evidence.—Thayer Ev 280 281

Judicial notice, meaning of. The expression "to take notice of anything in our ordinary popular phraseology, imports observing or remarking it. In the legal language of to day to "take notice" has a meaning co relative to that of giving notice, namely, that of a man's accepting or charging himself with a notification or with the imputation of knowledge of a thing. But the import of the legal expression to take "judicial notice" as indicating the recognition without proof of something as existing or as being true seems traceable rather to an older English use. The word "notice" was formerly often used interchangeably with knowledge and with the English legal term conscience. When this reports began to be translated and published in English in the seventeenth century and later we find that the phrase becomes interchangeably, take notice, take knowledge and take conscience. Thayer Pre Pict Ev 278. Where a cause is presented at the bar for trial, the Court and jury are presumed to be uninformally concerned concerning the facts involved in the case and it is incumbent upon the litigant parties to establish by evidence the facts relied upon by them respectively. There is however a large class of facts which need not be proved since they are judicially noticed by the Court and jury. That is to say there are a great many things of such common knowledge that the Courts ought to be presumed to know them—such as the existence and procedure of their own Court, the public laws, the calendar, treaties entered into by their own government and many other matters of such general notoriety, that every well informed man or woman within the limits of the Court's jurisdiction must or should know. If it so happened that the proof of any such facts formed part of a litigant's case he is excused from proving them, as it is said the Court will take judicial cognizance of their existence or in other words they will be taken as proved. And the importance of the subject of judicial notice can hardly be overestimated for there is no case in which there are not some matters which fall within the judicial cognizance of the tribunal before which it is tried, since the very law itself which is administered by the forum is a subject of judicial notice. Burr Jones § 107

Place of the doctrine of Judicial Notice in the Law of Evidence. The subject of judicial notice is not properly a part of the law of evidence, but, as it embraces the rules which relate to the facts in issue which are assumed to be true without evidence it is closely allied to it. McCleys Li § 11. Therefore the subject of judicial notice is deserving of being treated in connection with, if not, as a part of the law of evidence. It has to do with evidence in a negative sense in that it teaches when evidence need not be given. It is not always necessary to prove every fact which goes towards the making up of a case. The fact may be of such a nature that the Court either cannot or will not require any proof. Ibid "Whereabout in the law does the doctrine of judicial notice belong? Wherever the process of reasoning has a place, and that is every

S 56. where Not peculiarly in the law of evidence. It does, indeed, find in the region of evidence a frequent and conspicuous application, but the habit of regarding this topic as a mere title in the law of evidence obscures the true conception of both subjects. The habit is quite modern. The careful observer will notice that a very great proportion of the cases involving judicial notice raise no question at all in that part of the law, they relate to pleading, to the construction of the record or of other writings, and legal definition of words: the interpretation of conduct, the process of reasoning, and the regulation of trials. In short, the cases relate to the exercise of the function of judicature in all its scope and at every step. The nature of the process, as well as the name of it find their best illustration in some of the older cases, long before questions in the law of evidence engaged attention. We are the less surprised, therefore, to find that it was not until Stairie printed his book on evidence, in 1824, that any special mention of this subject occurs in legal treatises on evidence, and that this writer has very little to say about it. The subject of judicial notice then belongs to the general topic of legal or judicial reasoning. It is indeed woven into the very texture of the judicial function. In conducting a process of judicial reasoning, as of other reasoning, not a step can be taken without assuming something which has not been proved, and the capacity to do this with competent judgment and efficiency is imputed to Judges and juries as part of their necessary mental output." Thayer Ev pp 278 280

Principle Judicial notice is based upon very obvious reasons of convenience and expediency and the wisdom of dispensing with proof of matters within the common knowledge of every one has never been questioned. This is the principle upon which the doctrine of judicial notice rests, convenience and expediency and the saving of the time, trouble and expense which would be lost in establishing in the ordinary way facts which do not admit of contradiction. There is however no rule of any practical importance which governs every phase of the subject and each new question when it arises must be decided by the Court with no other guidance outside of analogous precedents than the general law applicable to the whole subject which is in the words of Greenleaf "Courts will generally take notice of whatever ought to be generally known within the limits of their jurisdiction." Greenl Ev § 6, Burr Jones § 103 (a)

Pre requisites of Judicial notice These are the three material requisites before a Court can take judicial notice of a fact (1) The matter of which a Court will take judicial notice must be a matter of common and general knowledge not merely the knowledge of specialists or experts (2) it must be known, that is well established and authoritatively settled not doubtful or uncertain and (3) it must be known within the limits of the jurisdiction of the Court, since, for example, foreign laws are not judicially noticed. Further more the mere personal knowledge of the Judge is not the judicial knowledge of the Court, judicial cognizance is taken of those matters only that are commonly known, and therefore the individual and extrajudicial knowledge of the Court that some of the parties are dead, or that the defendant is a resident of another state will not dispense with proof of those facts, and cannot be resorted to for the purpose of supplementing the record. Wheeler & Webster 11 D Smith (N Y) 1 (4m) And, on the other hand it is not essential that matters of judicial cognizance be actually known to the Judge. If they are proper subjects of judicial knowledge the Judge may inform himself in any way which may seem best to his discretion and not accordingly. The mere incident that the Judge himself does not know the fact will not prevent the Judge qua Court notice of it. The Court may obtain the information by investigation. It is easy to understand a party asking the Court to take judicial notice of a fact, and that the Judge should reply that he himself did not know it, but that if he ought to know it by reason of its notoriety, then he would take judicial cognizance of it. It would be absurd to suppose any Judge to know all that was in an encyclopedia or dictionary, and the Court will only take official cognizance of such things mentioned in those books as are the subjects of general knowledge. Burr Jones § 10, (a)

Meaning of the section It is necessary to consider what is meant by "need not be proved" in section 56. A fact is said to be proved when considering the matters before it, the Court believes it to exist (section 3). But no one, whether he be a Judge or not, can believe a thing to exist unless there is some matter before him which leads him to that belief. Everything, therefore, which a man believes must be proved in some way. The meaning of the section will however, be apparent if we consider together with s 56 the last words of s 57. What these two provisions really come to is this —with regard to the facts enumerated in s 57, if their existence comes into question the parties who assert their existence or the contrary need not in the first instance produce any evidence in support of their assertions. They need only ask the Judge to say whether these facts exist or not, and if the Judge's own knowledge will not help him, then he must look the matter up further the Judge can, if he thinks proper, call upon the parties to assist him. But in making this investigation the Judge is emancipated entirely from all the rules of evidence laid down for the investigation of facts in general. He may resort to any source of information which he finds handy, and which he thinks will help him. Thus he might consult any book, or obtain information from a bystander. Martby Ev 49

Facts of which Court
notice

57 The Court shall take judicial notice of the following facts —

(1) all laws or rules having the force of law now or heretofore in force, or hereafter to be in force, in any part of British India

(2) all public Acts passed or hereafter to be passed by Parliament, and all local and personal Acts directed by Parliament to be judicially noticed

(3) Articles of War for Her Majesty's Army, "Navy or air force" *

(4) the course of proceeding of Parliament and of the Councils for the purposes of making Laws and Regulations established under the Indian Councils Act † or any other law for the time being relating thereto

Explanation —The word "Parliament" in clauses (2) and (4) includes—

(1) the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland,

(2) the Parliament of Great Britain,

(3) the Parliament of England,

(4) the Parliament of Scotland, and

(5) the Parliament of Ireland

(5) the accession and the sign manual of the Sovereign for the time being of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland

(6) all seals of which English Courts take judicial notice the seals of all the Courts of British India, and of all Courts out of British India, established by the authority of the Governor-General* or any Local Government in Council the seals of Courts of Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction and of Notaries Public, and all seals which any person is authorized to use by any Act of Parliament or other Act or Regulation having the force of law in British India

(7) the accession to office, names, titles, functions and signatures of the persons filling for the time being any public office in any part of British India, if the fact of their appointment to such office is notified in the Gazette of India or in the official Gazette of any Local Government

(8) the existence, title and national flag of every State or Sovereign recognized by the British Crown

(9) the divisions of time, the geographical divisions of the world, and public festivals, fasts and holidays notified in the official Gazette

(10) the territories under the dominion of the British Crown

(11) the commencement, continuance and termination of hostilities between the British Crown and any other State or body of persons

(12) the names of the members and officers of the Court and of their deputies and subordinate officers and assistants, and also of all officers acting in execution of its process, and of all advocates, attorneys, proctors, vakils, pleaders and other persons authorized by law to appear or act before it

(13) the rule of the road †[on land or at sea] In all these cases and also on all matters of public history, literature, science or art, the Court may resort for its aid to appropriate books or documents of reference

If the Court is called upon by any person to take judicial notice of any fact, it may refuse to do so unless and until such person produces any such book or document as it may consider necessary to enable it to do so

Whether the list is complete A similar list is also given by Sir James Fitzjames Stephen in art 53 of his Digest on the Law of Evidence As regards that list he remarks The list of matters judicially noticed in this article is not intended to be quite complete It is compiled from 1 Ph & F 453-67 and T E ss 4-20 where the subject is gone into more minutely A convenient list is also given in R N P ss 88-92, which is much to the same effect It may be doubted whether an absolutely complete list could be framed as it is practically impossible to enumerate everything which is so notorious in itself or so distinctly recorded by public authority that it would be superfluous to prove it Note XXVI Similarly the list given in this section is also far from complete for instance the Anglo-Indian Courts take judicial notice of the ordinary course of nature, the meaning of English words, and all other matters which they are directed by any Act to notice, such as, in Bengal, list of land holders who have not made land cess returns (Ben Act IX of 1850, s 19) in Madras by law framed by the Commissioner of Police (Mad Act III of 1862 s 5), in Bombay notifications in the Gazette (Bomb Act X of 1866 s 4), in Oudh the list of Taluqdars and grantees published by the Chief Commissioner (Act I of 1869, s 10) Whitley Stokes Anglo Indian Codes Vol II p 887. Although the penultimate clause of section 57 does not absolve a party from proof of any fact which does not fall within the provision of clauses 1 to 13 of this section, the facts of which the Court may take judicial notice are not limited to this clause. Englishman v Lala Lajpat Rai, 14 C W N 713=37 C 376. A general rule of construction of Acts of Parliament is expressio unius est exclusio alterius (The express mention of one thing implies the exclusion of another). Fer Sir Barnes in Blackburn v Flaxelle (1881) 6 App Cas 628 at p 634. In Drumwater v Athan, (1879) 10 Sup Ct N S W 163, Hogge J observed "If there be any one rule of law clearer than another as the construction of all statutes and all written instruments (as for example sales under powers in deeds or wills) it is this that when the Legislature or the parties to any instruments have expressly authorised one or more particular modes of sale or other dealing with property such expressions always exclude any other mode except as specifically authorised." This rule, or as it is otherwise worded, expressum facit cessare tacitum (Co Litt 310r 183b), enunciates one of the first principles applicable to the construction of written instruments. Broom's Legal Maxims 7th Ed p 191. So provisions sometimes found in statutes enacting imperfectly or for particular cases that which was already and more widely the law, have occasionally furnished ground for the contention that an intention to alter the general law was to be inferred from the partial or limited enactment resting on the maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius. But that maxim is inapplicable in such cases. The only inference which a Court can draw from such superfluous provisions (which generally find a place in Acts to meet unfounded objections and idle doubts) is that the Legislature was either ignorant or unmindful of the real state of the law, or that it acted under the influence of excessive caution and if the law be different from what the Legislature supposed it to be the implication arising from the statute, it has been said cannot operate as a negation of its existence. Any legislation founded on such a mistake has not the effect of making that law which the Legislature erroneously assumed it to be so. Mazuel 548. Similarly in Krishna Kamini Dasi v Nilmadhab, 73 Ind Cas 312 nt p 316=A I R 1923 Cal 60 Jb Justice Mukerjee said. The only inference which a Court can draw from such superfluous provisions (which often find place in Acts to meet unfounded objections and idle doubts) is that the Legislature was either ignorant or unmindful of the real state of the law or that it acted under the influence of excessive caution. In this case we have seen that it is impossible to make a complete list of matters of which the Court should take judicial notice. But yet the Legislature following the English text book writers on Evidence have specified certain well known facts of which the Court shall take judicial notice. In the circumstances the proper meaning of the section is that it does not forbid the Court to take judicial notice of any fact which is a proper subject of taking such notice but the Court must take judicial notice of the facts mentioned in this section and as regards that the Court is not at liberty to exercise any discretion. It was pointed out with regard to the corresponding section of Act II of 1855 that the list mentioned therein was not exhaustive and the Court was at liberty to take judicial notice of any fact of which English Courts take judicial notice. Queen v Arbadip Goswami 1 B L R O Cr 27, 28. Widdroffe v El Stth Pl 469. But why should it be confined to facts of which the English Courts ordinarily take judicial notice. The maxim that what is known need not be proved, manifesta (or notoria) non indigent probatione may be traced far back in the civil and canon law indeed it is coeval with the legal procedure itself. We find it as a maxim in many of our law books and is applied in every part of the Anglo-Saxon law. (See Bracton's Note Book 13 n 7 Co 39 a—79 b). It is qualified by another principle al o veri old, and often overtopping the former in its importance—non refert quid notum set judici, si notum non sit in forma judicii. Per Coler C J in Crawford v Blisse, 2 Bal 140 (1613). The two maxims seem to intimate the whole doctrine of judicial notice. It has two aspects, one regarding the liberty which the judicial functionary has in taking things for granted, and the restraints that limit him. Phayer's Pict Treat Pt 278. Professor Phayer thus pointed out the future possibility of the doctrine of judicial notice: "Courts may judicially notice much which they cannot be required to notice. That is well worth emphasising, for it points to a great possible usefulness in this doctrine, in helping to shorten and simplify trials. It is an instrument of great capacity, in the hands of a competent Judge, and it is not nearly as much used, in the region of practice and evidence as it should be. The failure to exercise it leads daily to smother trials with technicality and monstrously lengthens them out." Phayer's Pict Treat Pt 300. "Why has this principle not been adequately used by Judges? One reason is that they apparently forget that (as Professor Phayer says) they might notice much that they cannot be required to notice by general rule made in advance. e.g. a rule requiring them to notice always the incumbency of a sheriff's office might go too far, but they may in a given case be justified in declaring a specific sheriff to be notorious, and so on, in a thousand cases of facts. Another reason is that they apparently forget that the principle allows them to notice in specific cases even though no general rule for the whole class of such cases could be laid down. This is because notoriety in fact is the principle, and facts are not susceptible of inflexible rule. The precedents of former Judges, in declining to notice or assenting to notice specific facts do not restrict the present Judge for noticing a new fact provided only that the new fact is notorious to the community. U ignore § 2583.

* For lists of such Courts, see the notifications printed on pp 372 to 374 of the Western India Volume of Macpherson's Lists of British enactments in force in Indian States

Clause I—Laws or rules having the force of law. "Laws or rules having the force of law include statutory law as well as unwritten law whether of a personal or local nature. Blaguan v Bhaguan, 21 A 912=3 C W N 454=1 Bom L R 311. "It is almost a platitude to say," says Prof Burr Jones "that judicial notice must be taken of laws and the only reason for the special notice given to this branch of the subject is that diversity of opinion has existed as to whether certain laws of a private nature were entitled to the judicial notice, and it has therefore become the task of the legal chronicler to mark them. The law of the jurisdiction is peculiarly a matter of judicial cognizance. It is only on the presumption that the law is known to the Court that there can be any proceedings whatever in Courts of justice. Burr Jones § 112. The Mohammedan Ecclesiastical law is a law having the force of law in British India and as such will be taken judicial notice of by Courts. Whitely Stoles Vol II p 887, Queen Impress v Ram-ran 7 A 161. The general rules of Hindu and Mohammedan law do not require proof. They can be ascertained by making necessary reference to authoritative text books, judicial decisions as well as from the opinions of the Pandit or Maulvis. Blaguan v Bhaguan, supra. The Court can take judicial notice of what the Hindu Law is with regard to Hindu custom that always must be proved. Per Garth C J in Jagat Mohini v Duarlal 8 C 582 (87). But where a custom is judicially recognised it need not be proved. Jadval v Jankee, 35 C 575. Riya Ram v Zamindar of Patpur 23 C W N 173 (P C)=41 M 778. Sworn translations of Sanskrit works if sent by the Registrar of the High Courts in India can be used by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Collector of Madras v Mithu Ramalinga, 12 M I A 397 (P C). Books purporting to contain the laws and customs of any particular community may acquire, by being repeatedly proved in the Court, such a status as to make it unnecessary in any subsequent case for persons of that community to prove anew the authority or the binding force of the books in question and unless such a state of circumstances is brought about, book of this nature stand on the same footing as any other evidence tending to prove the existence of a body of customs. Assuming that a rule of Ahyasantana law is a rule having the force of law within the term of s 57 of the Evidence Act there is one essential feature in the operation of customs which necessarily differentiates them from the operation of Acts of Legislature. In the case of laws enacted by the Legislature Courts have to take judicial notice not only of the effect of the rules, but also of those facts which are necessary for showing that they have the force of law and that they govern the parties or properties concerned such facts consisting of proceedings of the Parliament or of the Legislative Council. On the other hand in the case of customs the facts showing that they have the force of law and that they govern the parties or the properties concerned include the fact that the alleged rules of conduct have been uniformly followed by the parties concerned or the community to which the parties concerned belong. The fact is one which the Courts are not required to take judicial notice of, nor have they any powers to take judicial notice of it unless it has been so often proved in the Courts as to make further proof unnecessary as already stated. The Secretary of State v. Santaraja 25 M. L. J. 411=14 M. L. T. 348=21 Ind. Cns. 432.

Clause II. The English Courts take judicial notice of all Public Acts passed by the Parliament and since 1850 Private Acts also. It was customary before 1850 to insert a clause in Private Acts of Parliament declaring that the same should be deemed public and be judicially noticed. The effect of this clause was to dispense with the necessity, not only of pleading the Act specially but of producing an examined copy or a copy printed by the printer of the Crown, a Public Act requiring neither to be specially pleaded nor proved. By 13 & 14 Vict. C. 12, it was enacted "That every Act made after the commencement of this Act shall be deemed and taken to be Public Act and shall be judicially taken notice of as such unless the contrary be expressly provided and declared by such Act." This provision is now repealed by the Interpretation Act, 1889 52 and 53 Vict. C. 63 which provides, by s. 8, that every Act passed after 1850 'shall be a Public Act and shall be judicially noticed, as such unless the contrary is expressly provided by the Act.' So now every personal Act or local Act should also be taken judicial notice of by the Indian Courts.

Clause III. The Court will recognize without proof the Articles of War, whether in the naval the marine, or the land service as well as the auxiliary forces,—that is the militia, yeomanry and the volunteers,—and also the reserve force. Taylor § 5.

Clause IV. The English Courts take judicial notice of the laws of England and Ireland including the laws and custom of Parliament, and the privileges and course of proceedings of each House of Parliament. Stoddart v. Hunsaid 9 A. & E. 1=2 P. & D. 1. The Indian Courts should take judicial notice of debates of Parliament. The Englishman v. Lajpat Rai, 37 C. 760=14 C. W. N. 713. 'The proceedings of the Legislature' says Prof. Wigmore 'as shown in its journal are by some Courts noticed, but this is an artificial theory, on principle, the proceedings as contained in the journal are evidenced by a printed copy or by a certified copy.' Wigmore § 2577. The course of proceedings in Parliament appears to be something distinct from the proceedings themselves. Englishman v. Lajpat Rai, 37 C. 760=14 C. W. N. 713 (726).

Clause V. All tribunals notice the accession and demise of the sovereign of their country. Holman v. Burton 2 Ld. Ray. 791. R. v. Pingle 2 M. & Rob. 276. They also take judicial notice of the Royal sign manual and all matters stated under it. R. v. Gully, 1 Lex. 98. Mighell v. Sultan of Johore, (1894) 1 Q. B. 149.

Clause VI. The English Courts take judicial notice of the Great Privy Seal (Lord Melville's Case, 29 How. St. Tr. 707) of royal proclamation of the signature of the clerk of the Parliaments (Badische v. Levinstein 4 R. P. C. 470), seal of the Corporation of London (Doe v. Mason 1 L. P. 50), seal of the Apothecaries Company (14 & 15 Vict. C. 99, s. 81) the seal of the Board of Trade seals of district registrars (Judicature Act 1873 s. 61), seals and signatures of Commissioners for Oaths (Ex parte Magae 15 Q. B. D. 332), the seal of a notary public in any part of this Majesty's Dominions, but not of a foreign Notary public (In re Davis 1910 W. N. 212) seals of county Courts etc. 'The Courts will also judicially notice the following seals—the Great Seal of the United Kingdom and the Great Seals of England, Ireland and Scotland respectively; the Queen's Privy Seal and Privy signet whether in England Ireland or Scotland the Wafer Great Seal, the Wafer Privy Seal framed under the Crown Office Act, 1877, the seal and the privy seal of the Duchy of Lancaster Clause VII Courts will judicially recognize the political constitution or frame of their own Government its essential political agents and public officers sharing in its regular administration, and its essential and regular political operations powers and actions Thus notice is taken, by all tribunals of the accession of the Chief Executive of the nation or state under whose authority they act his powers and privileges (Elderton's Case, 2 Ld Ryms 980), and in America the genuineness of his signature (Jones v Gotes Err, 4 Marten 63), Re v Miller, 2 W Bl 797) the heads of departments and principal officers of state and the public seals (Re v Jones 2 Campb 131) In America the Court can take judicial notice of election or resignation of a senator, the appointment or a cabinet or foreign minister (Walden v Canfield, 2 Rob (L) 466) In England the appointments of marshalls and sheriffs (Holman v Burrou, 2 Ld Ryms 794), and the genuineness of their signatures can be taken judicial notice of (Brook v Whitmore, 8 Dowl P C 615) but not of their deputies Greenl Ex § 61 In Louisiana the signatures of all the judicial and executive officers to all official acts are to be judicially noticed Wood v Fit 10 Mart 196 But the English doctrine does not extend to this length Taylor § 14 So also in England it is highly probable the Courts would not recognise the signatures of the Lords of the Treasury to their official letters Re v Jones 2 Camp 131, But it appears that this section is more extensive than the English law in this respect All that is required under this section is that the fact of the appointment of such officer must be notified in the Gazette of India or in the Gazette of any Local Government Inde Jikan Ali v Haj Chandra, 10 C L R 469 471 176 Where under s 196 Cr Pro Code an order sanctioning a prosecution and signed by the chief Secretary to the Government is filed in Court the Court can take judicial notice of that officer's signature just as of his accession to office name title and functions The genuineness of his signature is not a matter which, unless the Court deems it necessary need be proved and the exhibition of a copy of the Fort St George Gazette containing a notification of that officer's appointment as Chief Secretary is not essential Cholancheri Ayammal, In re 11 M L J 157=72 Ind Cas 513=21 Cr L J 103 Judicial notice may also be taken of the signature of a Deputy Commissioner of Police Wahidul v Emperor 14 C L R 715=19 C W N 713 see also Tamam v Kalidas, 1 B I L O C 1 The Court can take judicial notice of the fact that a certain person is Justice of

When a document of 1820 purported to be a copy of a decision passed by one A, a Kazi, or Sudder Ameen of Chittagong but there was no evidence that the person held such appointment and the seal upon the copy produced was not legible, held that as there was no official Gazette in which the appointment was made, existing then and as there was no certificate that the copy was a true copy, the document was not admissible notwithstanding that it was more than thirty years old Jalei Ali v Rajchunder 10 C L R 469-S C 831. Note Under this clause the Court shall take judicial notice of the signature of an Honorary Magistrate when he is acting as such Ranjiban v Ahmed, 5 Ind Cas 537.

Clause VIII All civilized nations being like members of the great family of sovereignties, may well be supposed to recognize each others existence and general public and external relations. The usual and appropriate symbols of nationality and sovereignty are the national flag and seal. Every sovereign therefore, recognizes, and of course the public tribunals and functionaries of every nation take notice of the existence and titles of all the other sovereign powers in the civilized world their respective flags and their seals of State. Public acts decrees and judgments exemplified under this seal, are received as true and genuine, it being the highest evidence of the character. If however upon a civil war in any country, one part of the nation shall separate itself from the other, and establish for itself an independent government the newly formed nation cannot without proof be recognized as such, by the judicial tribunals of other nations until it has been acknowledged by the sovereign power under which the tribunals are constituted (City of Berne v Bank of England 9 Ves 347) the first act of recognition belonging to the executive function. But though the Seal of the new power prior to such acknowledgment is not permitted to prove itself, yet it may be proved as a fact by other competent testimony, and the existence of such unacknowledged government or state may in like manner be proved the rule being that if a body of persons assemble together to protect themselves, and support their own independence, make laws and have Courts of justice his is evidence of their being a state Greul Ev § 4 citing Yissari v Clement, 2 C & P 223. But the rule in U S v Palmer 3 Wheat 610, 634, seems limited to the case of a defendant denying piratical intent by pleading the authority of a government having colourable existence and engaged in a revolution. On the general question the correct rule seems to be the contrary of the statement in Greenleaf i e, a Court will look solely to the action of the Executive where the existence of a foreign nation or government is involved U S v Hutching 2 Wheel Cr C 513, Rox v Hmely 4 Cranch 241, Gelston v Hoyt, 3 Wheat 216, 324 Nueva v Inna 6 id 193, Williams v Ins Co, 13 Pet 415 421, Kennet v Chambers, 14 How 39, 51 Ughell v Sultan of Johore, (1894) 1 Q B 149. In the last mentioned case Kay L J said at p 161 "The status of a foreign sovereign is a matter of which the Courts of this country take judicial cognisance—that is to say a matter which the Court is either assumed to know or to have the means of discovering, without a contentious inquiry as to whether the person cited is or is not in the position of an independent sovereign. Of course the Court will till a better means of informing itself on the subject, if there is any kind of doubt and the matter is not as notorious as the status of some great monarch such as the Emperor of Germany. Here the person cited was the Sultan of Johore and the means which the Judge took of informing himself as to his status was by inquiry at the colonial office. I ask the learned Judge said the next point is this. It is said that an independent sovereign may waive his right to immunity and may treat himself as subject to the jurisdiction of a Court but how is that to be done? This seems to me in the first place quite clear. Supposing by way of illustration that some well known potentate such as one of the great European Emperors were to be sued in a Court of this country, and too no kind of notice of the proceeding, it would be the duty of the Court to recognize his position and to say at once that the person cited was an independent foreign sovereign over whom it had no jurisdiction. Therefore it is not right to say that such a sovereign must come forward and assert his right. I do not think that he need. I think the Court itself would be bound to

S 54. 'the notice of the fact that it had no jurisdiction'. Whether a Court will take judicial notice of the existence of a foreign state is really a question whether, as a matter of substantive law and judicial functions, a foreign state will in domestic Courts be treated as existing, only so far as the Executive so treats it. Here it is conceded that the Executive's recognition is the determining element. Ilmore § 2766, see also Lester v. Globe Venture Synd. (1900) 1 Ch 811. Statham v. Statham and Gucluar of Bonoda (1912) P 92. In Taylor v. Barclay 2 Sim 213, it was decided merely that the allegation in a declaration that a certain foreign state was recognized as such by the King could be found untrue by reference to the Foreign Office. Section 81 (2) of the Civil Procedure Code provides that every Court shall take judicial notice of the fact that a foreign state has or has not been recognized by His Majesty or by the Governor General in Council. See also Lachmi Narain v. Protap, 2 A 1 (14). Prasad v. Bombay Baroda, 9 B 211.

While the Courts will take judicial notice of the existence of foreign governments, the rule must be taken with the qualification that it relates only to such governments as have been recognized by the home government. The Courts will not anticipate the action of the government in this respect, and in case of a rebellion or a revolt in a foreign state they will consider the former state of things as existing until the proper department of the government recognizes the change. City of Bern v. Bank, 9 Ves. 317 = 32 Eng. Reprint 636. Taylor v. Barclay, 2 Sim 213 = 37 Eng. Reprint 769. Who is the sovereign de jure or de facto of a territory is not a judicial but a political question, the determination of which by the legislative and executive departments of any government conclusively binds the Judges as well as all other officers, citizens and subjects of that government. Burr Jones F. 107. All Courts of Instance are bound to take judicial notice of the territorial extent of the jurisdiction exercised by the government whose laws they administer, or of its recognition or denial of the sovereignty of a foreign power, as appearing from the public acts of the legislature and executive although those acts are not formally put in evidence nor in accord with the pleadings. United States v. Rapier, 50 U. S. (9 How.) 127. But it is the duty of the Judge to take notice whether a foreign power has been recognized by the government or not and to judicially notice the relations between this and other countries. Burr Jones § 107. In Dodder v. Bank of England 10 Ves. Jr. 352 Lord Chancellor said: 'Some perplexity arises from what we know and what we can only know judicially. I can not affect to be ignorant of the fact that the revolution of Switzerland has not been recognized by the government of this country, but a Judge I can not take notice of that. So it is clear that until recognized by the domestic government the Court can not take judicial notice of the change of the ruling powers in foreign countries. Burr Jones § 107. So when the executive branch of the government which is charged with the foreign relations shall in its correspondence with a foreign nation assume a fact in relation to the sovereignty of any island or country, it is conclusive with the judicial department. And in this view it is not material to enquire, nor is it the province of the Court to determine, whether the executive be right and wrong. It is enough to know that in the exercise of his constitutional functions he has decided the question. Ibid. It follows of course that the recognition of the existence of foreign governments is extended beyond the mere diplomatic acknowledgment of their being and that so soon as the executive consent is made public, the Courts not only recognize foreign states and sovereigns acknowledged as such by the home government of such Courts, but also their symbols of authority such as national flags and seals of states. Burr Jones § 107 (a). The public seals of such foreign states are of such public notoriety that no proof of them is required. They import absolute verity, and when attached to foreign judgments such judgments are sufficiently authenticated. Church v. Hubbard, 2 Crauch (U. S.) 187.

Clause IX The phrase "division of time" include also native eras Ilalley Stoles, Vol II, p 888 Thus the Bengali Willait, Pash, Sambat, Hindi, Hyri, and Jalus eras will be judicially noticed in those districts in which they are current Field Fr 6th Ed p 220 For this purpose reference may be made to the usual almanacs, when occasion requires Field Fr 6th Ed p 220

The Almanac is the part of the common law and established by statute and the Court takes judicial notice of the succession of years, months, and days (R v Broun, Wood & M 163, Harry v Broad, 2 Salk 626), of the years of each sovereign's reign and the years in the calendar to which they correspond (Holman v Burrow, 2 Ld Ryms 791, R v Smith, 2 Mood & R 109, R v Pringle 2 Mood & R 276 Henry v Cole, 2 Ld Ryms 811) and of the days of the week upon which the days in the calendar fall Hoyle v Cornwallis (Lord) 1 Str 387, Hanson v Shackleton, 4 Dowl 48, Pearson v Shaw 7 L R 1 Halsbury Vol XIII, p 492 So also it is not necessary to prove the course of time (Burry v Blogg 12 Q L 877, 882), or of heavenly bodies, nor the ordinary public feasts and festivals Paylor § 16 Where the period of limitation for a suit expires on a gazetted holiday and the plaintiff is prevented on the day the Court reopens it is not necessary for the plaintiff explicitly to state that on the day on which the period of limitation expired the Court was closed Tel Chand v Ut Pallo 16 N L R 193=56 Ind Cas 926 This clause empowers the Court to take judicial notice of any public holidays notified in the official gazette Ibid

Geographical Divisions The Courts take judicial notice of political subdivisions of the country as it was made by law and of the state or territory where they hold their sessions, and of the judicial districts within it Courts will take judicial notice of the local divisions of the state into counties, cities and towns and of the facts that certain cities are in such sub divisions State v Pennington 124 Mo 388, Rogers v Cady, 104 Cal 238 (1m) The Court takes judicial notice of the existence, extent, and geographical position of the British dominions and of the territory of the foreign States Halsbury, vol 13 p 493 In Cooke v Wilson, 1 C B N S 173, Crouder J at p 164 held that the Court was bound to take notice of the existence of the colony of Victoria and Creswell J at p 163 that it must recognise that the colony was out of England In Burrell v Dyer, (1834) 9 App Cas 315 where the question was whether the words "St Lawrence" in a policy of marine insurance included the Gulf of St Lawrence, or were confined to the river of that name, Lord Blackburn said at p 312 "I think that the Court should take judicial notice of the geographical position and general names applied to such districts as thus in short, of all that we see on the Admiralty chart of this part of the world" Halsbury vol 13 p 493 In Foster v Globe Venture Syndicate Ltd, (1900) 1 Ch 811, two of the issues raised were whether the tribes of Su are independent or are the subjects of the Sultan of Morocco and whether a tract of land between the Atlas Mountains and the River Num is the territory of those tribes or is the territory of the Sultan of Morocco As regards the second question Larwell J said "I am asked to take judicial cognizance of the fact that, assuming the tribes to be independent, they do not possess jurisdiction over certain territories This is a matter which appears to me must necessarily be within the cognizance of Her Majesty because, for the protection of her subjects in the ordinary way, she should know whether redress should be applied for to the Sultan of Morocco or to the head of the various independent tribes of Su Sound policy appears to me to require that I should act in union with the government on such a point as this As much that the Foreign Office have already satisfied themselves that the territory in question is within the dominion of Morocco, and have applied to the Sultan of Morocco for redress in any given matter it would surely be improper that I, sitting here as a Judge of the High Court should in the face of that act of Her Majesty, hold as a matter of fact that the territory in question was not within the dominion of the Sultan of Morocco I should be contravening the act of Her Majesty acting as a sovereign in a matter which is within the cognizance

Geographical Divisions. The Courts take judicial notice of political subdivisions of the country as it was made by law and of the state or territory where they hold their sessions and of the judicial districts within it. Courts will take judicial notice of the local divisions of the state into counties, cities and towns and of the facts that certain cities are in such sub-divisions State v Pennington 124 Mo 389, Rogers v Cady, 101 Cal 233 (Am). The Court takes judicial notice of the existence, extent and geographical position of the British dominions and of the territory of the foreign States Halsbury, vol 13, p 193. In Cooke v Wilson, 1 C B N S 153, Crouder J at p 164, held that the Court was bound to take notice of the existence of the colony of Victoria and Cresswell J at p 163, that it must recognise that the colony was out of England. In Barrell v Dyer, (1834) 9 App Cas 315 where the question was whether the words "St Lawrence" in a policy of marine insurance included the Gulf of St Lawrence or were confined to the river of that name, Lord Blackburn said at p 312 "I think that the Court should take judicial notice of the geographical position and general names applied to such districts as this in short of all that we see on the Admiralty chart of this part of the sea" Halsbury vol 13 p 193. In Foster v Globe Venture Syndicate Ltd (1900) 1 Ch 811, two of the issues raised were whether the tribes of Suss are independent or are the subjects of the Sultan of Morocco and whether a tract of land between the Atlas Mountains and the River Dni is the territory of those tribes or is the territory of the Sultan of Morocco. As regards the second question Jarrell J said "I am asked to take judicial cognizance of the fact that, assuming these tribes to be independent, they do not possess jurisdiction over certain territories. This is a matter which appears to me must necessarily be within the cognizance of Her Majesty because, for the protection of her subjects in the ordinary way she should know whether redress should be applied for to the Sultan of Morocco or to the head of the various independent tribes of Suss. Sound policy appears to me to require that I should act in unison with the government on such a point as this. Assuming that the Foreign Office have already satisfied themselves that the territory in question is within the dominion of Morocco, and have applied to the Sultan of Morocco for redress in any given matter, it would surely be improper that I sitting here as a Judge of the High Court, should in the face of that act of Her Majesty, hold as a matter of fact that the territory in question was not within the dominion of the Sultan of Morocco. I should be contravening the act of Her Majesty acting as a sovereign in a matter which is within the cognizance of Her Majesty's Foreign Office. I think therefore, that the reasons given in Taylor v Barclay, 2 Sim 213 apply to the second question also." In Taylor v Barclay after referring to the case of Thompson v Poncel, 2 Sim 194, the Court says at p 221. The judgment proceeded, not on the question whether the Court should give relief or not, or give a discovery or not or give discovery and withhold relief, but upon the question whether the King's Court should attend to the case of a party who founded his case on the representation that certain person did form an independent government, recognised by this country, when the Government of this country did not recognise them. It appears to me that sound policy requires that the Courts of the King should act in unison with the government of the King. So in this respect the decision of the Secretary of State is final. Vide Foreign Jurisdiction Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict C 37). Judicial notice is taken of the countries into which England and Wales are divided and of those which are maritime countries but not of distance of one county from another nor of the particular places situated within each county (Deybitt Case, 1821 1 B & Ald 213, per Bayley J and Best J), unless such situation is recognised by statute (H v Holborn Union Guardian 6 E & B 715) nor of the particular diocese within which any town is situated. R v Symptom, 2 Id Kaym 1379. Halsbury Vol 13 p 491. But the Court is not bound to take judicial notice that a certain city is in a given county when two counties are referred to and the pleadings do not show clearly which is intended. Com v Wheeler, 162 Mass 429 (Am). In an Erie Court have judicially noticed that certain named towns or cities are within the State without proof of the fact. Ang v Ken, 29 Ala 542 (Am), Harding v Strong 42 Ill 148. But in an English case the Court refused to take judicial notice of the fact that Leicester was in the county of Somerset. R v Burridge 3 P Wms 439, 496 see also Thorne v Jackson, (1846) 3 C B 661, Brunne v Thompson, (1842) 2 Q B 784, Thompson v Budd (1841) 9 Dowd 1000. The Courts take judicial notice of the leading geographical features of the country, for example the existence and general location of important ports, lakes, mountains large cities and the course navigability and character of great rivers. Hood v Foulter 40 Am Rep 330. In H v Sharpe (1803) 8 C & P 436, the Court took notice that the county of Stafford was in England. In R v St Maurice, 16 Q B 908 that the city of York was the county of York, having by statute the same limits, and in R v Isle of Ely, 15 Q B 87, that by statute the Isle of Ely was a division of a county. Halsbury Vol 13 p 494. In Hearney v King (1819) 2 B & Ald 301 the Court declined to take judicial notice that there was only one place named Dublin in the world, and therefore refused to construe an allegation in the declaration that a bill was drawn in Dublin as meaning drawn in Dublin in Ireland. Ibid.

Clause X "All Courts of Justice are bound to take judicial notice of the territorial extent of the jurisdiction exercised by the Government who claims they administer or of its recognition or denial of the sovereignty of a foreign power as appearing from the public Acts of the legislature and executive although those Acts are not formally but in evidence not in record with the pleadings. Jones v United States, 137 U S 214 (Am). In England the Courts notice the territorial extent of the jurisdiction and sovereignty exercised de facto by their own government, and the local divisions of the country as the states provinces, counties cities towns parishes and the like so far as the political government is concerned or affected but not the relative positions of such local divisions nor their precise boundaries further than they may be described in public statutes. Taylor § 17. The Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict C 37) s 4 provides that any question as to the existence or extent of any jurisdiction of the crown in a foreign country arising in proceedings in a Court in the British dominions or held under British authority, to be submitted to the Secretary of State whose decisions for the purpose of the proceedings are final. "If it be true" said Lord Selborne in Danodhar v Deoran 1 B 367 at p 401 (P C) "that the Indian Courts might take judicial notice of the territories of the Queen in India then if there has been a cession of territory, they must take notice of that and they must do so independently of the Gazette, which is no part of the evidence but only evidence of it."

Clause XI The Courts take judicial notice of wars with foreign states if a state of war has been declared by the proper authorities Dodder v Lord Huntingfield 11 Ves 292 It is submitted that the law is as stated in the text, although Lord Eldon said during argument 'You would be obliged upon an indictment for a libel to prove that France is now at war with Austria not as to the war with this country, the Courts taking judicial notice of that with reference to our own country' See also Halsbury Vol 13, p 493, Re v De Benger 3 M & S 67, Thelluson v Corning 4 Esp 266, Taylor Et § 18 But if no such declaration has been made the fact of a state of war is one to be proved Hale P C 164 A war between foreign powers is not judicially noticed Dodder v Lord Huntingfield, supra When it is said however, that the Courts take judicial notice of wars with foreign states, it must be interpreted that the Courts take judicial notice of the act of their own executive with reference to war with a foreign state The executive recognition is the warrant for the Court Gelsdon v Hoyt 3 Wheat (U S) 246 It is the determination of a political question by another department of the government which is binding on the Judges Jones v United States 137 U S 211 (Am), Burr Jones § 107 (1) As regards the commencement of hostilities vide The Fenian Duncan v Foster 8 Moo P C (N S) 411 = L R 4 P C 171 = 20 L J 48 Under ss 6 and 8 of Act II of 1855 the Gazette of India or Calcutta Gazette containing official letters on the subject of hostilities between the British Crown and the Mahomedan fanatics on the frontier was admitted in evidence to show the commencement continuation and determination of hostilities Queen v Ammuddin, 7 B L R 63 But the Court is not competent to take judicial notice as regards the date of the commencement of the hostility Commonwealth Shipping Representative v Peninsula and Oriental Branch Service (1923) A C 191 = 92 L J K B 142 = 128 L T 546 The statement by H M's Commissioner and Consul General for Uganda is sufficient for the Court's taking judicial notice, under s 57, Evidence Act, of the existence of hostilities between Kabega the King Unyoro and Her Majesty the Queen and the Protected states of Uganda Imperialrix v Juma, 22 B 54

Clause XII According to English law under the general principle of recognising domestic officials notice is taken of the incumbency of other officers of Courts, although here and there some uncertainty exists as to the extent to which this will include the inferior and more numerous officers particularly Justices of the Peace and attorneys Wignore § 278 see also Eddleton v Cave 2 Ld Raym 978, Slipp v Hoole 2 Stra 1080 Tan Sandan v Turner, 6 Q B 773 (786) The reason of the uncertainty is thus stated by Prof Wignore 'It is the law that creates certain office and attributes certain duties and authorities to the incumbents but whether the incumbent at a given time and place is a specific person depends on external political action, sometimes recorded and notorious, but sometimes neither Courts have solved this application of the principle by considerations of political good sense and convenience, which are however, difficult to reduce to a definite rule All that can be said is that the incumbencies of the more important and notorious offices are judicially noticed and that many of the lesser and local ones are not' Wignore § 2576 But in India so far as the trying Court is concerned the rule is forced and all Courts must take judicial notice of the names of the members and officers of the Court and of their deputies and subordinate officers and assistants and also of all officers acting in execution of its process, and of all advocates attorneys, proctors, Vakils, pleaders and other persons authorized by law to appear or act before it So also under section 4 of Act II of 1855, the Court was entitled to refer to entry made by its own Nazir Nilmat Charanbhaty v Shoo Narain, 8 W R 276

Clause XIII The Judges will recognise the custom or the law of road, viz., that horses and carriages should respectively keep on the near or left side Taylor § 5 In Wordsworth v Wilman 5 Esp 273, the rule, with regard to keeping the road, is said to be that if a carriage, coming in any direction, leave sufficient room for any other carriage horse or passenger on its side of the way it is enough, and in Wayde v Carr, 2 D & Ry 236, the Court said that the

S 57 'Law of the road' was not to be considered as inflexible since, in crowded streets situations and circumstances might frequently arise, where a deviation from what is called the law of the road would not only be justifiable but absolutely necessary. Where the defendant was driving on the wrong side of the road, which was of considerable breadth and the plaintiff's servant, who was on horse back without any reason crossed over to the side on which the defendant was driving and on endeavouring to pass, his horse was killed. Lord Kenyon held, that it was putting him all voluntarily into danger, and that the injury was of his own seeking but the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff which the K B refused to disturb. Corden v Fentham 2 Esp 685. And although a person is not bound to confine himself to the proper side of the road, yet if he do not he is bound to use greater degree of caution than if he kept to the proper side. Plucknell v Hulton, 5 C & P 375, Roscoe N P Ev 779. As regards rules of road vide Leame v Bray 3 Ea 1593. Turley v Thomas, 8 C & P 104.

The Court will take judicial notice of the following rules with respect to navigation,—first that ships and steamboats on meeting 'end on or nearly end on in such a manner as to involve risk of collision' should port their helms, so as to pass on the port, or left, side of each other, next, that steam boats should keep out of the way of sailing ships, and next that every vessel overtaking another should keep out of its way. Taylor § 5.

In all cases and also on all matters of public history, etc. When in doubt as to any matter to be judicially noticed the Judge may refer for information to appropriate sources. Phay Ev 4th Ed p 17, Taylor 1st 10th Ed § 21. The Judge may resort to such means of reference as may be at hand and as he may deem worthy of confidence. Greenl Ev § 295. Tay Ev § 21. The provision that 'the Court may resort for its aid to appropriate books' is an advance on the English Law, under which though an expert called as a witness, will be allowed to refresh his memory by referring to a professional treatise regarded by him as of authority yet the books themselves cannot be cited. Field Ev 6th Ed 971 but see Willoughby v Willoughby 11 R 772. But in America such reference is made whenever required. It goes without saying that every Judge upon the bench would disclaim such an encyclopedic knowledge, added to a phenomenal memory as would serve him on every application that the Court should take judicial cognizance of a given fact. However wide his reading the suggestion of some matter for his Court's knowledge and notice must frequently make a demand upon him, to which without some means of reference—or refreshing his knowledge he might not be able to respond. It does not necessarily follow that the Judge should refuse to take judicial notice of a fact when his memory is at fault in respect to the same. If there is a reasonable doubt as to whether judicial notice should be taken, it should be resolved ex abundante cautela be resolved in the negative. Gunning v People 189 Ill 165 (Am). It frequently happens that it is necessary or proper for the Court to refer to sources of information concerning matters which have not been referred to in the evidence, in which case it is his duty to resort to any source of information which in its nature is identified to be trustworthy and helpful always seeking first for that which is most appropriate. Sometimes too concerning matters of law and in either case he may use all proper means for satisfying himself in any way that appears to him satisfactory. Burr Jones § 132. In a New York case the opinion shows that the Court had referred to various documents and to Pollard's and Crilly's histories of the Civil War. Sumner v Columbia Ins Co, 37 N Y 171. In the celebrated Dred Scott case Chief Justice Taney evidently had resorted not only to judicial decisions statutes ordinances and works of history but to whatever sources were available to throw light upon the social and political condition of the African race in the early history of the country. Dred Scott v Sandford 19 How (U S) 393. Burr Jones § 132. Dr Wharton illustrates the principle thus: 'The Judge may consult works on collateral sciences or art touching the topic on trial. He may draw for instance on mythology, in order to determine the meaning of similes in an ambiguous writing. He may refer to almanacs (Page v Faulstich 112 Cal 227) he may appeal to his own memory for the meaning of a word in the vernacular (Rees v Woodward 1 Moo C C 323. Cement v Gollup, 2 Camp 25. Musket v Cole L R 71 x 70) he may, as to the meaning of terms, refer to dictionaries of science of all classes (Erans v Gelling 6 C & P 536, Pages Case, 1 Leon 242, All Gen v Drummond 1 C & L 210, Shore v All Gen, 9 Cl & F 355, Louwer v Allhus, Skin 14, In re St Catherine's Hospital 1 Vent 149, Stamer v Douthitch 1 Silk 281, Cl ments v Golding 2 Crump 25) he may determine the meaning of the abbreviation of Christian names and offices, and of other common terms, as to a point of political history (e.g. the recognition of a foreign government), he may consult the executive department of the State (Taylor v Barclay 2 Sim 221, Mughell v Sultan of Johore (1894) 1 Q B 149 Foster v Globe, 1900 1 Ch 811) he may enquire to be made as to the practice of other Courts (Doe v Lilloyd 1 Man & E 685), and Lord Hardwicke went so far as to inquire of an eminent conveyancer as to a rule of conveyancing practice (Willoughby v Willoughby 1 T R 772) Wharton Et § 232 Under s 57 clauses (8) and (13) a Court which is called upon to decide as to what particular date in the English calendar a certain date in the Fush year corresponds with, may resort for its aid to appropriate books or documents of reference and in such a case an almanac containing the British and Fush calendars may be referred to. Oudh Judicial calendar was not compiled expressly for the purpose of showing corresponding dates in the different era and was not an appropriate document of reference in such a case Raghubar v Sheo Charan, 4 O C 182. In all those and the like cases, where the memory of the Judge is at fault, he resorts to such documents or other means of reference as may be at hand and may deem worthy of confidence Taylor § 21, Greul Et § 6. In some instances, the Judge has refused to take cognizance of a fact unless the party calling upon him to do so could produce at the trial some document by which his memory might be refreshed as was the case in Van Omeron v Douick 2 Crump 44 where Lord Ellenborough declined to take judicial notice of the King's proclamation the counsel not being prepared with a copy of the Gazette in which it was published. So also in R v Withers, tried before Mr Justice Bullen in which case it became a material question to consider how far the prisoner owed obedience to his sergeant and this depended on the articles of war which were not produced at the trial, the Judges thought that they ought to have been produced. Cited by Bullen 1 in R v Holt, 5 T R 446. But in many other cases the English Courts have themselves made the necessary inquiries and that too without strictly confining their researches to the time of the trial Taylor § 21 Taylor v Barclay 2 Sim 221 The Charkeh, 12 L J Adm 17 cited in Lachmi Narain v Raja Patab 2 A 17 Chandler v Grieces 2 H Bl 606 Do v Lloyd 1 M & Gr 685, Woseley v Filster 2 Roll R 119, In Davis Trusts, L R 8 Eq 83 93. Similar practice has been followed by the Courts of this country in many cases. Vide Theam Panachand v Bombay Baroda & Rail 9 B 244 (247) Hosain Ali v Ibid Ali, 21 C 177 Lachmi Narain v Raja Patab 2 A 7. In re Bhaguan Das Hanuman 8 B 511 516. But "judicial notice being a dispensation of one party" says Prof Wigmore "from producing evidence it would seem that the party must in point of form make a request for it. Upon this request the Court is bound it is sometimes said to declare the fact noticed or at least to make the investigation which it deems necessary. No doubt in most instances the rule of law has the plain consequence of compelling the Judge to declare the dispensation, not to do so would be to err precisely as under any other rule of law. But it must not be supposed that this is universally true the decisions demonstrate that there are numerous topics near the line of doubt in their feature of notoriety, of which the Court may but not must take judicial notice. No definite distinction is recognized but it is plain that many of the rulings merely authorised the Court to notice a fact without requiring it. Wigmore § 2569. As regards the meaning of the words "matter of public history" vide Farand Ali v Zafar Ali 46 Ind Cis 114. In a suit for declaration that a church and its properties were trusts and the plaintiffs were its trustees and for possession of the same from defendants, certain documents consisting of printed letters of the Priests of the Jesuit Mission in the Madura District dated about 75 years ago were admitted in evidence under s 57 as a book of reference to prove the history of Christianity and especially of the Roman Catholic Mission. Held that, though

- S 57. the books were admissible to prove facts of public history, they could not be relied upon to prove where certain particular Missionaries were living or when they died. The Court can dispense with evidence only of what may be regarded as notorious fact of public history. Imbalam v J M Barthe, (1912) M W N 152 = 13 Ind Cas 599. A document may be referred to in connection with ancient facts of a public nature provided it is an approved public and general history. It is provided by this section that on all matter of public history literature science or art the Court may resort for its own aid to appropriate books of reference. Ina Channamal v Udu Immal 1 M L J 326. 'It is to be observed that the section does not say how any fact historical or other wise is to be proved by the parties but gives the Court liberty to resort for its aid to appropriate books or documents of reference on matters of public history'. Per Harrington J in Englishman v Lala Lajpat Rai, 14 C W N 713. A Court is justified in referring to books published long before the suit in which the nature of the institution and its history are described, both being matters relevant to the suit. Augustine v Medhyote, 13 M 211.

Matters of science and art. The introduction of the words 'and also in all matters of science and art' into s 57 says Justice Hallby is very strange. It can not be meant that the Court is to take judicial notice of all such matter. If so the special provisions as to evidence on points of science or art in ss 49 and the further and special provisions which we shall come to presently in ss 60 as to the use of a treatise would be unmeaning. Hallby, F 49. But none of the above three sections would be unmeaning if we bear in mind the principle on which the matters of science and art are admitted under the respective sections. When the Court has to form an opinion upon a point of science or art the opinion upon that point of persons specially skilled in such science or art are relevant facts under s 15. In Leigson v Hubbl 97 N Y 597 519 (Am) the rule in regard to the admission of expert testimony is thus stated by Justice J. It is not sufficient to warrant the introduction of expert testimony that the witness may know more of the subject of inquiry and may better comprehend and appreciate it than the jury but to warrant its introduction the subject of inquiry must be one relating to some trade profession science or art in which persons in trusted therein by study or experience may be supposed to have more skill and knowledge than jurors of average intelligence may be presumed generally to have. The jurors may have less skill and experience than the witnesses and yet have enough to draw their own conclusions, and do justice between the parties. When the facts can be placed before a jury and they are of such a nature that jurors generally are just as competent to form opinion on reference to them, and draw inferences from them as witnesses then there is no occasion to resort to expert or opinion evidence. So under this section no proof is required of those facts in science and art which are so generally known as to be matters of common knowledge. Facts of this nature which are universally known and which may be found in encyclopedias, dictionaries and other publications, will be judicially noticed but they must be of such universal notoriety and so generally understood that they may be regarded as forming part of the common knowledge of every person. Burn Jones § 125. So Justice Hallby is not correct in his interpretation of this section when he says "What perhaps it meant is that though the parties must obey the law as laid down in ss 45 and 60 the Judge may resort for his own aid to appropriate books without restriction. This interpretation violates the very principle of the rule contained in this section. In Granada Ventata Ratham v The Corporation of Calcutta 22 C W N 745 some books were supplied to the Court by the prosecution in support of the expert testimony offered by it. As regards the admissibility of the books Chetty J said. In connection with the books I see that one or more of them were marked as exhibits in the Magistrate's Court. In my opinion this procedure was incorrect if it were intended thereby to make these books and all their contents evidence in the case. The use of such books by the Court is regulated by sections 57 and 60 of the Evidence Act. The former section first enumerated thirteen facts of which the Court may take judicial notice. The penultimate paragraph of the section says. In all the cases as also on all matters of public history, literature, science, or art the Court may resort for its aid to appropriate books or documents of reference.' This section does not justify the Court in treating the opinions or deductions of the authors of such books as evidence in the case whether to supplement or rebut that already given. Section 60, however, allows the opinion of experts expressed in any treatise commonly offered for sale and the grounds on which such opinions are held to be proved by the production of such treatises in circumstances which no doubt apply to the present case. The conclusion seems to be that books of reference may be used by the Court on matters (inter alia) of science and art in coming to a right understanding of and conclusion upon the evidence given while treatises may be referred to in order to ascertain the opinions of experts who can not be called, and the grounds on which such opinions are held." Under the provisions of the penultimate paragraph of s 57 and of the first proviso of s 60 of the Evidence Act, Taylor's Medical Jurisprudence may be referred to. Hatim v Empress 12 C L R 46.

Private Knowledge of the Judge. In deciding a case a Judge cannot base his judgment on his own personal knowledge. Durga Prasad v Ram Doyal 38 C 153. There is a real but elusive line between the Judge's personal knowledge as a private man and his knowledge as a Judge. The latter does not necessarily include the former, as a Judge indeed he may have to ignore what he knows as a man, and contra wise. Wigmore § 2569. That rule was laid down so far back as the year 1406. In arguing a question as to the duty of the Court not to have rendered a certain judgment, counsel put this case. "Suppose we put the case that one man kills another in your presence you observing it, and another who is not guilty is indicted before you and is found guilty so as to incur the penalty of death you ought to reprieve the judgment against him for you are knowing to the contrary, and should make further report to the King to give him pardon. No more should you give judgment in this case, before causing those to appear by whose hands the King was paid." Gascoigne C J said.

Once the King himself asked of me the very case that you have put and asked me what it was the law, and I told him just as you say it, and he was well pleased that the law was so." Year Book 7 H IV 41, pl 5 cited in Wigmore Cas Ed 711, Wigmore § 2569. Putidge v Strange Plowd 83. Marriot v Pascal 1 Leon 159 161. But Mr Haules Solicitor General arguing said. "It is said though a Judge do think in his conscience a per on guilty, yet he ought not to make use of that private knowledge and a case was quoted out of Henry IV. But I think that the Judge might have behaved himself something better than he did and sure I am now he would be blamed. I do not say that a Judge upon his private knowledge ought to judge he ought not. But if a Judge knows anything whereby the prisoner might be convicted or acquitted (not generally known) then I do say he ought to be called from the place where he sat and go to the bar and give evidence of his knowledge and so the Judge in Henry IV's time ought to have done and not to have suffered the prisoner to have been convicted and then get a pardon for him for a pardon will not always do the business." See John Fenwick v Earl 13 How St Tr 663 667. Wigmore Cas Ed 711. So it is clear that a Judge cannot act from his own knowledge and call that knowledge proof. Roche v Antwerp 4 Johns N Y 239. A Judge can take judicial notice of a fact which is known to him in the peculiar sense that it is known and notorious to all men. So he can make use of that knowledge which he has obtained by notoriety but not that knowledge which he has obtained by personal observation. Wigmore § 2569. See also Byrne v London Ferry Co, (1907) 1 R 480. Hunsay v Keating (1908) 11 R 53. As regards the fact of which a Judge has got knowledge by personal observation he is merely an ordinary witness. So the Judge is to act upon the evidence properly laid before him in the course of the trial. But so far as the matter in question is one upon which men in general have a common fund of experience and knowledge, through data notoriously accepted by all the analogy of judicial notice obtains to some extent and the tribunal is allowed to resort to this information in making up its mind. Wigmore § 2570. Mulputa v Sri Raja Paradaraya 36 M 168-23 M L J 624. In the last named case Sundara Appai J said. "A Judge is not entitled to rely on specific facts not proved by the evidence in the case but known to him personally or otherwise but he may use his general knowledge and experience in determining the credibility of evidence adduced before him and applying it to the decision of the specific facts in dispute in the case." In the same case Sadasua Appa J said "I think the only practical rule which can be laid down in these cases is that if a Judge knows of his own knowledge as an individual observer of a past relevant concrete private incident and that fact cannot be subjected to ocular proof at the time of trial (such as a person's colour, resemblance of features, appearance, behaviour, chemical experiments on the present condition of the object) and if the truth of such incidents is contested between the parties he should mention his private knowledge of such incidents to the parties, and he should refuse to let the Judge in that case unless both the parties after he so mentions to them his said personal knowledge of that particular incident, state that they have no objection to his continuing as Judge." See also Harpushad v Sheo Dyal 3 I A 259=26 W R 55 P C Similarly where a case is to be tried by jurors "the personal knowledge of any juror concerning any probative fact involved in the case under consideration is not to be considered in deciding the case. Such a juror should communicate his information to the Court and if he is not excused from service and it is deemed proper to use his cognizance of such a fact in the trial he must be sworn as a witness and examined, subject to cross-examination by the adverse party, the same as any other witness. But any juror must consider the testimony in the light of that knowledge and experience which is common to all men. For instance, it is a matter of common knowledge that a bullet piercing the brain of a human being will in all likelihood prove fatal. It is common knowledge also that a forceful tree cut newly in two at the butt will fall, if a high wind blows against it. If a witness should testify to the contrary to these ordinary phenomena the common knowledge of the juror derived from his experience in such matters would naturally compel him to discredit that witness. Many illustrations might be given where men are normally and legitimately influenced in considering testimony by their general knowledge and experience. It is utterly impracticable in the administration of Courts of justice to secure a juror whose mind is totally blank as to questions involved in the ordinary transactions of life. Trial of fact cannot in the nature of things be divested of general knowledge of practical affairs. The Court cannot do otherwise than to direct them to use such experiences as are common to all men in the decision of questions of fact. It is part of the jury system which cannot be dispensed with." Per Burnett CJ in Rostal v Portland R L & P Co, 101 Or 569 (Am) Wigmore § 2570.

Judicial notice of other notorious facts. A Court can take judicial notice of a Government Notification under this section. Collector of Cawnpore v Jugul Kishore 107 Ind Cas 578=A I R 1923 A 355. But it would be unfair to the Railway Company to take judicial notice of thefts on the Railway. Secretary of State v Ghanaya Lal 111 Ind Cas 523=A I R 1928 I 11 637. A Court is entitled to take judicial notice of the fact that there is also a time varying delay of 24 hours between the arrival of a registered letter at its destination and its distribution from the Post Office or in other words that a registered letter takes 24 hours longer than an ordinary letter. Firm of Chattri Day v Secretary of State 99 Ind Cas 622=A I R 1927 All 215. Communications actually brought to the notice of Court may be taken judicial notice of. Sau v Paran Singh A I R 1925 Nag 74. Books dealing with customs of community written by a public officer deputed to enquire into local customs can be taken judicial notice of by Courts. In the matter of Shyam Lal L R 6 All 186=A I R 1925 All 619. See also Bay Nath v Bhudan 91 Ind Cas 533=2 O W N 872. There is a customary right of privacy prevailing in Oudh and Courts are bound to take judicial notice of it without proof. Bagchi v Rahim 93 Ind Cas 332=A I R 1926 Oudh 352. Courts must take judicial notice of provisions of a 21 Paper Currency Act without the defendant having raised the objection in his defence at all. Mir a Nudayat v Nya Kyang U B L (1911) 11 Qr 14=24 Ind Cas 721. A registered power of attorney was admitted under s 17 of the Evidence Act without proof as the registering officer is a Court under s 3 of the Act. Aristo Nath v F F Bacon 11 C 176. In England judicial notice is taken of the fact that the streets of London are crowded

Dems v White, (1916) 2 K B 1, 6 Similarly judicial notice can be taken of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge as seats of learning (Re Oxford poem rate 8 E & B 184) A Court can also take judicial notice of the fact that cats are domestic animals Nye v Niblett (1918) 1 K B 23

Effect of Judicial Notice—Not conclusive That a matter is judicially noticed means merely that it is taken as true without the offering of evidence by the party who should ordinarily have done so. But the opponent is not debarred from disputing the matter by evidence, if he believes it to be disputable. Wignore § 2567. Since judicial notice is an expedient for hastening the trial and eliminating superfluousness, it would be proper to prevent the party in whose favour the fact is noticed from offering evidence of it. State v Chingien 105 Ia 169 (Am). It is true that occasionally a Court is found declaring a thing judicially noticed and at the same time refusing to listen to evidence to the contrary (Com v Marzyski, 149 Mass. 68), but usually this is in truth laying down a new rule of substantive law by declaring certain facts immaterial, whenever a Court forbids the production of evidence, it removes the subject from the realm of the law of evidence properly so called. Wignore § 2567.

58 No fact need be proved in any proceeding which the parties thereto or their agents agree to admit at the hearing, or which, before the hearing, they agree to admit by any writing under their hands, or which by any rule or pleading in force at the time they are deemed to have admitted by their pleadings

Provided that the Court may, in its discretion, require the facts admitted to be proved otherwise than by such admissions

Principle A Court in general has to try the question on which the parties are at issue not on the one on which they are agreed Burjoji Cursetji v Muncherrji, 5 B 143 (152), Mc Gowan v Smith 26 L J Ch 8 An express waiver, made in Court or preparatory to trial by the party or his attorney conceding for the purpose of the trial the truth of some alleged fact, has the effect of a confessional pleading in that the fact is thereafter to be taken for granted, so that the one party need offer no evidence to prove it, and the other is not allowed to dispute it This is what is commonly termed a solemn—i.e. ceremonial or formal—or judicial admission, or stipulation It is in truth a substitute for evidence in that it does away with need for evidence Hignore § 2583 Agreements of this character, intelligently and deliberately made—whether made by the parties in person or by their attorneys or solicitors of record—are encouraged and favoured Their purpose generally is to save costs and to expedite trials, by relieving from rules of practice which in the particular case are deemed mere hindrances, or the dispensation with mere formal proof, or as in the present case the admission of uncontroverted facts of the existence of which the parties are fully cognizant Per Buckell J in Prestwood v Watson, 111 Ala 604 (1m) Hignore § 2583

Scope of the section This section includes judicial admissions including admissions made in the pleadings The effect which a judicial admission produces is of course an effect showed in common with certain other legal acts In the first place a pleading may, by confessing a fact place it beyond the range either of needing evidence or of permitting dispute, and an omission to plead in denial may have the same consequence The distinction between a pleading and a judicial admission seems to consist in the circumstances that the latter may be made after issues joined or trial begun and may thus contract or diminish the effect of a pleading, that it is not a part of the required statements defining the parties issues and that it is therefore not subject to the rules of time form, amendment, and the like which govern the allegations of pleading Hignore § 2589 Under this section no fact need be proved which the parties at the hearing or which by any rule of pleading in force at the time they are deemed to have admitted by their pleadings Where a plaintiff admitted in written statement in a former suit and in his oral examination in the suit question an agreement set up by the defendant by which the plaintiff undertook for consideration not to redeem a mortgaged land till after the de

S 58. the defendant but desired to be bound by it, Held that the defendant was not, in the face of the plaintiffs' admission bound to adduce evidence of the agreement Maung Kot v Maung So, U B R (1897 1901) Vol II 379 This section applies to civil as well as to criminal cases Bhulan v Emperor, 91 Ind C 953 Bansilal v Emperor, 30 Bom L R 616=52 Bom L R 686=A I R 1914 Bom 641 This section has in general no application to divorce cases Ober v Ober 27 Bom L R 231=A I R 1925 Bom 231=49 B 368 This section normally relates to agreed statements of facts made between both parties to save time and expense at a trial But where there is no agreement to admit facts and no pleading has been put in by a party it can not be said any such admission has been made in his pleading Ibid A mere reference in the plaint to the contract in suit having made "office dhara" or according to the practices of the office is no indication whatsoever to the defendants that the plaintiffs rely on one of the supposed terms of this "office dhara" in support of their claim or that one of the supposed terms of this "office dhara" is an implied stipulation of certain nature so as to amount to admission by the defendants of the alleged stipulation Dassanlal v Yusufali 86 Ind C 364=A I R 1925 Sind 80 Of the various kinds of judicial admissions, those contained in pleadings command careful consideration, but with regard not only of this presumed solemn contract but with regard to the time at which they were made, their use in the action of which they form the basis, their use dehors that action, the change in the circumstances by withdrawal or amendment in brief by the circumstances surrounding their offer in evidence against the party making them including of course, their verification by parties having absolute knowledge and those who speak only from information and belief When parties allege matters of fact in their pleadings then pleadings may be offered in evidence against such parties as admissions of the facts so alleged Burn Jones, § 2, The admissions of attorneys of record bind their clients, in all matters relating to the progress and trial of the cause, but to this end, they must be distinct and formal, or such as are termed solemn admissions, made for the express purpose of alleviating the stringency of some rule of practice, or of dispensing with the formal proof of some fact it trial in such cases, they are in general conclusive, and may be given in evidence even upon a new trial Doe v Bud, 7 C & P 6 Langley v Lord Oxford 1 M & W 508 If the admission is made before suit it is equally binding provided it appear that the attorney was already retained to appear in the cause Marshall v Cliff, 4 Camp 133 But in the absence of any evidence of retainer at the time in the cause there must be some other proof of authority to make the admission Wagstaff v Wilson 4 B & Ad 339

There is another class of judicial admissions, made by the payment of money into Court upon a rule granted for that purpose Here it is obvious the defendant conclusively admits that he owes the money thus tendered in payment (Bhulan v Scholes 2 Campb 341, Rueler v Palsgrave, 1 Camp 538) that it is due for the cause mentioned in the declaration (Scotton v Bunick 5 Bing 28 Pennet v Francis 2 B & P 550, Jones v Hoar, 3 Pick 285 Huntington v American Bank 6 Pick 310) that the plaintiff is entitled to claim it in the character in which he sues (Liscombe v Holmes 2 Camp 441) that the Court has jurisdiction in the matter (Millet v Williams, 5 F R 19 21), that the contract described is rightly set forth and was duly executed (Gutteridge v Smith 2 H Bl 374 Israel v Benjamin 3 Campb 40) that it was broken in the manner and to the extent declared (Dyer v Ashton 1 B & C 3) and if it was a case of goods sold by sample that they agreed with the sample (Teggeth v Cooper 1 B & C 3) In other words the payment of money into Court admits conclusively every fact which the plaintiff would be obliged to prove in order to recover that money Deyer v Ashton 1 B & C 3 Stapleton v Nouell 6 M & W 9 Abeker v English 2 Scott N S 156, Archer v Walker 9 Dowl 21, Greenall Es § 205 But it admits nothing beyond that

The vital feature of a judicial admission is universally conceded to be its conclusiveness upon the party making it i.e. the prohibition of any further dispute of the fact by him and of any use of evidence to disprove or contract

it Hagmore § 2590 So a fact that is judicially admitted needs no evidence from the party benefiting by the admission Ibid § 2591 A party or his agent may make admissions for the purpose of dispensing with the proof at the trial by agreement or otherwise before or at the trial Phay Fr 1th Ed p 10 Such admissions may be made by pleadings as well Hollis v Burton, (1892) 3 Ch 226 Burjorji v Muncherji 13 B 113 An admission made by the pleader binds the client Kaleelamund v Gracebala 10 W R 322 The plaintiff is entitled to a decree on the mere admission of the defendant Issur Chunder v Noddeep 6 W R 132 The plain language of this section should not be unduly restricted by reference to considerations of public policy Pai Wallis C J in Mallappa v Matam Yoga 48 Ind Cas 158 = 12 M 41 So the admission of a party in his pleadings as to an oral agreement modifying a written contract gets rid of the danger which it is intended to guard against by the prohibition against the admission of oral evidence contained in the 4th proviso to section 92 of the Evidence Act Ibid But in the same case Seshagiri Iygar J said 'The rule of law enunciated in Stallard v Pooley 6 M & W 664 which accepted oral admissions of every kind as proving documents has no doubt been departed from in India [see section 22 of the Evidence Act and sections 59 and 65 (h)] It is open to argument that admissions in pleadings are in the nature of secondary evidence and that the prohibitions in section 22 applies equally to pleadings as well Otherwise parties may compel a Court by statements in pleadings to pronounce judgments upon evidence which is not legally admissible There is the further fact that notwithstanding the admission in the pleadings the Court may call upon the party to prove a fact In such cases the proof must be restricted to the modes mentioned in the Act But it should be borne in mind in this connection that Chapter III deals with facts which need not be proved

Different kinds of judicial admissions This section deals with admissions made by the parties to an action or made voluntarily, or pursuant to a notice to admit documents or facts given by the opposite party as well as admissions by agreement at or before trial A party may in his pleading state expressly that he admits all or certain of the allegations of fact made in the pleading of his opponent He may also admit any allegation or allegations in a statement of claim or counter claim by not denying or not stating that he does not admit the same He may also give express notice in writing that he admits all or certain of the facts alleged by his opponent If the defendant admits all the facts pleaded in the statement of claim the plaintiff will only be allowed to call evidence to prove additional facts by permission of the Court and on special grounds The Hardwick (1883) 9 P D 32, Annual Practice 1921 p 466 Where an admission is made before the hearing, the agreement to admit should be in writing and signed by the parties or their agents When an admission as frequently happens is made at the hearing, the Judge's note is sufficient North L 278 So the statement of a Judge who presides at a trial, is conclusive as to what passed at the trial Neither the affidavits of bystanders or of jurors, nor the notes of counsels or of shorthand writers, are admissible to controvert the statement of the Judge Reg v Pestonji, 10 B H C R 75(8)

Agree to admit at the hearing "With regard to facts admitted at the hearing the expression 'at the hearing' is ambiguous If it means before the evidence has begun to be taken then what I have said already applies to it If it means after the evidence has begun to be taken then in a civil case no doubt the party or his pleader may at any time relieve his adversary from the necessity of proof and the generality of the language used in this section would lead to the inference that this was so in a criminal trial also though it is generally supposed to be otherwise and that on a criminal charge admissions made after a plea of not guilty can only be made use of as evidence Ward by Ev p 51 'At the hearing', means when there are more hearings than one the final hearing Thus where A sues to eject B for non payment of rent and B at the first hearing orally agrees to payment in full at the final hearing no evidence of title or tenancy need be given Whitley Stokes Vol II, p 889 When an agreement sued upon is admitted by the defendant, proof of it is dispensed with A § 58 Court cannot dismiss suit based on an admitted document, on the ground that the document was not sufficiently stamped Rahimolla v. Murray, 11 Ind. C. 510. Where the defendant admits the signature of his father in the mortgage deed, the plaintiff is relieved under this section from any further responsibility of proving the document Lalchand v. Lalchand 42 B 352 = 20 Bom. L. R. 354 = 45 Ind. Cas. 374, Arjun Sahu v. Kelar, 2 P. 317 = 74 Ind. Cas. 130. Where the fact of a prior partition having taken place is admitted by both parties, the same need not be proved and the fact that the instrument in writing is not registered will not make the instrument inadmissible for a collateral purpose Maung Po Kin v. Maung Shue, 1 Rang. 405 = 1924 Rang. 150.

Agree to admit by any writing before the hearing. With regard to the facts admitted prior to the hearing, it is quite correct to say that they need not be proved, in the sense that no evidence need be given of them. Not only this need not be done, but it would not be allowed to be done. As to the admissions before the hearing it is certain that, in a criminal case they can only be used as evidence and for this purpose it does not signify whether they are in writing or not. Admissions in writing before the hearing in civil cases would come under consideration when the Judge is considering what is to be tried. Still even then they must be proved to be genuine unless they are admitted in the presence of the Judge. The direction given to the Court by the 1st paragraph to § 58 is controlled by the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code which requires the Judge to determine what issues are to be tried before the taking of evidence begins. If a Judge wished to allow a party to withdraw his admission, he would have to amend the issues. Marby v. E. p. 51. Each party to an action is in that action conclusively bound by those admissions which he expressly makes in the pleadings, or by stipulations oral or written which are formally entered into for the purpose of dispensing with proof. Thur Jones § 274, see also Bingham v. Stanley 2 Q. B. 117, Robins v. Lord 4 Q. B. D. 811, Bolean v. Rutlin 2 Ex. 680. Admissions made by parties or their attorneys in their pleadings in the action or by stipulation is to facts or by dispensing with certain proofs may be withdrawn if not true provided there remains sufficient time for the other party in which to prepare his case and provided such party has not been injured by relying on such admissions. Wallace v. Mathews 39 Gr. 617 (Am.). Such admissions will not be allowed to be withdrawn, however if the situation of the parties has been substantially changed as by the death of a party or of a witness. W. on v. Bail of Louisiana, 55 Gr. 93 (Am.). If a party desires to withdraw admissions of the character under discussion he should give full and timely notice of his purpose, so that the other party may have reasonable time to supply the proof. Hirapates v. Redel 43 Gr. 142, Ellons v. Larims, 5 Car. & P. 320. Thur Jones § 274.

Admission by pleading. "Every allegation of fact in the plaint if not denied specifically or by necessary implication or stated to be not admitted in the pleading of the defendant, shall be taken to be admitted except as against a person under disability. Civil Pro Code Order 8 rule 5. That rule states what amount to admission of fact in pleading. Rule 3 of Order 8, requires that the defendant must deny specifically with each allegation of fact of which he does not admit the truth. Rule 5 provides that every allegation of fact in the plaint if not denied in the written statement or stated to be not admitted shall be taken to be admitted by the defendant. (Vide Mullas Civil Pro Code note under rule of Order 8.) The whole object of the rule is to narrow the parties down to definite issues and so diminish expense and delay, especially as regards the amount of testimony required on either side at the hearing. Per Jessel M. J. in Plig v. Hildesworth (1874) 3 Ch. D. 637. A party may directly deny the allegation of his opponent or he may state that he does not admit the allegation. But an allegation which is not specifically denied or stated to be not admitted is treated as admitted. Byrd v. Mann 5 Ch. D. 781 aff. 7 Ch. D. 284. Green v. Sear (1879) 13 Ch. D. 569. Collins v. Good 7 Ch. D. 582. A refusal to admit must be stated as specifically as a denial. Phar v. Holtworth 3 Ch. D. 637 640. Hill v. L. & W. J. Co., 35 L. R. 810. Leave in a proper case may be given to a party to recall admissions which he has made. Hollis v Lorton (1892) 3 Ch 226 C A. Where a document is by reference included in the plaint or written statement, and its terms and execution admitted on the record by the pleadings it is not necessary to prove it or put it in evidence and its non-registration is immaterial. Muang Kyau v Maung Po Win U B R 1901 3rd Qr Evidence I. Plaintiffs sued defendants for damages for 27 bags of dried prawns which were consigned to the plaintiffs and which were damaged by rain water on the 25th May while stored in one of the defendants' godowns. The defendants in the written statement did not refer to the question of notice. In revision it was contended that the plaintiffs had not proved the notice. Held that the defendants must be deemed to have admitted notice under order VIII rule 5 C P Code and proof was dispensed with under s 58. Commissioners for the Port of Rangoon v Moola Danood 9 Ind Cas 470. The plaintiffs filed a suit in the Court of the first class subordinate Judge for partition of a certain property. In the plaint the market value of the property stated was such as to make the suit triable only by the first class subordinate Judge. The Judge however made over the trial of the suit to the joint subordinate Judge at Lhanna who had no jurisdiction to try it if the property was correctly valued in the plaint. Neither party raised any objection on the ground of jurisdiction and no issue was raised relating to it. The trial proceeded on merits and the subordinate Judge passed a decree for partition in favour of the plaintiffs. The defendants in their appeal to the District Court raised for the first time the question of jurisdiction on the strength of the market values stated in the plaint. The objection having been overruled they appealed to the High Court. Held that as neither party raised any question as to want of jurisdiction arising from the allegation in the plaint and as they by their conduct and silence treated the market value to be the amount sufficient to give jurisdiction to the Court they dispensed with proof on the question by their tacit admissions and thus the principle of law laid down in s 58 came into operation and prevented the result of the statement of the market value in the plaint. Jose Inoué v Francisco 12 Bom L R 712. Where the defendants in their written statements admitted that they had executed a deed of mortgage on account of an old debt due by them and that subsequently it was arranged that a third person who was not a party to the mortgage should pay the debt and redeem the land. Held that this was a clear admission that the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee was established between the defendants and the plaintiffs, and that therefore the production of the mortgage deed was unnecessary under the provisions of section 59 of the Evidence Act. Maung Kan v Maung Myat 11 Ind Cas 850. Plaintiff sued for redemption alleging that he had sold the land in suit out and out to the defendant for Rs 250 less than 12 years before suit but that at the time of sale a stipulation was made for repurchase by the plaintiff at any time on payment of the purchase money. Held that as the plaintiff had admitted in the plaint the factum of an absolute sale in favour of the defendant it was unnecessary for the latter to prove the sale. Manug Pya v Manug O Za 4 Bur L T 10=9 Ind Cas 770. Where an oral agreement is admitted in the pleadings of the parties proof of the agreement is dispensed with by this section and the Court is bound to recognise and give effect to such agreement. Malappa v Vaga 42 M 11=35 M L J 555=48 Ind Cas 159. Where a party to an action makes solemn admissions against his interest in a pleading they should be treated as admitted facts and he will not be heard to question the correctness thereof at any stage of the case in the trial Court or on appeal. If the statements or admissions were made by himself or by his counsel under an honest mistake or misapprehension of what the facts really were and he desires to be relieved from the effect thereof he should apply to the trial Court for leave to withdraw such admissions or pleadings and if required to do so make a showing of good faith in support of his application which should be granted or denied in the furtherance of justice. Rogers v Brown, 15 O & L 524, Baird Jones § 271.

As regards the effect of an admission made in a pleading for proving of the execution of a document the following observation of Heston v Bujorji v Muncherji, 5 B 142, at pp 142-143 are very important. "The second question is that of whether the proof of the document is superseded by its admission in the pleading. On this point the case of Mc Gowan v Smith 26 L J Ch 8 and the other referred to seem conclusive. A Court, in general, has to try the questions on which the parties are at issue, not those on which they are agreed and admissions which have been deliberately made for the purpose of the suit whether in pleading or by agreement, will act as an estoppel to the admission of any evidence contradicting them. This includes any document that is by reference incorporated in the bill or answer (Grasely's Law of Evidence 427). The point is not in issue, and as to the counter statements of the parties, a plea or a special replication admits every point that it does not directly put in issue. The same rule applies to an answer when it assumes the form of a demurrer or plea by submitting a point of law or by introducing new facts. Thus a submission that the defendants would not be in any way affected by the notice set forth in the bill, precluded them from disputing the validity of this notice. Such rules are to be applied with discretion in the country where a strict system of pleading is not followed, but here, as I suppose everywhere the language of Lord Cairns holds true, that the first object of pleading is to inform the persons against whom the suit is directed what is the charge that is laid against him (Broune v Mc Chintock, 6 E & Ir App at p 45). The principle is equally valid as applied to either party in the cause. The Court is to frame the issues according to the allegations made in the pleadings or in the written statements tendered in the suit which here contain a full assertion and admission of the execution of the document A by the defendant Moncherie. But the issues, as they stand, were suggested by the defendant's counsel. They waive controversy as to the actual execution of the document and assume it to have been executed and raise questions only that depend for their pertinence on that assumption. Under such circumstances the plaintiff is not I think called upon to prove the execution of the document, or to put it in evidence. If the document being pronounced absolutely invalid for some purpose on consideration of public policy, it were sought to defeat the law through the effect usually given to an admission in pleading such an attempt could not be allowed to succeed but for its proposed purpose in this case it is not invalid. But in admission made by a party to a suit or his attorney, that a fact is true exists and need not be proved does not dispense with proof of the existence of that fact subsequent to the date of the admission. Lauson's Presumptive Facts 2nd Ed 237. McLeod v Wakeley, 3 C & P 311. In the above case Lord Fentenden C J said "I do not think that I can hold that this admission can be extended to a publication after its date. I consider that the admission goes down to its date but not further."

Distinction between evidentiary admissions and admissions by pleadings. There is a distinction between evidentiary admissions and admissions by the pleading. This section governs admissions by pleadings. Sadhu v Vignu U B R 1907 Evidence 1. Admissions made for the purpose of disposing of the case with proof at the trial must be distinguished from those tendered as evidence. The former not being usually receivable in other proceedings and the latter not being usually conclusive. Phup Pt 4th Ed p 10. The evidentiary admissions have been termed by Prof Wigmore as quasi admissions. According to him the true admission, in the fullest sense of the term is another thing and involves a totally distinct principle. It concerns a method of securing evidence by the act of offering any evidence at all. So the quasi admission is an admission in the nature of evidence whereas the admission proper or judicial admission is a waiver of any evidence. So a judicial admission is a formal act, done in the course of judicial proceeding, which waives or dispenses with the production of evidence by conceding for the purpose of litigation that the proposition of fact alleged by the opponent is true. Wigmore § 1058.

Admission in Divorce cases. Admission of husband or wife is a matter of necessity in all allegations of agency when they are to be used in direct proof. Hence except in cases where collusion establishes a form of fraudulently which destroys their rights. Unlike other contracts the contract of marriage cannot be dissolved by the mere consent and argument of the parties.

and in actions for dissolution of this contract, that is for divorce, admissions are closely scrutinized. Although the husband and wife are the parties to the record, the State is for the purposes some deemed interested in the proceeding. The contract of marriage is bipartite, the husband the wife and the State being the parties thereto, and it can neither be entered into nor dissolved except by the consent of and in the manner prescribed by the State. It necessarily follows that no admissions by either party to the contract, however collusive upon such party, can be conclusive upon the State in a suit for the dissolution of the contract, and that such dissolution cannot safely be deemed unless the admission be corroborated by strong proofs. Burr Jones § 262. In Williams v Williams 1 Hagg 299, Lord Stowell says that a confession is a species of evidence which though not inadmissible, is to be regarded with great distrust while in Mortimer v Mortimer 2 Hagg 310 the same learned Judge announces that a confession ranks high "I should say highest in the scale of evidence, though in the same case he admits that the rule that confessions alone will not support a charge of adultery is too firmly established to be shaken. In Harris v Harris 2 Hagg 676 In Lushington is more intelligible when he says that a confession perfectly free from all taint of collusion when confirmed by circumstances and conduct, ranks among the highest species of evidence. The suit for divorce has been called a triangular proceeding au generis, in which the government occupies the position of a third party. Since the public have an interest in actions for divorce and ought not be bound by the admissions of one of the parties it has generally been held that a divorce should not be granted upon the uncorroborated admission or confession of a party. Richardson v Richardson 30 Am Dec 538, see also Orie v Orie 27 Bom L R 251=49 B 368.

Admission in criminal cases. According to Mr Norton this section is confined to civil suits only. Nort Et 228. But Mr Justice Cunningham says "Under the English law a prisoner under trial for felony can make no admission so as to dispense with proof, though a confession may be proved against him. Steph Dig Art 60. The present section appears to allow of an accused admitting at the trial such facts as he pleased to admit. Cun Et p 213. So an accused person is bound by an unqualified admission made at the trial by his solicitor. In England, a formal admission by the counsel at a trial has been allowed in order to dispense with more formal proofs. In India there is nothing to prevent a prisoner, on being questioned under s 34 of the Criminal Procedure of 1882 to make an admission, and it is obvious that some admissions on formal matters of law can be better trusted to his legal adviser, and there seems to be no reason in principle why when the admission has been so made in his presence at the trial so as to dispense with the attendance of witnesses for the prosecution it should not be held to bind him. Queen Empress v Leandro Rat Un Cr C 769. This section applies to criminal trials as much as to civil cases. Bhulan v Emperor 91 Ind Cas 233=27 Cr L J 57=A I R 1926 Oudh 215. Bansilal v Emperor, 30 Bom L R 646=52 Bom 686=112 Ind Cas 110=A I R 1928 Bom 241. In England in a trial for felony the prisoner can make no admissions so as to dispense with proof though a confession may be proved as against him. Steph Dig Art 60. So where there were two prosecutions for felony, and counsel for defence offered to admit the evidence taken on the first trial, as given in the second, Patteson J doubted whether that could be done even by consent in a case of felony, but he directed the witnesses to be sworn and read their evidence over to them from his notes. R v Foster, 7 C & P 495. But in cases of misdemeanour, evidence may be taken by consent. Per Patteson J in ibid contra, Phips 11. When the attorneys on both sides had agreed that the formal proofs in perjury should be dispensed with and that part of the prosecutor's evidence admitted L Abinger C B said. In a criminal case tried on the crown side of the assizes I can not allow any admission to be made on the part of the defendant unless it is made at the trial by the defendant or his counsel. R v Thornhill, 8 C & P 575 (1838). Roscoe p 160. In India the rule was not uniform vide Queen v Karam Mundle 17 W R Cr 49. Queen v Gagalaro 12 W R Cr 80. But so far as the construction of this section is concerned Larrett J observed "A pleader's authority to admit a certain fact so as to dispense with the necessity of further proof is clearly

S 58. laid down in regard to a civil case in Mahadeo v. Sunderabai 3 Bom L R 167 and I think the principle applies in regard to this particular case in the appellate Court. The fact that it was a criminal case does not really make any difference. Further more, I am not convinced that s 58 Evidence Act does not apply to justify the action of the Sessions Judge. No doubt in England an admission by an accused, which falls short of his pleading guilty is not taken into account and is not binding against him. But section 58 makes no exception in regard to criminal proceedings and while I do not say that it can be availed of to cure and a clear contravention of any directions of the Criminal Procedure Code as to the course of a trial yet I think it can apply in a case like this which relates only to proceedings of an appellate Court. Bonsild v. Emperor, A I R 1928 Bom 241 (242) = 112 Ind Cas 110 = 52 B L R 650 = 30 Bom L R 646. But admissions made by a pleader appointed to help the accused in his defence are not binding on him to his prejudice. Per Un J in ibid. An accused person is bound by an unqualified admission made at the trial by his solicitor. In England a formal admission by the counsel at a trial has been allowed in order to dispense with mere formal proofs. In India there is nothing to prevent a prisoner on being questioned under s 347 of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1932 to make an admission and it is obvious that some admissions on formal matters of law can be better trusted to his legal adviser and there seems to be no reason in principle why, when the admission has been so made in his presence at the trial so as to dispense with the attendance of witnesses for the prosecution, it should not be held to bind him. Queen Empress v. Leandro Mascarenhas, Rat Un Cr C 769 = Cr Reg 34 of 1895.

Proviso. Both under section 58 of the Evidence Act and under order VIII, rule 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure the trial Court has a discretion to require proof of the due attestation of the mortgage bond sued upon not withstanding an admission by the defendant in his written statement that the bond had been duly executed. Munappa v. Jellaichami, 1918 M W N 833 = 9 L W 5 = 5 M L T 19 = 19 Ind Crs 278.

Judicial Admissions made by mistake. It is only necessary to add that where judicial admissions have been made improvidently and by mistake, the Court will in its discretion, relieve the party from the consequences of his error by ordering a repleader, or by discharging the case stated, or the rule or a repleader if made in Court. This rule is based on the maxim Non solus, qui cessat, nisi per ignorantiam. Greul Fr § 206. Agreements made out of Court between attorneys, concerning the course of proceedings in Court are equally under its control in effect by means of its coercive power over the attorney in all matter relating to professional character and conduct. But, in all these admissions unless a clear case of mistake is made out entitling the party to relief he is held to the admission, which the Court will proceed to act upon not as truth in the abstract but as a formula for the solution of the particular problem before it namely, the case in judgment without injury to the general administration of justice. Greul Fr on Civil in Equity pp 349, 358, Greul Fr § 206.

Future of the Doctrine of Judicial Admissions. 'The doctrine of Judicial Admissions' says Prof. Wigmore 'has a large future before it, if Judges will but use it adequately. In the first place the Judge should apply it to all informal as well as formal admissions by counsel during trial. In the next place the Judge should freely call upon counsel to state whether a fact is in good faith disputed and should require admissions to be made where it seems probable that the fact is not actually disputed. By this method, the preponderance of evidence will be confined to the matters of fact alone which the parties do dispute. It is easy to see how large a mass of needless skirmishes would thereby be eliminated how much time would be saved and how much confusion of the jury would be avoided. And this would be attained by the mere application of an existing principle. Already in England the principle is so used on a large scale in the modern practice of settling issues before masters. But it can also be used by the Judge at the trial.' Wigmore § 2307.

CHAPTER IV

OF ORAL EVIDENCE

Proof of facts by oral evidence

S. 59

59 All facts, except the contents of documents, may be proved by oral evidence

Oral evidence Oral evidence is evidence which is confined to words spoken by the mouth. Per Petheram C J in Queen Empress v. Abdulla, 7 A 385 (397) 1 B. It includes all statements which the Court permits or requires to be made before it by witnesses, in relation to matters of fact under enquiry. Id. 3. It is what the English lawyers call testimonial evidence. Testimony is a species of evidence by means of witnesses. The broader term 'evidence' includes that which is given by witnesses or offered by documents. Id. 3. In People v. Kenyon 5 Park Cr (N. Y.) 254, 288. In Justice Campbell said. It may be well to bear in mind that there is marked difference between testimony and evidence. The latter is much more comprehensive than the former—testimony being the statements or the declarations of a witness and evidence being either the result or deduction from all the facts established whether by testimony by events or by circumstances by writings records and other materials. It is called evidence, sunt Cole because thereby the point in issue in a case to be tried is to be made evident to the jury, and the evidence to a jury containeth the testimony of witnesses and all other proof to be given and produced to a jury from the finding of any issue joined between parties. 'Testimony' in legal as well as in common usage signifies a statement of facts by witnesses and to disprove the testimony of a witness is to disprove the facts testified to by him. Butt Jones § 12.

Wordings of the section This section is not very happily worded. Contents of documents may be proved by oral evidence under certain circumstances that is to say when such evidence of their contents is admissible as secondary evidence. See section 63 cl 5 section 52 cl (5) Not Et 239.

Contents of a document cannot be proved by oral evidence It is a cardinal rule of evidence—not one of technicality but of substance that where written documents exist they shall be produced as being the best evidence of their own contents. Dunmoye v. Roy Lachmirat G C L R 101=71 A 8. This section is based on the best evidence rule. The rule is thus stated by Greenleaf 'A fourth rule, which governs in the production of evidence, is that which requires the best evidence of which the case in its nature is susceptible. This rule does not demand the greatest amount of evidence which can possibly be given of any fact, but its design is to prevent the introduction of any, which from the nature of the case, supposes that better evidence is in the possession of the party. It is adopted for the prevention of fraud for when it is apparent that the better evidence is withheld it is fair to presume that the party had some sinister motive for not producing it and that if offered his design would be frustrated. The rule thus becomes essential to the pure administration of justice. In requiring the production of the best evidence applicable to each particular fact, it is meant, that no evidence shall be received which is merely substitutionary in its nature so long as the original evidence can be had. The rule excludes only that evidence which itself indicates the existence of moral original sources of information. But where there is no substitution of evidence but only a selection of the weaker instead of stronger proofs or an omission to supply all the proofs capable of being produced the rule is not infringed. Thus a title by deed must be proved by the production of the deed itself, if it is within the power of the party, for this is the best evidence of which the case is susceptible and its non production would raise a presumption that it contained some matter of apparent deference. But being produced, the execution of the deed itself may be proved by one only of the subscribing witnesses though the other also is at hand. And even the previous examination of a deceased subscribing witness, if admissible on other grounds may supersede the necessity of calling the survivor. So in proof or disproof of handwriting it is not necessary to call the supposed writer himself. And, even where it is necessary to prove negatively, that an act was done without the consent, or against the will of another it is not in general necessary to call the person whose will or consent is denied' Green Ev § 82. In the case of Earl of Suffolk v Greenhill, Ch Rep 89, 92, the Court held it very dangerous to admit the contents and sufficiencies of deeds to be proved by the testimony of witnesses, the construction of deeds being the office of the Court. Similarly in Incent v Cole, M & M 257, Tinterden L C J said 'The always (perhaps more so than other Judges) acted most strictly on the rule that what is in writing shall be proved by the writing itself. My experience has taught me the extreme danger of relying on the recollection of witnesses, how ever honest as to the contents of written instruments, they may be easily mistaken that I think the purposes of justice require the strict enforcement of the rule. Hugmore § 1179, Macdonnell v Evans 11 C B 942, Sheridan v Paul 31 How St Tr 669. Akquent of Ab Burros Must Imam v Hargol and 7 W R 67 (P C)=4 M I A 403, Elowin v Haralal 11 W R 2 (P C)=B L R 4, Meeruddin v Imaman, 5 W R 26 P C=1 M I A 19 (42, 43) R v Francis 12 Cox C C 612

What facts may be proved by oral evidence. Oral evidence may suffice to prove possession. Dino bandho v James Furlong, 9 W R 155. Shro Sahayte v Goodai, 8 W R 323. Gorind v Anund, 5 W R Cr 79. Oral evidence if credible would be sufficient to prove a title by prescription. Meharban v Mukhob 7 W R 462. So also oral evidence is sufficient without documentary evidence to establish a question of title. Ram Soondur v Akima, 8 W L 306. In proving a native pedigree, the oral statements of deceased relatives will be admitted in the absence of any registers of births and deaths. Mohdeen v Mahomed, 1 Ind Jur O S 132=1 M H C R 92. It is not valid reason to disbelieve the evidence of a witness who swore that he had received the amount of a decree from the plaintiff when the money was paid by the plaintiff's agent. Ialla Mohdeo v Sattanund 17 W R 502. Boundaries may be proved by oral evidence. Ranee Surt Soonduree v Rajendur Kishore, 9 W R 12, but see Gohul Chandra v Rajah Sreenud Biddadhar W R (1864) 186. Oral evidence is relevant to prove the existence of an agreement and if sufficient will justify the decree of a claim. Gohul Kishore v Nund Mohum 12 W L 794. A Judge maintaining that oral evidence is of no value without a pallah and lahuliyat to prove the quantity of defendant's mud dee last land and the amount of rent, directs himself in point of law as to what was necessary in deciding the fact. Dinoo Singh v Doorga Pershad, 18 W R 348. So also oral evidence is admissible to prove an adjustment of accounts. Kamph Kasibara v Soma muddi Ram, 1 M H C R 183. A plaintiff denying the execution of document may adduce oral evidence to prove his contention. Khatler Mohun v Gheedhar 20 W L 181. No Court much less an appellate Court is justified in ruling that in the absence of documentary evidence mere oral evidence is not sufficient to prove the plaintiff's case when it is supported by a number of witnesses, whose testimony is believed by the first Court. Mohesh Ray v Goodham Mahdon 15 W L 311. In India a contract for sale of goods can be proved by oral evidence. Durga Prasad v Bhayan 6 Bom L R 493. Oral evidence as to the acts and conduct of parties is admissible for showing that a certain deed is as it purports to be an out and out sale or a mortgage. Mohamed Ali Hossein v Anar th 25 C 259=5 C W N 326. Khanakar v the Hindu 28 C 256=5 C W N 25. Ka h Vath v Narroony 1 W R 22. Oral evidence may be employed to prove the payment of a debt due on samadastat. Guman v Sorahy 1 B H C 1. Oral evidence of the discharge of an obligation executed in writing is admissible. Ivumidumisararany v Kamabhattar, 2 M H C R 112.

Oral evidence weight and value of. In a case where oral evidence is conflicting and where documentary evidence does not help one in coming to a decision, conclusion the only proper course is to see what are the admitted facts in the case and what are the circumstances deducible from the oral evidence both as to the truth of which there can be no doubt. The alone can be the true method of arriving at a correct conclusion. Mohut Hulum v Ival 184 Ind C 1 517=A I R 1924 Oudh 15. Statement made by a witness at the trial should be altogether rejected when it is in hopeless conflict with his previous statements Ram Karan v Emperor 7 Lah L J 371 = 26 P L R 659 = A I R 1925 Lah 483 It is impossible to place reliance on an uncorroborated statement of a man who is describing an event which took place 12 years ago and which was not in an event of a particularly striking character Gurcharan v Satya Naran 8 L R 314 (Rev) A few casual and somewhat ambiguous phrases in a deposition cannot destroy the clear effect of the whole deposition Kashbai v Mamalhan A I R 1925 Nag 265 The maxim falsus in uno falsus in omnibus is a maxim of ancient origin which is not now implicitly followed by Courts in the appreciation of evidence It is the duty of the Court to sift the evidence and separate the truth from falsehood if it can Maung Po Gyan v Maung So, 1 Bur L J 213 It is a recognised principle that where a story comes into Court with a story which cannot be believed in its essential details it is impossible to rely on a part of the story for the purpose of convicting the accused Phatali Singh v Emperor 5 Pat L W 157 = (1918) Pat 288 = 47 Ind Cas 73 = 19 Cr I J 877 To discredit oral evidence on merely general reasons not affecting the credit of any particular deponent, is an error in law and justifies interference in second appeal Ram Subhog Chaube v Kesho Prasad 29 Ind Cas 673 In re Goomamonee and ors 17 W R 59 Miller J said "In determining the value of oral evidence it is not enough for the Appellate Court to say, as the Judge says in this case 'I find no fault with the evidence per se and it must be allowed to prevail,' but that Court is bound in my opinion also to enquire, as thoroughly as the Court of first instance, whether the probabilities arising from all the surrounding circumstances of the case are such as to justify a reasonable mind in coming to the conclusion that the evidence is worthy of credit This precaution is nowhere more necessary than in this country It is true that there is no precaution of perjury against oral testimony but it has I believe been sufficiently confirmed by a long course of experience that nothing can be more dangerous than to act upon such testimony without testing its credibility both intrinsically and extrinsically Where there is contradiction of oral testimony the Court must look to the documentary evidence in order to see on which side the truth lies Mussamat Iman v Hargovind, 4 M I A 403 (407), Elkora Singh v Haralal Singh 11 W R P C 24

In Rhangama v Itchama 4 M I A 1 106 their Lordships of the Judicial Committee observed 'These instruments are produced and the facts tending to their conclusion are sworn to by a vast number of witnesses There appears to us to be no objections to this testimony beyond the observation which may be made on all Hindoo testimony that perjury and forgery are so extensively prevalent in India that little reliance can be placed on it See also Mallura Panday v Ram Rucha, 3 B L R A C J 112 Rajah Lelaland v Musst Bisheeroomissa 16 W R 102 Similarly in Mudhoo Soodun Sundial v Suroop Chander Sukra 4 M I A 431, 411 the Judicial Committee again observed 'It is quite true that such is the lamentable disregard of truth prevailing amongst the native inhabitants of Hindustan that all oral evidence is necessarily received with great suspicion and when opposed to by the strong improbability of the transaction to which they depose, or weakened by the mode in which they speak it may be of little avail but we must be careful not to carry this caution to an extreme length not utterly to discard oral evidence, merely because it is oral, and unless the impeaching and discrediting circumstances are clearly found to exist It would be very dangerous to exercise the judicial function as if no credit could necessarily be given to witnesses' deposition, qua voce, how necessary however it may be always to sift such evidence with great minuteness and care' This case was cited with approval in the case of Emperor v Balgangadhar Tilak 6 Bom I R 324 (350) = 29 B 179 see also Muse v Sanduloomissa 11 M I A 187 (189) Queen v Elahi Bux, B L R (C B) 482 Sriyay v Chonna 10 M I A 162 Fdu v Behan 11 W R 345 But it would be indeed most dangerous to say that where the probabilities are in favour of the transaction, we conclude against it solely because of the general fallibility of native evidence Such an argument would go to an extent which can never be maintained in this or any other Court for it tends to establish a rule that all oral evidence must be discarded, and it is most manifest that

S 59 however fallible such evidence may be, however carefully to be watched justice never can be administered in most important cases without recourse to it. Bunari Lal v Maharajah Hitaran 7 M I A 148 (167)=1 W R P C 125. So "the ordinary legal and reasonable presumptive fact must not be lost sight of in the trial of Indian cases however untrustworthy much of the evidence submitted to the Court may commonly be that is due weight must be given to evidence there as elsewhere and evidence in a particular case must not be rejected from a general distrust of native testimony, nor perjury widely imputed without some grave grounds to support the imputation." Ramaswami Ammal v Kalanthai Vatcheas, 11 M I A 531, 555. Such rejection if sanctioned would virtually submit the decision of the rights of others to the suspicion and not to the deliberate judgment of their appointed Judge. Ibid see also Sireman v Gopal 11 M I A 28. Haumanthas v Secretary of State 25 B 298, Ahmed v Buchandia 12 W R P C 21=3 B L R P C 13. Iac. Bur v Latuuddin 9 B L R 478, Queen v Ram Charan 9 A 315. Kaluchandia v Shukhandia, 6 B L R 501. So in such a case it would be safe to follow another principle laid down by the Privy Council not to look to the probabilities of the case. Bunari v Hitaran 4 W R 125 (P C). In the words of Baron Parke in the Isabullah v Babu Inuman 1 M I A 19=5 W R P C 26, "there is no better criterion of the truth, no safer rule for investigating cases of conflicting evidence where perjury and fraud must exist on the one side or the other than to consider what facts are beyond dispute and examine which of the two cases best accord with those facts according to the ordinary course of human affairs and the usual habits of life." See also M. Halim v M. Jhandi 103 Ind Cas 870=A I R 1927 Sind 209. So in Sri Raghunada v Sri Brojo Kishore 3 I A 146 it was intimated that, if the Judge had refused to weigh the probabilities of the case because he believed one set of witnesses rather than the other he would be forming his belief have excluded from his consideration that which he ought to have entered into it. Probabilities in thus an important element of consideration, where the evidence appears unreliable or is directly conflicting, but a case should not be decided upon probability alone apart from the evidence which the parties have submitted to the Court. Tallahyho v Follabmatul 71 W R 438. Evidence of witness though not independent, but not broken in cross examination and accepted by the Judge who heard them and saw their demeanour, should not be rejected on mere suspicion when the story told by them is not improbable. Maghulan v Ahmad 8 C W N 241-26A 401 (P C)=6 B N L R 233.

The consistency of testimony is also a strong and most important test for judging of the credibility of witnesses. Where several witnesses bear testimony to the same transaction, and concur in their statement of the series of particular circumstances and the order in which they occurred such coincidences exclude all apprehension of mere chance and accident, and can be accounted for only by one or other of two suppositions, either the testimony is true or the coincidence is the result of concert and conspiracy. If therefore the independence of the witness is proved and the supposition of previous conspiracy be disproved, or rendered highly improbable to the same extent will the truth of their testimony be established. So far does this principle extend that in many cases except for the purpose of repelling the suspicion of fraud and concert the credit of the witnesses themselves for honesty and veracity may become wholly immaterial. When it is once established that the witnesses to a transaction are not acting in concert, then although individually they should be unworthy of credit, yet if the coincidences in their testimony be too numerous to be attributed to mere accident, they cannot possibly be explained on any other supposition than that of the truth of their statement. The considerations which tend to negative any suspicion of concert and collusion between the witnesses are either extrinsic to their testimony such for instance as relate to their character situation their remoteness from each other the absence of previous intercourse with each other or with the parties and of all interest in the subject matter of litigation, or they arise internally from a minute and critical examination and comparison of the testimony itself. The nature of such coincidences is most important are the natural ones, which bear not the marks of artifice and premeditation? Do they occur in points obviously material, or in minute and remote points which were not likely to be material or in either the importance of which could not have been foreseen? The number of such coincidences is also worthy of the most attentive consideration human cunning, to a certain extent may fabricate coincidences, even with regard to minute points, the more effectually to deceive, but the coincidences of art and invention are necessarily circumscribed and limited whilst those of truth are indefinite and unlimited the witnesses of art will be copious in their detail of circumstances as far as their provision extends beyond this they will be sparing and reserved for fear of detection and thus their testimony will not be even and consistent throughout but the witnesses of truth will be equally ready and equally copious upon all points' Stanlie on Ev cited in Vort 53

Test of probability—Sir James Fitzjames Stephen's statement—"That probability is the guide of life is an obvious truth. But the expression has been a commonplace for more than a century and a half, and though there has been abundant discussion of the nature of probability I do not think that more can well be said on this great subject than that a statement is probable to whatever extent it generally resembles the common course of human conduct and of physical nature that it is improbable to whatever extent it involves any deviation therefrom, and that it is impossible if it contradicts the conceptions upon which all language and thought rest as if it were affirmed that a thing could be in two places at once and that twice two could ever be more or less than four, that it is nonsense unless it can be in some way represented to the mind so as to be the object of thought but I do not know that any rules wide enough to be valuable have been established unless it is in relation to special themes or subjects of inquiry, which are of much value in measuring the amount of which ought to be ascribed to different propositions of fact. Who for instance, can say how far a common proposition is made probable by the direct assertion of its truth by an unknown person? By what rule can any one be required to believe a person who describes correctly the operations of the electric telegraph and yet be justified in refusing to listen to a ghost story? Why is a Judge required to listen with gravity to conflicting medical theories of the cause of a death, and to take to a jury the grounds on which they are to decide whether a man died of this disease or that and yet to treat with contempt the notion that he died of witchcraft and to reject all evidence tendered to prove it? Probably no more difficult question can be raised and I doubt whether there is any which if fully solved would be of great practical importance" Stephen's General View of Criminal Law of England pp 192 193

Other tests of Probability "Evidence to be believed" said Vice Chancellor Van Fleet of New Jersey must not only proceed from the mouth of a credible witness but it must be credible in itself—such as the common experience and observation of mankind can approve as probable under the circumstances. We have no test of the truth of human testimony, except its conformity to our knowledge observation and experience. Whatever is repugnant to the belongs to the marvellous and is outside judicial cognizance" Doyger v Van Dyke, 37 N J L q 130, 132. But improbabilities must be distinguished from impossibilities. "A case how unlikely and suspicious so ever in itself may be irresistibly proved by the force of testimony" said Sir John Nichol. "Evidence may be such as to substantiate a transaction however improbable for it may be such that the falsehood of the evidence would be still more improbable than the fact which it seeks to establish" Saph v Atkinson, 1 Add Lec 162 182. In another case the same learned Judge said "It seems hardly possible on the mere improbability of a statement to discredit the evidence of a witness of good general character depositing firmly and solemnly there must be something amounting to incredulity, something incapable of explanation—not merely that it was improbable that under such circumstances persons in general would have so acted that is matter of opinion. Different persons act differently in similar circumstances" Huish v Hesse 3 Hagb Lec 659 706. See also Hise v Sudaloonissa, 11 M I A 177 Mudharoodan v Suroop, 4 M I A 441—7 W R 70, Nil Kristo v Buchandra, 3 B L R 13 P C. But "the circumstances of a case may be such as to make it utterly incredible, although there are confident attestations in support of it." Per Lord Stowell in The Argo, 1 C Rob 158. A testimony which is irreconcilable with admitted or well established facts in a case must be rejected as incredible even though it does not categorically contradict the testimony to those facts. Chamberlain v Ward, 21 How (U S) 54, 561. Moore on Facts § 119.

Where a portion of evidence is untrue. A claim is not to be decided against because it has been foolishly and even wickedly supported by false evidence. But what is true must be sifted from that which is false and if the true which remains is a residue is sufficient to support the claim, it should be awarded. In Ranee Sumanoyee v Mohanajah Sultees Chandra, 10 M I A at p 170 the Court observed "It will have been observed that their Lordships have arrived at their conclusion without considering either the parol evidence of the appellant or a confirmatory pattah produced by her as having been granted by Woodoo Sudun Sandial which if received by the Court below, would have concluded the case in her favour. Both these Courts, however, treated the whole of the parol evidence as unworthy of credit, and the pattah as a forged instrument and their Lordships regret that on the fullest consideration they are not prepared to differ from them in these conclusions. When false witness or forged documents are produced in support of a case, the fact naturally creates suspicion as to the case itself, and if the evidence on which their Lordships act depended in any degree for its credibility or weight on such witness or document they would have passed as to their conclusion. The fact is not however in the present case their Lordships believe they have to deal with a just case foolishly and wickedly attempted to be supported by false evidence. This misconduct must not mislead them in the advice they will have to tender to Her Majesty." So if a party put in evidence in support of his title documents proved to be forged but the other evidence adduced by him is not impeached the Court in rejecting the forged documents will take the unimpeached evidence into consideration, and if satisfied adjudge thereon. Sitaji v Chinna, 10 M I A 181. Pattabhiramier v Venkatarou 7 B L R 142, Koonjo Beharee v Roy Mothoora 1 W R 155. Bengal Indigo Co v Tannee 3 W R (Act X) 149. Ailishina v Bu Chandra 3 B L R (P C) 13=12 W R (P C) 21 (94). So a defence is not to be entirely disbelieved because false evidence may have been fabricated to meet a false claim if the residue of the evidence is trustworthy and sufficient to destroy the claim. Hise v Sundooloomissa, 11 M I A 177-7 W R (P C) 13, Steeaman Chandra v Gopaul Chunder, 11 M I A 28. Muthun Bibee v Bussee Khan, 11 M I A 213. Maharajah Royender v Sheopursun 10 M I A 438. So the doctrine "falsus in uno falsus in omnibus" in this country affords a test of little or no value for it is to be feared that there is almost always a fringe of embroidery to a story however true in the main. Hanmantoo v Secretary of State 25 B 287 at p 277. Therefore the Court should bear in mind that the use of fabricated written evidence by a party however clearly established does not relieve the Court from the duty of examining the whole of the evidence adduced on both sides, and of deciding according to the truth the matters in issue. The parties using such evidence may have brought himself within the penalties of the criminal law but the Court should not in a civil suit inflict a punishment under the name of a presumption. Forgery or fraud in some material part of the evidence if it is shown to be the contrivance of a party to the proceeding may afford a fair presumption against the whole of the evidence adduced by that party or at least against such portion of that evidence as tends to the same conclusion with the fabricated evidence. It may perhaps also have the further effect of giving a more ready admission for the evidence of his opponents. But the presumption should not be pressed too far especially in this country where it happens not uncommonly that falsehood and fabrication are employed to support a just cause. Goribulla kaee v Coorodas Roy 2 W R (Act X) 99. See also Ramsuar v Bharat 4 C W N 18 P C. Casper v Kedarnath, 5 C W N 878 (861).

Uncontradicted testimony. Boiswell quotes Dr Johnson as saying that "he who tells nothing exceeding the bounds of probability has a right to demand that they should believe him who cannot contradict him" Bosuell's Life of Johnson. "If witnesses come unimpeached in point of general integrity," said Lord Stowell, "if any depose with character of firmness in their particular narrations the facts must be received, or there is an end of all judicial inquiry." Human prudence has done its utmost, has done all that it is capable of doing in giving every security that can be afforded to individuals. Ethies v Ethies 1 Hig Cons 269, 287. Dr Lushington laid it down as the "strict line of all judicial proceeding namely to credit the evidence of respectable persons unless they are contradicted or unless there is something in their testimony to excite a suspicion of the fidelity with which they have deposed." Collett v Collett 1 Curt Dec 678. The rights of the people would have no safeguard, and the Courts of Justice would afford no forum for the redress of wrongs, if the unimpeached and uncontradicted testimony of a witness can be overthrown without reason. Per Gundersleete J in Lewis v New York City R Co 50 Misc (N Y) 53. So "if the tribunal is permitted to discredit or disregard such testimony, there is no safety in the administration of justice and parties might just as well let the result of a litigation abide the cast of a die or a game of chance." Seibert v Erie R Co 49 Burh (N Y) 583 586. It is a "well settled principle of law which is absolutely essential to the security of individual rights that a witness who is unimpeached or uncontradicted must be believed." Barculo I in Roberts v Gee 15 Barb (N Y) 449 452. "That, when nothing appears to the contrary, the presumption is to be indulged that an unimpeached witness has testified truly may be laid down as a principle derived from the experience and knowledge of mankind" said Judge Boggs of the Illinois Supreme Court in Hauser v People, 210 Ill 253 (Am). In a criminal case triable by a jury the Judge instructed the jury thus: "The witness is unimpeached and uncontradicted and if you think his statement consistent and rational, he is entitled to credit. You have no right to reject what he says as untrue by assuming the existence of some unproved hypothesis or upon any imaginary surmise that by possibility he may be mistaken or untruthful. You may criticize and weigh the testimony as carefully as possible, but when this duty is performed, if it would obtain your credence in the ordinary affairs of life, you have no right arbitrarily and without reason to say you will disregard it." U S v Harbison, 13 Int Rev 118.

Disinterested witness "A witness of depraved and abandoned character may not be unworthy of credit, where it appears that there is not the slightest motive or inducement for misrepresentation, for there is a natural tendency to declare the truth, which is never wholly eradicated, even from the most vicious minds, and the danger of detection, and the risk of temporal punishment may operate as restraints upon the most unprincipled even where motives for veracity of a higher nature are wanting." Starke Ex 821. So it is undoubtedly a general rule that when a disinterested witness who is in no way discredited testifies to a fact within his own knowledge, which is not of itself improbable or in conflict with other evidence, the witness is to be believed, and the fact is to be taken as legally established so that it can not be disregarded by Court or jury. Katanogh v Wilson, 70 N Y 177, 179 (Im).

Discrepancies between witnesses "The usual character of human testimony is substantial truth—under circumstantial variety," says Dr Paley Starke Ex 511 (Note). The attention of one witness being directed to one part or position of the subject of inquiry, and of another witness to a different point of view of the same thing, or a witness giving different degrees of attention to a single incident Courts expect that there will be a difference at least in the minutiae of their testimonies, and such divergencies constitute no reasonable basis for discrediting their united testimony to the important facts, but tend rather to enhance the credit of the witnesses. Moore on Facts § 724. See also Haranawi v Ramgopal, 27 C 639 (P C) = 1 C W N 429 = 2 Bom L R 562. No two witnesses—and Mr Justice Van Burnt of the New York Supreme Court in In re Lyddy 5 N Y Supp 636 (638) "ever described a series of events culminating in the execution of a paper, or in any other fact or incident, that ever agreed in their description of the attending circumstances. So substantial agreement is all that is required." Aana Aarain v Huree Pantoe, Marshall 436.

- S 59 (P. C.). It is to be expected that what was done and said in an excited state will be differently stated by different witnesses. Seldom do witnesses exactly convey what they hear or remember, all that was said or received precisely as it came from what they heard and frequently disagree in their recollection of date or of the time of day and in their estimates of short periods of time. More v. Fyfe 839. Remote facts of the transaction to which they are called to testify without in itself to account for no inconsiderable degree of inaccuracy of recollection. Leavesy v. Knight, 1 Add. 1001 229, 230. Hubert v. Ward 1 H. & L. 213 (231). Williams v. Gould, 1 Hag. 100. 671. The Leatherstocking 1 H. & Adm. 181 190. So too, a witness who is taken before the fact may very well speak with greater certainty and accuracy as to the fact than other witnesses who testify at a much later time. In Jephson v. Stables 180 186. Discrepancies will always occur in the testimony of the witnesses when cross-examined to a then and minute statement of circumstances." Furness v. Hand, 1 Will. 1r 88 (101).

of what they relate" Per Solicitor General Sir Robert Gifford, arguendo in 32 How St Tr 573 But to such an argument an Indian Court observed "No doubt, it may be contended that if the so witnesses were tutored ones, care would have been taken to see that they should tell the same story. But care is not always taken, or effectually taken in such cases and discrepancies are not less infirmative of the testimony, because a greater sagacity on the part of the witnesses would have avoided them. Queen v Kahu Patil, 11 B H C R 146 This argument was also met by Judge Tool of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick thus. It may be argued that this shows there was no pre concert between the parties as to what they should tell. In my opinion it proves nothing of the kind. For if it were possible to believe that this story was manufactured it would equally be easy to believe that it was agreed that each witness should vary the account in order to avoid suspicion. Conny v Caraque, R Co, 29 N Buns 42, 436

Sometimes however discrepancies are so startling, as to make it impossible to attribute them to the ordinary sources of inattention or want of memory. Moore on Facts § 724 It is a safe observation of Sir John Nichol that corrupt witnesses may preconcert leading circumstances of a transaction, and that where a conspiracy to commit perjury exists it will more probably and more decidedly be detected upon some broad collateral fact than upon the transaction itself. Hydges v King 1 Hag Ec 256

if it refers to a fact which could be seen, it must be the evidence of a witness who says he saw it, if it refers to a fact which could be heard, it must be the evidence of a witness who says he heard it, if it refers to a fact which could be perceived by any other sense or in any other manner, it must be the evidence of a witness who says he perceived it by that sense or in that manner, if it refers to an opinion or to the grounds on which that opinion is held, it must be the evidence of the person who holds that opinion on those grounds

Provided that the opinions of experts expressed in any treatise commonly offered for sale, and the grounds on which such opinions are held, may be proved by the production of such treatise if the author is dead or cannot be found, or has become incapable of giving evidence, or cannot be called as a witness without an amount of delay or expense which the Court regards as unreasonable

Provided also that, if oral evidence refers to the existence of condition of any material thing other than a document, the Court may, if it thinks fit, require the production of such material thing for its inspection

Principle The first degree of moral evidence and that which is most satisfactory to the mind, is afforded by our own senses, this being the direct evidence of the highest nature. Where this cannot be had as is generally the case in the proof of facts by oral testimony, the law requires the next best evidence namely, the testimony of those who can speak from their own personal knowledge. It is not requisite that the witness should have personal knowledge of the main fact in controversy for this may not be provable by direct testimony but only by inference from other facts shown to exist. But it is requisite that, whatever facts the witness may speak to he should be confined to those lying in his own knowledge, whether they be things said or done and should not testify from information given by others—however worthy of credit they may be. For it is found indispensable, as a test of truth and to the proper administration of justice, that every living witness should if possible be subjected to the ordeal of cross examination, that it may appear what were his powers of perception his opportunities for observation his attentiveness in observing the strength of his recollection and his disposition to speak the truth. But testimony from the relation of third persons even where the information is known cannot be objected to this test nor is it often possible to ascertain through whom, or how many persons the narrative has been transmitted from original witness of the fact. Green v Evans 98 "The administration of an oath furnishes some guarantee for the sincerity of the opinion and the power of cross-examination gives an opportunity of testing the foundation and the value of it." Per Colman J in Wright v Tatham 7 Ad & E 313=5 Cl & F 689 "It is a general principle in the law of evidence that hearsay from a person not a party to the suit is not admissible, because such person was not under oath and the opposite party had no opportunity to cross examine." Swift v J in Chapman v Chapman 2 Conn 348 Gresham Hotel Co v Manning Ir R 1 C L 192, 193 notes under § 32 pp 464—467 supra

Hearsay evidence, meaning of—and why it is discarded. The term 'hearsay' is used with reference to that which is written, as well as that which is spoken and, in its legal sense it denotes that kind of evidence which does not derive its value solely from the credit to be given to the witness himself but rests also, in part on the competency of some other person. Hearsay evidence, as thus described is uniformly held incompetent to establish any specific fact, which, in its nature, is susceptible of being proved by witnesses who can speak from their own knowledge. That this species of testimony supposes something better which might be adduced in the particular case is not the sole ground of its exclusion. Its extrinsic weaknesses its incompetency to satisfy the mind as to the existence of the fact, and the frauds which may be practised under its cover, combine to support the rule that hearsay evidence is totally inadmissible. Per Marshall C J in Mima Queen v Hepburn 1 Cranch 290, 295 296 Davis v Wood 1 Wheat 68 R v Fiswell 3 T R 111 Subject to these qualifications and seeming exceptions the general rule of law rejects all hearsay reports of transactions whether verbal or written given by persons not produced as witnesses. The principle of this rule is, that such evidence requires credit to be given to a statement made by a person who is not subjected to the ordinary tests enjoined by the law for ascertaining the correctness and completeness of his testimony namely that oral testimony should be delivered in the presence of the Court or a Magistrate under the moral and legal sanction of an oath and where the moral and intellectual character, the motives and deportment of the witness can be examined and his capacity and opportunities for observation and his memory can be tested by a cross-examination. Such evidence, moreover as to oral declarations, is very liable to be fallacious, and its value is therefore greatly lessened by the probability that the declaration was imperfectly heard or was misunderstood or is not accurately remembered or has been perverted. It is also to be observed, that the person communicating such evidence are not exposed to the danger of a prosecution for perjury in which something more than the testimony of one witness is necessary in order to a conviction for where the declaration or statement is sworn to have been made when no third person was present, or by a person who is since dead it is hardly possible to punish the witness even if his testimony is an entire fabrication. Id est in on Ford 2 F 1 Phill F 205, 206 To the Court may be added considerations of public interest and convenience for setting hearsay evidence. The greatly increased expense and the vexation which the adverse party must incur in order to rebut or explain it the vast consumption of public time thereby occasioned the multiplication of collateral issues tried by the jury and the danger of losing sight of the main question at issue of the case if this sort of proof were admitted are considerations of too grave a character to be overlooked by the Court or the Legislature in determining the question of changing the rule. Mima Queen v Hepburn 1 Cranch 290 295 per Marshall C J Green v Evans § 98 (11)

Oath One of the objections against Hearsay evidence is that it is not given on oath by the person who has got personal knowledge of a fact. But the utility of oaths in any shape has been strongly questioned. Bentley Jud. Ev. Bk 2, ch 6. The good man, it is sometimes said, will speak the truth without an oath, while the bad man recoils at its obligation. To this the following answer has been given: 'It must be owned great number will speak truth without an oath and too many will not speak it without one. But the generality of mankind are of a middle sort—neither so virtuous as to be safely trusted in cases of importance on their bare word, nor yet so abandoned as to violate a more solemn engagement. Accordingly we find by experience that many will boldly say what they will by no means adventure to swear, and the difference which they make between these two things is often indeed much greater than they should, but still it shows the need of insisting on the strongest security. When once men are under the awful tie and as the scripture phrase has it, have bound their souls with a bond (Numb. XXX, 2), it composes their passions counterbalances their prejudices and interest—makes them unmindful of what they promise and careful what they assert, puts them upon exactness in every circumstances, and circumstances are often very material things. Even the good might be too negligent, and the bad would frequently have no concern at all, about their words if it were not for the solemnity of this religious act.' Archbishop Secker as cited in Ram on Facts Best Ev. § 59.

Cross examination and confrontation Another essential requirement of the Hearsay rule as just examined, is that statements offered testimonially must be subjected to cross examination. But a process commonly spoken of as confrontation is also often referred to as in addition and accompanying test or as the sole test. The main purpose of confrontation is for facilitating cross-examination. But it also involves a subordinate and incidental advantage, namely the observation by the tribunal of the demeanour of the witness on the stand as a minor means of judging the value of his testimony. But this minor advantage is not regarded as essential; it may be dispensed with when it is not feasible. Cross examination however, the essential object of confrontation remains indispensable. It is enough to note here that, so far as confrontation is an indispensable element of the Hearsay Rule it is merely another name for the opportunity of cross examination. Wigmore § 1365. The policy of the Anglo-Indian system of Evidence has been to regard the necessity of testing by cross examination as a vital feature of the law. The belief that no safe guard for testing the value of human statements is comparable to that furnished by cross examination, and the conviction that no statements (unless by special exception) should be used as testimony until it has been proved and supplemented by that test, has found increasing strength in lengthening experience. Not even the abuses, the mishandlings, and the puerilities which are so often found associated with cross examination have availed to nullify its value. It is beyond any doubt the greatest legal engine ever invented for the discovery of truth. A lawyer can do anything with cross examination,—if he is skillful enough not to impale his own cause upon it. Wigmore § 1367.

Scope of the section The expression 'it must be evidence' in paras 2, 3 and 4 of the section means 'the oral evidence must be evidence'. Whitley Stokes Vol II p 889. So also the word 'it' after the words 'saw', 'heard' or 'perceived' in paras 2, 3 and 4 respectively means the 'fact deposed to'. Neellanto v Juggobandhu 12 B L R App 18 (19). Whitley Stokes Vol II p 889. The first four paragraphs of this section have been supposed to have been intended to exclude that kind of evidence which is called 'hearsay'. Varley v. E. p 52. The effect of the section is subject to the proviso to exclude opinions given at second hand. Cum. Ev. 11th Ed p 146. The word 'must' in paragraph (1) imposes a duty on the Court to exclude all oral evidence that is not direct whether the party against whom it is tendered objects or not. Whitley Stokes Vol II p 889. The three first cases put refer to fact, the fourth to evidence of opinion, as for instance evidence of experts under section 45 or of any of the classes of witnesses under section 46. As a general rule witnesses it will be remembered, in their examination in chief must confine their statements to

S 60. facts within their own knowledge There are certain exceptional matters as to which they are allowed to express their opinion See ante The competency of the witness as to the three first cases is to necessitate the production, as a witness, of the only person who (a) saw (b) heard (c) touched, tested or smelt the fact as to which the evidence is required The evidence in other words must be immediate It may not be delivered through a medium immediate, second hand or so use the exploded technical language, but direct A who saw, heard, etc., must be produced The fact cannot be proved through the medium of B who did not see himself etc but is prepared to swear that A told him that he had seen heard, etc So with respect to the fourth case, opinion evidence, when such is admissible this section necessitates the production of the witness who holds the opinion it excludes the evidence of any witness who can merely say that he has heard another express such opinion Scott v. P. p 240 This section says that evidence must be direct Kalathur v. Ma. M. S. Bar. L. J. 172=2 Lang. 1st Hearsay evidence is inadmissible to prove a fact which is deposited to on fear or but it does not necessarily preclude evidence as to a statement having been made upon which certain action was taken or certain results followed Cent. v. Aramanga v. Appalachenayulu, 97 Ind. Cas 785=24 L. W. 227=A I P. 1926 Mad 1903 Even if newspapers are admissible in evidence without formal proof the paper itself is not proof of its contents It would merely amount to an anonymous statement Bawa Saur v. Emperor 7 Ind. L. J. 261=68 Ind. Cas 22=26 Cr. L. J. 1978=26 P. L. R. 566=A I R. 1925 Ind 209

Evidence of a person who saw it or heard it "The witness must say what he has seen and heard he was an 'oyant et vaillant' Thayer Pre. Ev. 724 Thus a favourite phrase found in several works in the 17th century It seems agreed that what another has been heard to say is no evidence because the party was not on oath also because the party who is affected thereby has not an opportunity of cross-examining Baron's Indigmt. Ev., Hawkins Pl. Cr. II, 96, B II, C-46 s 44 Craig v. Inglesca, 17 How. St. Tr. 1160, Gr. v. El. s 99(a) So Woburn C. J. explained the Hearsay rule as the general rule of not receiving evidence unless upon oath and without the opportunity for cross-examination Doe v. Ridgway 4 B. & Ald. 34 So "the general rule is that one person cannot be proved to testify as to what another person has declared in relation to a fact within his knowledge as bearing in the issue It is the fundamental rule which excludes hearsay The reasons are obvious and they are two first because the ascertaining of facts does not come to the jury sanctioned by the oath on whose knowledge it is supposed to rest and, secondly, because the party upon whose interests it is brought to bear has no opportunity to cross-examine him on who is supposed knowledge and veracity the truth of the fact depends Per Shaw C. J. in Warren v. Nichols, 6 Mete 261 The rule is thus stated by Ken. C. J. in Coleman v. Southwick, 9 John 29 Why not produce S to testify what he told the defendant instead of resorting to a bystander who heard what he said Hearsay testimony is from the very nature of it attended with all such doubts and difficulties and it cannot enter them up A person who relates a hearsay is not obliged to enter into any particulars to answer any questions to solve any difficulties to reconcile any contradictions to explain any obscurities to recover any ambiguity He entrenches himself in the simple assertion that he was told so and he is the entire burden on his dead or absent author The plaintiff by means of this piece of evidence would be taken by surprise and be precluded from the benefit of a cross-examination of S as to all those material points which have been a tested necessity to throw full light on his information' Hignmore s 126 So hearsay evidence is not receivable when there is better evidence Pagnan v. Oliva 7 W. R. Act X. Rul 30 It is not intended by this section to exclude circumstantial evidence of things which can be seen heard or felt Ver. Kan. v. Lant v. Juggobunthoo Ghosh 12 B. L. R. App 18 This rule is applied to testimonial assertions only It happens in many cases that the very fact in controversy is whether such things were written or spoken and not whether they were true In such cases it is obvious that the writings or words are not within the meaning of hearsay but are original or independent facts admissible in proof of a fact When the assertion of A that fact X exists is offered for the purpose of inducing the tribunal to believe that fact X exists because A says that it does. A's utterance is offered testimonially, i.e. as if A were a witness to fact X, and the hearsay rule here requires that A's assertion, to be receivable, must be under oath and subject to cross examination. But if A's assertion is offered not as evidence that the fact asserted in it exists—or, as is sometimes and less accurately said, irrefragative of the truth of the assertion,—but in some other aspect—for example, as showing that B heard what A said, or as being a part of a contradictory set—then it is not obnoxious to the Hearsay rule and stands or falls according to such other evidential rules as may affect it. Greene v. Evans § 100. But so far as testimonial assertions are concerned, “all facts except the contents of documents may be proved by oral evidence” which must in all cases be direct. That is, it must consist of a declaration by the witness that he perceived by his own senses the fact to which he testified. Steph. Intro. § 144. If therefore A a witness had been told something by B and A were asked what B had told him, the evidence of A would refer to a fact which could be heard and A is a witness who says he heard it; this section, therefore, would not exclude it. Martby v. Evans p. 52. A statement made by an accused person immediately after a murder of what the deceased told him is relevant as showing his state of mind, but to amount to proof of what the deceased said it must be the evidence of a witness who says he heard it. Kakar Singh v. Emperor 25 Cr. L. J. 1005=81 Ind. Cis. 717=1924 Lah. 733. Section 60 of the Evidence Act says that oral evidence must in all cases be direct. If a person by merely seeing a document possibly a document in a language which he does not understand, or possibly a document which he is unable to read being illiterate deposes to the contents of the document merely from what other people have told him about it he is giving hearsay evidence. The man who reads out the document to him would certainly be entitled to give evidence of its contents. But another person who repeats what is read out to him is giving hearsay evidence of what would be legitimate secondary evidence were it before the Court. Kalender Ammal v. Ma. Vi. 84 Ind. Cis. 175=3 Bur. L. J. 172=A. I. R. 1924 Bang. 363. Evidence of rumour, reports and information given is mere hearsay evidence and as such wholly inadmissible as evidence of general repute. Aga v. Crown 1 B. L. R. 7. The admission of hearsay evidence is prohibited. Queen v. Kali 7 W. R. Cr. 2, Rajoni v. Asan 2 C. W. N. 672, Queen v. Pitambur 7 W. R. Cr. 25, Amari Ali v. King Emperor, 13 O. C. 309=8 Ind. Cis. 379=11 Cr. L. J. 631, Queen Empress v. Aga Tah, L. B. R. (1872-1892) 350, Queen Empress v. Tiju Bhai, 1 Bom. L. R. 433, In re Kathilunga 2 Weir 762. In order to convict a person under s. 498 I. P. C. mere statements of witnesses that the complainant and his wife lived as husband and wife are not sufficient, it is necessary that the facts constituting a valid marriage should be proved in accordance with s. 60 of the Evidence Act. Empress v. Arshed Ali 13 C. L. R. 125.

When opinion is admissible. It is admissible evidence for a witness to give his opinion on the existence of a family custom and to state his grounds of that opinion information derived from deceased persons. But it must be the expression of independent opinion based on hearsay and not mere repetition of hearsay. Ganuvudhioja v. Suparamdhioja 23 A. 37=5 C. W. N. 33. I. P. C. A person holding the opinion must be called because no one can know that except the person himself and those whom he has informed of it. Martby v. Evans p. 13. So when opinion evidence is admissible the witness who holds the opinion must be produced. A witness cannot be allowed to say that he has heard another express such an opinion. Nort v. F. 240.

Proviso I. There is no provision under which the opinion of a dead expert can be given in evidence (vide s. 32). According to English law, medical and other treatises are not evidence whether the author be dead or alive. Collier v. Simpson, 3 C. & P. 71. Section 45 refers apparently to living witnesses. This novel section however makes any book of science published for sale evidence if the author be dead or under any of the circumstances specified in section 32 which render his production impossible or impracticable. Nort v. F.

210 It must be remembered in regard to foreign law that by s 38 certain books are always admissible. Malby J 73 Under the provisions of the penultimate paragraph of s 17 and of the first proviso of s 60 of the Evidence Act Jaylton Medical Jurisprudence may be referred to Hutton v Impres, 12 C L R 86 Hurry (Hunn v Impres) 10 C 113, see also Hone v Hone, 23 M L J 591 (1 B) Granade v Com of Calcutta 22 C W N 745 = 28 C L J 37 = 45 Ind Crs 93 But in all cases such reference is not allowable Empress v Panna 24 C W N 179 So the obligation of the Court to allow pictures to be read from treatises is since the passing of the Act, unquestionable, provided (1) that the opinion is that of an expert, (2) that the treatise be one commonly offered for sale, and (3) that the writer cannot be produced without unreasonable delay or expense Cum Fi 215

Proviso II Proviso 2 relates to those cases in which secondary evidence is permitted to be given on account of the great inconvenience or impracticability of producing the original. Thus inscriptions on walls, monuments, surveys, marks and the like are proved by copies or oral testimony. Mortimer v Meallan, 6 M & W 68 see also Coblen v Bolton, 2 Camp 108, R v Fenny 6 C & P 359 Doe v Cole 6 C & P 349, Isidore v Stephens 8 C & P 724 Seyler v Glossop 21 Ch 109 411, Jones v Sarllon 9 M & W 65 But productions should not be required where the written characters exist on one thing so firmly fixed to the reality that its removal for production would be impracticable under the circumstances. Wignore § 1214 But when it is removable it ought to be produced if the Court desires its production. R v Edy 11 M L J 212 In Jones v Sarllon 9 M & W 65 = 1 Dowl Pr N S 674 production is required of a notice in a carrier's office painted on a board fastened by a string to a nail. In that case Parle B laid down the law thus: "The exceptions (cover things) not easily removed as in the case of things fixed in ground or to the free hold for the law does not expect a man to break up his free hold for the purpose of a notice into Court." Wignore § 1214 So power is given to the Court to call for original if the removal of the thing is not a physical impossibility. Nort El 240

OF DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE

Documentary evidence There is practically no controversy as to the meaning of the word document, because a definition of the term is given in the Act (vide s 3 supra). Stephen defines documentary evidence as "document produced for the inspection of the Court or the Judge." Steph on Ev Art 1 Documents being inanimate things, necessarily come to the cognizance of the tribunals through the medium of human testimony, for which reason some old authors have denominated them dead proofs (probatio mortua), in contradistinction to witnesses who are said to be living proofs (probatio viva). Best F 1 § 216 The superiority in performance and in many respects in trustworthiness of written over verbal proofs must have been noticed from the earliest time for audita peit littera scripta manet. The false relations of what never took place and even in case of real transactions the decayed memories the imperfect recollections and wilful misrepresentations of witnesses added to the certainty of the extinction sooner or later of primary source of evidence by their death—will show the wisdom of providing some better or at least more lasting mode of proof for matters which are susceptible of it and are in themselves of sufficient consequence to overbalance the trouble and expense of its attainment. Best F 1 § 60 I would sooner trust the smallest slip of paper than the strongest Georgia v Miller v Cotten 5 G 1 341 (319) (1st) "for truth than the strength of men as to facts is not satisfying to the mind as a writing, in an investigation involving past events." Per Bell J in Hutton v Parler, 42 Iowa 38. In Bouariatal v Maharajah Itwarum Singh 7 M L A 148 at p 156, Dr Fuchung observed: "It has been also said that this defence stands exclusively upon oral evidence and though to a considerable degree that observation may be true, yet it cannot be received to the full extent to which it has been urged. The defence in this case does, it must be admitted, depend upon proof of a given instrument, but, there is a clear distinction and not an unimportant one between pleading a written instrument, as in answer to a demand, and the setting up a defence founded exclusively upon oral evidence, for instance, if the defence were adoption, where there was no written record of the transaction, and the fact was to be established merely by the evidence of witnesses who swear they were present at it, might be liable to all the imputations which are in these cases cast upon it, but where the defence is rested upon a written document as a release there is an essential difference, for its genuineness on the contrary may be shewn by many facts and circumstances very different from mere oral evidence, and, moreover, the witnesses who are to prove a written document cannot resort to that latitude of statement which affords such opportunity of fabrication to purely oral evidence. Oral testimony, depending on the memory of witnesses, is not a reliable as written or documentary evidence. Per Orton C J in Thomas v Paul 87 Wis 607 (Am). Recollections are sometimes dim, and impressions deceitful and illusory but written words stand and speak a uniform language and as such documentary evidence is more reliable than oral evidence. Per Chancellor Kent in Hart v Ten Eyck, 2 Johns Ch (N Y) 82. So where there is a direct conflict in the oral testimony, documentary evidence such as the correspondence between the parties becomes of paramount importance, if pertinent it should be regarded as controlling and in every way more satisfactory and convincing than the recollection of witnesses as to conversations which occurred a long time before. J S Toppin Co v M C Laughlin, 120 Fed Rep 705, 706 (Am).

Three distinct questions with regard to documentary evidence. There are three distinct questions which are dealt with in the Act in regard to that kind of evidence which is called documentary. First there is the question how the contents of the documents are to be proved. Secondly there is the question how the document is to be proved to be genuine. Thirdly there is the question how far and in what cases oral evidence is excluded by documentary evidence. The first question is that dealt with in these sections, but the matter is also affected by s 59 and also by s 22. Taking s 59 with ss 61 and 64, the result may be stated as follows—The contents of a document must in general be proved by a special kind of evidence called, 'primary evidence' but there are exceptional cases in which it may be proved otherwise. Evidence used to prove the contents of a document which is not 'primary', is called secondary. Martby Fd pp 56, 57.

Proof of contents of documents

61 The contents of documents may be proved either by primary or by secondary evidence

Primary evidence

62 Primary evidence means the document itself produced for the inspection of the Court

Explanation 1—Where a document is executed in several parts, each part is primary evidence of the document

Where a document is executed in counterpart, each counterpart being executed by one or some of the parties only, each counterpart is primary evidence as against the parties executing it

Explanation 2—Where a number of documents are all made by one uniform process, as in the case of printing lithography, or photography, each is primary evidence of the contents of the rest, but where they are all copies of a common original, they are not primary evidence of the contents of the original

Illustration

A person is shown to have been in possession of a number of plates, & printed at one time from one original. Any one of the plates is primary evidence of the contents of any other but no one of them is primary evidence of the contents of the original.

Secondary evidence 63 Secondary evidence means and includes—

- (1) certified copies given under the provisions hereinafter contained,*
- (2) copies made from the original by mechanical process which in themselves insure the accuracy of the copy, and copies compared with such copies,
- (3) copies made from or compared with the original
- (4) counterparts of documents as against the parties who did not execute them,
- (5) oral accounts of the contents of a document given by some person who has himself seen it

Illustrations

(a) A photograph of an original is secondary evidence of its contents though the two have not been compared, if it is proved that the thing photographed was the original

(b) A copy compared with a copy of a letter made by a copying machine is secondary evidence of the contents of the letter if it is shown that the copy made by the copying machine was made from the original

(c) A copy transcribed from a copy, but afterwards compared with the original, is secondary evidence, but the copy not so compared is not secondary evidence of the original although the copy from which it was transcribed was compared with the original

(d) Neither an oral account of a copy compared with the original, nor an oral account of a photograph or machine copy of the original, is secondary evidence of the original

Scope of the section 61. This section lays down that the content of documents may be proved either by primary or by secondary evidence, and I understand the rule to mean that there is no other method allowed by law for proving the contents of documents. Section 62 defines the meaning of primary evidence. s 63 describes what constitutes secondary evidence within the meaning of the Act. Per Mahmood J in Ram Prasad v Raghunandan Prasad, 7 A 38 (713). But this section must be read subject to the rule which exacts original and rejects derivative evidence and prescribes that no evidence shall be received which shows on its face that it only derives its force from some other which is withheld. See Part B in Doe d Welsh v Langfield 16 M & W 427. Doe d Gilbert v Ross 7 M & W 102, 106, Mardonell v Evans, 11 C B 930, apud per Maule J, Best Ev § 89. Ubius (or Sapius) est pectus fontes quam rivulus. (It is better to seek the fountains than to follow the rivulets). Cf Int 305 b, Best Ev § 89. The terms 'primary' and 'secondary' evidence are used by English law in the limited sense of the original and derivative evidence of written documents, the latter of which is receivable when, by credible testimony the existence of the primary source has been established and its absence explained. But derivative evidence of other forms of original evidence is in general rejected absolutely, as when supposed oral evidence is delivered through oral and through various sorts of evidence comprised in practice under the very inadequate phrase hearsay evidence Best § 89 All private documents must be produced, and the execution of them generally be proved, or their absence must be duly accounted for and their loss supplied by secondary evidence Greenl Et 558

Primary evidence Primary evidence is that which is called as the best evidence, or that kind of proof which, under any possible circumstances affords the greatest certainty of the fact in question and it is illustrated by the case of a written document the instrument itself being always regarded as the primary or best possible evidence of its existence and contents. If the execution of an instrument is to be proved the primary evidence is the testimony of the subscribing witnesses if there be one. Until it is shown that the production of the primary evidence is out of the party's power no other proof of the fact is in general admitted. All evidence falling short of this in its degree is termed secondary. The question, whether evidence is primary or secondary, has reference to the nature of the case in the abstract and not to the peculiar circumstances under which the party in the particular cause or trial may be placed. It is a distinction of law, and not of fact, referring only to the quality, and not to the strength of the proof. Evidence which carries on its face no indication that better remains behind is not secondary but primary. And though all information must be traced to its source if possible, yet if there are several distinct sources of information of the same fact, it is not ordinarily necessary to show that they have all been exhausted before secondary evidence can be resorted to Greenl Et § 54. According to the Indian Evidence Act primary evidence means the document produced for the inspection of the Court (s 62). Where a document is executed in counterpart, each counterpart being executed by one or some of the parties only, each counterpart is primary evidence as against the parties executing it, and secondary evidence as against the other parties (See s 61, cl 4) Whitely Stiles Anglo Ind Code Vol II p 290. The following definition of primary and secondary evidence is given by Lord Fries MR in Lucas v Williams (1892) 2 Q B 113 116 "Primary and 'secondary' evidence means this primary evidence is evidence which the law requires to be given first, secondary evidence is evidence which may be given in the absence of better evidence which the law requires to be given first when a proper explanation is given of the absence of that better evidence."

Secondary evidence Primary or best evidence is that which affords the greatest certainty of the fact in question, thus a deed or other written instrument is primary evidence of its contents. Secondary evidence is that which is inferior to primary evidence, and which upon its face shows that better evidence exists, thus a copy of a written instrument or the recollection of a witness as to its contents Burr Jones § 8 (e). "The distinction between the 'best evidence' rule is first required and the inferior evidence that is allowed when the best is unattainable has come to be designated (apparently through the current use of it by Mr Christian's Essays and Mr Best's treatise) by the terms primary and secondary evidence. These terms which are in themselves not without their own factory, are open to serious objections. One is that the rule requiring the production of documents is not a rule requiring evidence but a rule requiring the thing itself to any evidence about the thing, which is the primary evidence, in any significant sense and the term primary evidence is not the true nature of the rule's effect. The other objection is that the rule is understood to group together all rules exacting the production of evidence when it is available, it groups rules which are in themselves essentially distinct,—for the Hearsay rule and the Attestation rule and the Documentary Original rule cannot be thus united. The rule is also likely to be abandoned as more likely to confuse than to clarify the system of evidence. Hignett § 117."

Scope of section 62 Primary evidence is that which is called as the best evidence, or that kind of proof which, under any possible circumstances affords the greatest certainty of the fact in question and it is illustrated by the case of a written document the instrument itself being always regarded as the primary or best possible evidence of its existence and contents. If the execution of an instrument is to be proved the primary evidence is the testimony of the subscribing witnesses if there be one. Until it is shown that the production of the primary evidence is out of the party's power no other proof of the fact is in general admitted. All evidence falling short of this in its degree is termed secondary. The question, whether evidence is primary or secondary, has reference to the nature of the case in the abstract and not to the peculiar circumstances under which the party in the particular cause or trial may be placed. It is a distinction of law, and not of fact, referring only to the quality, and not to the strength of the proof. Evidence which carries on its face no indication that better remains behind is not secondary but primary. And though all information must be traced to its source if possible, yet if there are several distinct sources of information of the same fact, it is not ordinarily necessary to show that they have all been exhausted before secondary evidence can be resorted to Greenl Et § 54. According to the Indian Evidence Act primary evidence means the document produced for the inspection of the Court (s 62). Where a document is executed in counterpart, each counterpart being executed by one or some of the parties only, each counterpart is primary evidence as against the parties executing it, and secondary evidence as against the other parties (See s 61, cl 4) Whitely Stiles Anglo Ind Code Vol II p 290. The following definition of primary and secondary evidence is given by Lord Fries MR in Lucas v Williams (1892) 2 Q B 113 116 "Primary and 'secondary' evidence means this primary evidence is evidence which the law requires to be given first, secondary evidence is evidence which may be given in the absence of better evidence which the law requires to be given first when a proper explanation is given of the absence of that better evidence."

or multiplicate, each of these parts is the writing, because by act of the parties each is as much the legal act as another. It can make no difference that one party has signed only the document taken by the other, (as in the case of patta and labhiyat), except where it is desired to prove specifically the signature. I ignore § 1233. In Philpott v. Chmre, 2 Camp 110, Lord Ellenborough said: "If there are two contemporaneous writings, the counterparts of each other, one of which is delivered to the opposite party, and the other preserved, as they may both be considered as originals and they have equal claims to authenticity, the one which is preserved may be received in evidence, without notice to produce the one which was delivered. See also Dor v. Pulman (1842) 3 Q B 622, Colling v. Leavelle, 6 B & C 398, Roe v. Davis, 7 East 363. The earlier practice seems to have been to treat the counterpart of a deed as a copy or secondary as may be inferred from utterances of Best C J in Munn v. Godbold, 3 Binn 292. There the learned Judge said: "Where there are two instruments, executed in two parts of a deed, one of these parts is more authentic and satisfactory evidence of the contents of the other part than any other draft or copy. It is prepared with more care than the other copy, and the party who produces it and avows to whom it is used, by taking and keeping it as a part of the deed, admits its accuracy. The Courts have therefore always required that if one part of a deed be lost and another part be in existence it must be produced, but merely as secondary evidence of the part that was lost." I ignore § 1233, see also De v. Wainwright, 1 New & P 8, Burchell v. Clarke, 2 C P D 88, Mathews v. Smallwood (1910) 1 Ch 777. Formerly a deed was written on parchment commencing from the middle, the other part was written in a similar way, up and down from the middle. The two were then cut apart in a wavy line so that the two could at any time be identified by merely fitting them together. Hence the term indenture. In such a case each was a counterpart or original as the case might be, according to the form of its execution. Nord E. 74. In Ludlam's Will Lofft 362, Mansfield L C J said: "If you cannot prove a deed, by producing it you may produce the counterpart." Where it is the usage to make the document in duplicate or counterpart, the mortgagee taking one and the mortgagor the other, each part would be the primary evidence of the document and secondary evidence would not be admissible until the non-production of both parts has been accounted for. Manning In v. Ma Ayns U B R (1892 1896) Vol II, 234.

Explanation I The expressions executed "in parts and in counterpart" in section 62 refer to the mode in which documents are sometimes executed. It is convenient sometimes that each party to a transaction should have a complete document in his own possession. To effect this the document is written out as many times over as there are parties and each document is executed, signed or sealed as the case may be by all the parties. No one of these is more the original than the other, and any one of them may be produced as primary evidence of the contents of the document. Mans E. p 57

Explanation 2 to section 62 "A printed paper does not differ from a written one in respect to both being copies, they can alike, therefore, only be received as secondary evidence of the original under such circumstances as render secondary evidence admissible for instance if the original is shown to be lost or destroyed or to be in the possession of the opposite party, notice having been given to produce it. There is no guarantee for a printed copy being a truer copy than a written one indeed being a copy at all. R v. Hatton, 12 How St Tr 82, Nodinh v. Murray, 3 Cramp 228. But there is a far better guarantee for a number of printed paper struck off from the same machine at the same time being correct facsimiles of each other than of a number of written papers for here the draftsman or draftsmen may introduce difference impossible with the machine. In this case each machine made copy is accepted as primary evidence of all the others inter se (and not of the original from which they were copied), for instance, if it is desired to prove the publication of a libel in a newspaper any copy of the issue in which the libel appeared would be primary evidence of publication in all the other copies of that issue. But if it were necessary to prove the original libel from which the article was

Clause (1) The term "certified copies" has been defined in s 76 (copied mentions) in clause (3) are known in English law as examined or sworn copies. Every copy except those mentioned in cl (2) is in strictness an examined copy in the sense that the original and the copy have been examined or compared together by the witness, either in his own act of transcription or by taking some one's transcription and comparing it with the original. But the term examined copy has by tradition come to be associated with a copy made by a private person not the official custodian of the document. Then the terms examined or sworn are used for copies sworn to upon the stand, as correct, in distinction for certified attested or office copies i.e. copies made in the public office by the official custodian where the document is an official one. Higmore § 1273. So certified copies mean copies signed and certified as correct by officials having custody of the originals. They are allowed as evidence under ss 76 78 of the Evidence Act, and are used chiefly to prove entries in registers proceedings of corporations and companies, by laws and the like. Corkle Cas Ev 323. Certified copy of a Will is admissible in evidence, where the loss of the original evidence is proved. Pheli Kicherla v Theli Kicherla, 85 Ind Cis 294 = 4 I R 1925 Mid 347 = 47 M L J 906, Baya v Bhanuao, A I R 1924 Nag 23. So a certified copy of a document is sufficient secondary evidence of its existence, conditions and contents of it but not of its execution. Kaimullat v Gudari Kori 82 Ind Cis 306. A judgment turning upon the construction of a document in which there may be references to it, is not the secondary evidence of the contents of the document especially when it appears that it is itself based on secondary evidence of the document given by a party who had the original with him. Ilina Lal v Ganesh Prasad, 4 A 406 P C = 9 I A 64 = 11 C L R 109.

Clause (2) Letter press copies and photographs of writings are secondary evidence. In re Foster, 34 Mich 21. According to illustration (a) a photograph would be secondary evidence, 'provided that you can show that the original which you wish to prove was really photographed'. Nort Ex 21. Illustration (a) refers to the first portion of this clause and illustration (b) refers to the second portion. So under this clause a copy of such copy (compared) would be receivable as secondary evidence of the original and could not be rejected as a copy of a copy. Id illustration (b), Nort Ex 243. This clause is applicable to blue prints (Luchs etc vfg Co v Kithledge 242 Ill 59) as well as to carbon copies as it does not appear to be different kind of copy than that taken in the copying press. Burr Jones § 209. All that is required under this clause is that the copies must be made by some mechanical process which would ensure the accuracy of the copy. This accuracy is insured by printing lithography or photography. (Id Expt 2 of section 2). But an oral account of a photograph or machine copy of the original is not secondary evidence of the original. Illustration (d).

Clause (3) A copy merely as a piece of paper, has no standing as evidence. In order even to be termed copy it must have the support of a witness qualified to state that it represents the contents of the original document. Higmore § 174. A party who makes the copy can swear to its being a true copy. If he is not produced, then a witness must be produced who can swear to his own comparison or as sometimes two witnesses one of whom read the original with the other read the copy or the reverse. But it will save trouble to have the comparison made by one and the same person. Nort Ex 211. Illustration (c) Gilbert v L C O, Huang Po v He Shue 81 Ind Cis 373 = 2 R 397, Fai v Gao Kim 9 C 99. A copy in short is merely one mode of preventing the testimony of a witness. The witness therefore must be qualified and the general principle of witness qualifications has here certain applications. A general principle for witness qualification is that he must speak from personal observation of the event or thing to be testified to, and that there is no general witness qualification to his testimony, not on his own personal observation but on imagination or inference or the hearsay of others. It is this principle that a person who proposes to testify to the contents of a document either by copy or otherwise must have read it. Higmore § 174.

Peterborough v Mordaunt, 1 Mod 94, R v Hanorth, 4 C & P 254 256 "But a copy of a copy is no evidence, for the rule demands the best evidence that the nature of the thing admits and a copy of a copy cannot be the best evidence, for the further off a thing lies from the first original truth, so much the weaker must the evidence be" Gilbert Evidence 8, see also Ram Prasad v Raghu nandan, 7 A 738=5 A W N 160, Secretary of State v Manjeshwar, 28 M 257 Ibdul Ghami v Syed Ali, 54 Ind Crs 941=1 P L 1 47, Rajah Neelamund v Nuseeb, 6 W R 80 But certainly there is in the nature of a mediate copy nothing that makes it per se defective When paper A is copied into paper B and this paper into C the last is in theory as accurate a reproduction as B is There is merely the possibility that an error may have occurred in the second transcription but this possibility exists for the first also, there is merely a doubling of the total number of chances It must be concluded, then that the discrimination if any, against a mediate copy is rather in the nature of a rule of preference requiring first the use of an immediate copy, if one is available Wigmore § 1274 This view was adopted by Justice Story in Winn v Patterson 9 Ptt 663, 677 where he observed "The remaining question then, is whether the copy now produced was proper secondary proof, entitled by law to be admitted in evidence The argument is, that it is a copy of a copy, and so not admissible and the original record might have been produced in evidence We admit that the rule that a copy of a copy is not evidence, is correct in itself when properly understood and limited to its true sense The rule properly applies to cases where the copy, is taken from a copy, the original being still in existence and capable of being compared with it, for then it is second remove from the original, or where it is copy of a copy of a record the record being still in existence by law deemed as high as the original for then also it is a second remove from the record But it is quite a different question whether it applies to cases of secondary evidence where the original is lost or the record of it is not in law deemed as high evidence as the original, or where the copy of a copy is the highest proof in existence On this point we give no opinion, because this is not in our judgment the case of a mere copy of a copy verified as such, but it is the case of a second copy verified as a true copy of the original" Under section 57 of the Indian Registration Act, (XVI of 1908) all copies of entries given under that section and signed and sealed by the registering officer are admissible for the purpose of proving the contents of the original See also Baya v Bhamao, 78 Ind Crs 865=A I R 1924 Nag 375, Hurish v Perrett, 22 W R 303, Smart v Williams Comb 247 The reason for the exclusion of such evidence is thus stated in Stetson v Gulliver, 2 Cuh 424 425 "If the book of the register would be evidence, a certified copy of the same would have the same effect there being very little ground to apprehend that fraud and upon consideration of the great public inconvenience that would result from having the books of record removed from their proper place and place of security Wigmore § 1275

According to the orthodox English rule a copy of a copy is not a copy in evidence in as much as in the words of Abbott v Bannister 11 Q B 207 "the reception of secondary evidence if that were the case" This is the rule of the shade Everingham v Rundell 2 W & A 207 208 also Tillard v Shebbear 2 Will- 366, Laebman v Porter 1 B & A 207 208 209 follows the English rule in this respect Winn v Patterson 9 Ptt 663=1 P L T 47 So now a copy of a copy is not a copy in evidence for the contents of the original Winn v Patterson 9 Ptt 663=1 P L T 47 23 M 257 So since the passing of the Indian Registration Act, 1908 laid down in Unia Bahadur v Perrett 22 W R 303, Umaria 6 B L R 502 Wahur v Linga 14 M I A 453 Payabumbar v Unia Bahadur 22 W R 303 Field p 227 But a copy of a copy is not a copy in evidence for the parties Narasayya v Perrett 22 W R 303 Konehada v Velupula 14 M I A 453 Unia Bahadur v Perrett 22 W R 303 no objection is taken to the admission of a copy of a copy in evidence in an appellate Court Unia Bahadur v Perrett 22 W R 303

Lochan v Panth Harimath, 1 Pat 606, Chinnay v Dhankar, 11 B 20, Lal shuman v Imrit, 21 B 591, Ashori Lal v Ralhal Das, 31 C 100, Anant v Fatima, 14 Ind Cas 539=216 P W R 1912. A printed copy of the deposition of a party to the former suit made in English, which deposition came up to the Madras High Court in 1900 on appeal, is admissible in evidence. As it is the practice of the Madras High Court since 1900 after Government Pre took up the printing of the High Court papers that before giving the final order for striking off it would be compared with the original Ganapathi v Sakherayappa A I R 1929 Mad 187. Section 63, cl 3, second portion of the "copies compared with the original will cover this case if the printed copy was compared with the original deposition. See also Chandreshwar v Bishenari, A I R 1927 Pat 61 = 5 Pat 777.

Clause (4) Execution in counter part is a method of execution which is only adopted when there are two parties to the transaction Markby Et al. Where a document is executed in counter part, each party signing only the part by which he is bound each counter part is the best evidence against the party signing it and his privies [Roe v Davis 7 East 302, Loring v Wiltshire 13 Gray (Mass) 228, Colling v Frencel, 6 Barn & C 398, Brown v Woodman 6 Car & P 206. As to the other party it is only secondary evidence Munn v Godbold, 3 Bing 292=11 Moore 19=2 Car & P 97], and all duplicates must be accounted for before secondary evidence is admissible Burr Jones § 209. The rule that a counter part is primary evidence as against the parties executing it and secondary evidence as against the parties who did not execute it, has no application to the case where neither the letter nor the counterpart is complete in itself but supplements the other Baidya Nath v Kamini Kant, 6 C L J 512.

Clause (5) The oral account of the contents of a document given by some person who has merely seen it with his own eyes but is unable to read it is not secondary evidence of the document, the word "seen" in section 63(a) of the Evidence Act means something more than the mere sight of the document, and the clause contemplates the evidence of a person who having seen and examined the document is in a position to give direct evidence of the contents thereof. Ghore and others v Chatrapal Singh 12 A L J 239=23 Ind Cas 11. So where in order to prove a mortgage the only witness called was an illiterate person he cannot be deemed to be one who has seen the execution of the mortgage within section 63(5) of the Evidence Act Jani v Ram Ashori 66 Ind Cas 557=A I R 1922 All 232. In a subsequent Allahabad case it was also held that under this clause only a witness who has seen the document and who could have read the document in its original state is entitled to give oral evidence of it Ramji Das v Mihir Lal 71 Ind Cas 654=1923 A J 411. But in Pudai Singh v Brij Mangal, 73 Ind Cas 654 it was held that as regards the letting in of secondary evidence the word "seen" in section 63(5) includes also 'read over' in the case of a witness who is illiterate and as such cannot himself read it. If it is read over to him it will satisfy the requirements of the section. In Mihir Lal v Ramji Das, 80 Ind Cas 909=22 A L J 864, which was an appeal from Ramji Das v Mihir Lal 71 Ind Cas 654 the Court consisting of Walsh J C J and Sulciman J in reversing the decision of Daniels J said: 'The question is whether the Judge was entitled to hear and believe the witness's oral account of the contents of the document. The matter came before a Judge of this Court and in a very clear judgment he has held that the District Judge was not so entitled. He rightly says: Under sub section (5) of section 63, only a witness who has himself seen a document is entitled to give evidence of it' and he goes on to say: 'this clearly implies that it must be a witness who could read the document and he follows a decision of Mr Justice Tudball in the case of Ghore v Chatrapal Singh, supra. After hearing the matter very fully argued we have come to the conclusion with great respect to these two Judges and we are unable to agree. The critical words in the section are 'seen' it'. The result of the decision would be for example that a highly educated person knowing several languages except German, who had seen an original document in German which had been lost and who was interested in its contents and had had them translated to him by an equally highly educated person who knew German and explained to him phrase by phrase in such a way that the English translation of the German contents was imprinted on his memory, could not give the contents of that document in evidence under s 63 although he had undoubtedly seen the document. The question is, has the witness seen the document? The further question whether he is able to give evidence of its contents, is a question of his credibility. With great deference to the opinion of their Lordships, it is submitted that the oral evidence in such a case would violate the well known Hearsay Rule and is clearly inadmissible under section 60 of the Evidence Act. Section 63(5) of the Evidence Act does not over rule the general principle of law that hearsay evidence is ordinarily not admissible. The law says that if it is possible, the document itself must be produced. If the document itself is produced, there can be no possibility of a mistake with regard to its terms. If the document itself cannot be produced, then the law allows secondary evidence of its contents to be given. But it is to be noted that in all forms of secondary evidence allowed by s 63 only one possibility of a mistake exists. The first three sub-sections of s 63 refer to copies made from or compared with the original. In each of the three cases there is only one possibility of a mistake. The 4th sub-section refers to counterparts of documents as against parties who did not execute them. Originally speaking it would be assumed that counterparts of a document would be a copy of the original. Then we have sub-section (5) which says that a person who has seen a document may give his account of the contents of it. Here again there is only one possibility of mistake, namely that the person's memory may play false. It is quite clear that if a person has only seen a copy of a document, there are two chances altogether and therefore evidence given by him could be of a different category to the secondary evidence allowed by law and a person who has seen a copy of a document is not entitled to give secondary evidence of the contents of the original. Kalender v Meera Lebbai 3 Bui L J 172=84 Ind Cas 175=A I R 1924 Rang 363. This case was affirmed by the Privy Council in Ma Ma v Kalender Inmal, 31 C W N 621 (P C)=54 I A 61=25 A L J 65=5 Rang 18=100 Ind Cas 1=29 Bom L R 800. So the two later decisions of the Allahabad High Court reported in 22 A L J 864=80 Ind Cas 937=47 A L J 13 and 73 Ind Cas 651 are no longer good law. The phrase "oral accounts of the contents of a document by some person who has himself seen it" in this clause means oral evidence by some person who has seen those contents that is who had read the document. Evidence that the witness only saw the document and heard it read out by some one else is only hearsay so far as the contents are concerned and does not fulfil the requirements of section 60 as to oral evidence generally, viz., if it refers to a fact which could be seen, it must be evidence of a witness who says he saw it. The subject matter of a document is a fact which can be seen only by reading it. Idid, see also Ram Paray v Ram Raghur, 112 Ind Cas 310 Plap Li 511, Kanyatal v Pymabai 7 B 139. Statements of persons who merely heard judgment pronounced are not admissible in evidence. What is required is an oral account of the contents of the judgment or decree by some one who had read the one or the other. Maung Chai v Maung Tha, A I R 1923 Rang 113. A statement made by a party or his authorized agent in a previous suit, in which he refers to a document which is against his interest is secondary evidence of that document. Rati Pal v Pdar Bhan, 53 Ind Cas 667. A translation of a document is not secondary evidence. Ambalavana, v Kupparchu 4 L W 330=35 Ind Cas 20. Where in prior proceedings between the parties one of them admitted the existence and contents of a mortgage deed, such admission constituted a good secondary evidence within the meaning of this clause. Bahadur v Madho, 36 Ind Cas 696. An objection to the admission of secondary evidence, if not raised at the time it is admitted cannot be allowed to be raised in special appeal. Where the plaintiff attempted to prove the contents of certain documents by oral evidence, but the evidence fell short of what is required under s 63 of the Evidence Act, only because the witness was not properly questioned it would be unjust to visit the plaintiff with the penalty of the dismissal of his claim, simply on account of the inefficiency of the legal adviser who conducted the case. Lochan Singh v Hit Narain, 24 W R 232. jamabandi, the original of which was not produced and which was not exhibited in evidence cannot be treated as secondary evidence of the contents of the jamabandi statement under cl (5) of s 63 or under any other section of the Evidence Act. Surendra Nath v Kamalhya Naram, A I R 1930 P C 4. Oral evidence cannot be substituted for any writing, the existence of the content of which is disputed, and which is material to the issue between the parties and is not merely the memorandum of some other fact. Thus, a witness cannot be asked whether certain resolutions were published in the news papers (R v O Connell, Arm & T 163), neither can he be questioned as to the content of his account books, but in both these cases the papers and the books, as being the best evidence must be produced. Taylor § 400, see also Bonnyry v Sutanath 24 Bom I R P C 565.

No preference as regards any kind of secondary evidence. "Another general rule says Mr Taylor 'which governs the production of secondary evidence whether of documents or of oral testimony, is, that the law recognizes no degrees in the various kinds of such evidence. Doe v Ross, 7 M & W 102, Hall v Ball, 10 L J C P 285, Brown v Woodman, 6 C & P 206, Jeans v Heedon, 2 M & Rob 486" Taylor Et § 550. In Doe v Ross 7 M & W 102, the question was whether an attested copy of a deed was preferred to the testimony of one who had read it. In answering the question in the negative, Lord Abinger, L C B said "Upon examination of the cases and upon principle, we think there are no degrees of secondary evidence. The rule is that if you cannot produce the original you may give parol evidence of its contents. If indeed the party giving such parol evidence appears to have better secondary evidence in his power which he does not produce, this is a fact to go to the jury from which they might sometimes presume that the evidence kept back would be adverse to the party withholding it. But the law makes no distinction between one class of secondary evidence and another." In the same case Wilkinson B said "The objection (to secondary evidence) must arise from the nature of the evidence itself. If you produce a copy, which shows that there was an original, or if you give parol evidence of the contents of a deed, the evidence itself discloses the existence of the deed. But reverse the case, the existence of an original does not show the existence of any copy nor does parol evidence of the contents of a deed show the existence of anything except the deed itself. If one species of secondary evidence is to exclude another a party tendering parol evidence of a deed must account for all the secondary evidence that has existed. He may know nothing but the original and the other side at any trial may defeat him by showing a copy, the existence of which he had no means of ascertaining. Fifty copies may be in existence unknown to him and he would be bound to account for them all." Higmore 1268. Similarly in Brown v Woodman 6 C & P 206, Parke J said "There are no degrees of secondary evidence." See also Sugden v Lord St Leonards L R 1 P D 151, Brown v Brown, 27 L J Q B 173, Doe v Cole, 6 L J C P 319, Fisher v Samuda, 1 Camp 193, Hensington v English 8 Ex 1 274, 279. But in some of the old English cases the rule laid down was otherwise. In Tudham's Will 362 Lord Mansfield C J said "If you cannot prove a deed by producing it you may produce the counterpart, if you cannot produce the counterpart, you may produce a copy, even if you cannot prove it to be true copy, if a copy cannot be produced, you may go into the parol evidence of the deed." This rule was also adopted by Lord Hardwicke L C in Overthund v Biker 1 Atk 21 (19), and in Filshers v Filshers 2 Atk 27. The English rule on the subject is now settled by Doe v Ross supra and no preference is now accorded to a copy for proving deeds and other documents. But in America the controversy is not yet set at rest. The following extracts from Proof of Evidence § 743 (q) states the controversy admirably. "Whether the law recognizes any degrees in the various kinds of secondary evidence, and requires the parties to show that which is deemed less certain and satisfactory for the purpose of proving the fact, is a question which is not perfectly settled. On the one hand the affirmative is urged as an equitable extension of the principle which postpones all secondary evidence, until the primary is produced for, and it is said that the same reason which requires the production of a writing if within the power of a party, also requires that if the writing is lost, its contents shall be proved by a copy, if in existence rather than the memory of a witness who has read it, and that the secondary proof of a lost deed ought to be marshalled into first the counterpart, secondly a copy, thirdly, the abstract etc. and, last of all the memory of a witness. On the other hand it is said that this argument for the extension of the rule confounds all distinction between the weight of evidence and its legal admissibility, that the rule is founded upon the nature of the evidence offered and not upon its strength or weakness, and that to carry it to the length of establishing degrees in secondary evidence as fixed rules of law would often tend to the subversion of justice and always be productive of inconvenience. If for example proof of the existence of an abstract of a deed will exclude oral evidence of its contents, this proof may be withheld by the adverse party, until the moment of trial and the other side be defeated or the cause be greatly delayed, and the same mischief may be repeated through all the different degrees of evidence. It is therefore insisted, that the rule of exclusion ought to be restricted to such evidence only as upon its face discloses the existence of better proof and where the evidence is not of this nature it is to be received notwithstanding it may be shown from other sources that the party might have offered that which was more satisfactory, leaving the weight of the evidence to be judged by the jury, under all the circumstances of the case (4 Monthly Law Mag 265-279). The American doctrine as deduced from various authorities seems to be this, that if from the nature of the case itself it is manifest that a more satisfactory kind of secondary evidence exist the party will be required to produce it, but that where the nature of the case does not of itself disclose the existence of such better evidence the objector must not only prove its existence but also must prove that it was known to the other party in season to have been produced at the trial. It is believed that the rule laid down in Doe v Ross 7 M & W 102, is more philosophical and harmonizes better with the progress of the more enlightened jurisprudence of the age on the subject of the admissibility of evidence—that is to cut off and limit the objections to the competency and let the evidence in to go to the jury to judge of its weight or credibility. In every case where a party kept back a more satisfactory kind of evidence that was in his power to have produced and within his knowledge it would operate strongly against such as he had offered of less certainty, with the jury. Leuris v St Antonio 7 Tex 288 (315) (Am), Wigmore § 1268.

Proof of documents
by primary evidence

64 Documents must be proved by primary evidence except in the cases herein-after mentioned

Principle A writing is the best evidence of its own contents and must be introduced unless it has been lost or destroyed, or its absence is otherwise satisfactorily accounted for. Lynch v Clark 3 Salk 151. "The reasons are simple and obvious enough as dictated by common sense and long experience. They may be summed up in this way (1) As between a supposed literal copy and the original the copy is always liable to errors on the part of the copyist whether by wilfulness or by inadvertence, this contingency wholly disappears when the original is produced. Moreover the original will contain, and the copy will lack, such features of handwriting, paper, and the like as may afford the opponent valuable means of learning legitimate objections to the significance of the document. Wigmore § 1179. In Steyner v Drottman Skinner 623 Holt C 1 said that though an original may be evidence yet a copy would not for it is liable to the mistake of the transcriber. As between oral testimony, based on recollection, and the original the added risk almost the certainty exist of errors of recollection due to the difficulty of carrying in the memory lit talk the tenor of the document. Wigmore § 1179. Origin of the Rule The rule that if one would prove the contents of a writing, he must produce the writing itself or show a legally sufficient reason for

S 64 not doing it, is often called the 'Best Evidence Rule'. This phrase is an old one. During the latter part of the seventeenth century and the whole of the eighteenth while rules of evidence were forming, the Judges and text writers were in the habit of laying down two principles, namely, (1) that one must bring the best evidence that he can and (2) that if he does this, it is enough. These principles were the beginnings in the endeavor to give consistency to the system of evidence before juries. They were never literally enforced,—they were principles and not exact rules—but for a long time they afforded a valuable test. As rules of evidence and exceptions to the rules became more definite, the field for the application of the general principle of the 'Best Evidence' was narrowed. But it was often resorted to as a definite rule and test in a manner which was very misleading. This is still occasionally done as when we are told in McAnnon v. Bliss, 21 N. Y. p. 219 that 'it is a universal rule founded in necessity, that the best evidence of which the nature of the case admits is always receivable. Always the chief example of the 'Best Evidence' principle was the rule about proving the contents of a writing. But the origin of the rule was older than the 'Best Evidence' principle and that principle may well have been a general one from the rule which appears itself to be traceable to the doctrine of proper pleading. In like manner it was said, in dealing with the jury, that a jury could not specifically find the contents of a deed unless it had been exhibited to them in evidence. And afterwards when the jury came to hear testimony from witnesses, it was said that witnesses could not undertake to speak to the contents of a deed without the production of the deed itself." Thayer C. E. 2nd Ed. 78 779

Scope of the section The rule is that the best evidence must be used in a case. It can be had first the original if that cannot be had you may be let in to prove it any way, and by any circumstances the nature of the case will admit. This extends not only to deeds but to records so far I mean as they may be given in evidence to a jury for a point of proper fact it is another thing. But for the law requires a proper foundation to be laid, and two things are necessary. First to prove that such a deed once existed, and there is sufficient evidence that such a deed, to a certain intent did once exist by the answer that has been read which I do not rely on as evidence of all the uses of the deed, but as an admission that such a deed and uses something of that nature once existed. The next step is to show some ground that the deed is lost or, being in his adversary's hands cannot be come at. Per Lord Chancellor in Whitfield v. Jausset 1 Ves 387. In Grant v. Gould 2 H Bl p 104 Lord Loughborough said "That all Common Law Courts ought to proceed upon the general rule, namely, the best evidence that the nature of the case will admit, I perfectly agree. The rule as to the use of deeds as evidence is founded partly on the rules of common law but modified to some extent by the registry system established here by Statute. The theory is this that an original deed in its nature is more authentic and better evidence than any copy can be, that a copy in its nature is secondary and therefore in all cases original deeds should be required if they can be had. Per Shaw C. J. in Commonwealth v. Emery, Gray 80 (Am). "The general rule was that the contents of a writing of any document or portable article could not be proved without its production or without showing it to be in the possession or power of the prisoner or opposite party and on notice to him to produce it. Per Channell B. in Regina v. F. & F. 11 & 12 336. So the contents, of every written paper are according to the well established rules of evidence to be proved by the paper itself and by that alone if the paper be in existence. The Queen v. Case (per Abbott C. J.) 2 B. & B. 294. The reason of the rule is thus stated in Dr. Leyfield's Case, 10 Co Rep 92 (n). And therefore every deed ought to approve itself and to be proved by others—approve itself upon its showing forth to the Court in two manners: (1) As to the composition of the words be sufficient in law and the Court shall judge that (2) that it be not rived or interlined in material points or place. (3) that it may appear to the Court and to the party if it was, upon conditional limitation of power of a revocation in the deed. And these are the reasons of the law that deeds pleaded in Court shall be showed forth to the Court.

So when the question is as to the effect of a written instrument, the instrument itself is primary evidence of its contents. Per Coleridge J in R v Francis, L R 1 C C R 128 (182). But this rule should not be applied so broadly as to require the production of any thing which is not a document. The rule is applicable to all kinds of writings. The original doctrine of perfect affected only records and instruments under seal and applied in civil cases only, but by a gradual development the rule requiring production in evidence came to be settled as including in its scope any and every kind of document from a record or deed to a letter or a memorandum and is applicable equally in criminal and civil cases. Wigmore § 1183. It should be added that the series of English rulings in which it was held in certain prosecutions for sedition that the former bearing inscriptions alleged to import treasonable purpose need not be produced (Jude Fletcher's Trial 18 How St Tr 353, Lord George Gordon's Trial 21 How St Tr 513, R v Hunt 1 State Tr N S 171, R v Duchurst 1 State Tr N S 529, 542, 591, R v Juxon 6 C & P 81, 86, R v Stephens, 3 State Tr 1189, 1196) must be regarded as wholly un sound. The very difference that existed, in some of the trials in the testimonies of different witnesses as to the inscription's precise terms, and the materiality in such trials of these differences should indicate the propriety of applying the rule, within discretionary limits and it may be thought that those rulings would to day not be followed even in England. Wigmore § 1182, R v Hinley 1 Cox Cr 13, Butler v Mountgarret 6 H L C 639.

The contents of every written paper are according to the ordinary and well established rules of evidence, to be proved by the paper itself and by that alone if the paper be in existence. The rule was so stated by the Judges on the occasion of the trial of Queen Caroline 2 Brod & B 286 (1820). The only exception to it may be divided into the following classes (each of which is dealt with below) — (1) Where the written document is lost or destroyed. (2) Where it is in the possession of the adverse party who refuses or neglects to produce it, (3) Where it is in the possession of a party who is privileged to withhold it and who insists on his privilege. (4) Where the production of the document would be on physical grounds, impossible, or highly inconvenient. (5) Where the document is of a public nature and some other mode of proof is specially substituted for reasons of convenience. Roscoe Cr Ev 14th Ed p 3.

Cases in which secondary evidence relating to documents may be given

- (a) when the original is shown or appears to be in the possession or power —
  - of the person against whom the document is sought to be proved, or
  - of any person out of reach of, or not subject to, the process of the Court, or
  - of any person legally bound to produce it, and when, after the notice mentioned in section 66, such person does not produce it,
- (b) when the existence, condition or contents of the original have been proved to be admitted in writing by the person against whom it is proved or by his representative in interest,
- (c) when the original has been destroyed or lost, or when the party offering evidence of its contents cannot, for any other reason not arising from his own default or neglect, produce it in reasonable time, on the original

- (a) when the original is of such nature as not to be easily movable,
(c) when the original is a public document within the meaning of section 74,
(d) when the original is a document of which a certified copy is permitted by this Act, or by any other law in force in British India, to be given in evidence,
(e) when the originals consist of numerous accounts or other documents which cannot conveniently be examined in Court, and the fact to be proved is the general result of the whole collection
- cases (a) (c) and (d) any secondary evidence of the contents of the document is admissible case (b), the written admission is admissible case (e) or (f), a certified copy of the document, but a kind of secondary evidence, is admissible case (g), evidence may be given as to the general result of documents by any person who has examined them, if he is skilled in the examination of such documents
- The contents of a document may be proved by evidence called in by the party.

In cases (a) (c) and (d) any secondary evidence of the contents of the document is admissible

In case (b), the document is admissible
In case (c) or (d), a certified copy of the document, but other kind of secondary evidence, is admissible
In case (g), evidence may be given by the documents by any person who is shown to be

In case (b), the written admission is admissible
In case (c) or (f), a certified copy of the document, but no other kind of secondary evidence, is admissible
In case (g), evidence may be given as to the general result of the documents by any person who has examined them, and who is skilled in the examination of such documents

Principle The contents of a document must in general be proved by a special kind of evidence called primary evidence but there are exceptions cases in which it may be proved otherwise Murray v D 57 The exception is cases in which secondary evidence is admissible namely that the best evidence rule which is the most universal principle of evidence is contained in this section it (the rule) is only another form of expression for the idea that when you have the higher proof you may offer the next best in your power The case admits no better evidence than that which you possess if the superior proof has been lost without your fault The rule does not mean that men's rights are to be withheld and their property lost because they cannot guard against every accident beyond their control it only means that others cannot guard against events which are within your possession or may be reached by you you shall give no inferior proof in relation to it Per Porter J in Thomas v Thomas 111 W 169 Hipmore § 1192 The various classes of cases with which the following sections deal are but related instances of this general feature that production of the writing itself is not required if production is under the circumstance not feasible That the document is lost detained by the opponent held by a third person physically inaccessible legally unobtainable practically unobtainable or otherwise unavailable without great inconvenience—all the circumstances tend to the general notion that production is not feasible Hipmore § 1192

Scope of the section Secondary evidence of contents of documents is admissible if the original is lost, destroyed, or otherwise unavailable, provided the facts are proved by other evidence.

A writing is the best evidence of its contents and must be introduced unless it has been lost or destroyed, or its absence is otherwise satisfactorily accounted for. Lynch v Cleve 3 Salk 154. In its modern application the best evidence rule amounts to little more than the requirement that the contents of a writing must be proved by the introduction of the writing itself unless its absence has satisfactorily accounted for. In its origin the rule known as the 'best evidence' was something entirely different. In fact it related to all classes of evidence, and was a broadening rather than a narrowing rule. It meant that the best evidence of which the nature of the case would permit was receivable. It has been pointed out by Prof. Thayer that this rule has been the subject of a very peculiar development. (Vide the origin of the rule under S 64). As now understood, the rule is one relating to writings only. It extends to all writings however and is not confined to those which relate to matters required by law to be in writing. McKelvey's Ex § 272. This section is applicable to both Civil and Criminal proceedings and thus is a relaxation of the rule of English Law which requires stricter proof in criminal than in civil proceedings and under which it was decided that in the former the original registers of births deaths marriages, etc must be produced and that copies will not be sufficient. Field's Ex 7th Ed p 218. Whitley Stokes, Vol II p 92. The exceptional cases in which secondary evidence is admissible are contained in s 65. Markby's Ex p 57. A copy of a document should not be admitted in evidence until all legal means have been used to obtain the original and a party's denial in pleading of the possession of the document will not justify the omission of the process the law provides for his testimony and his being called to produce the original deed. Where an original pattah relied on cannot be produced secondary evidence is admissible but the Court ought to be satisfied that it gives a true version of the contents of the document, and that there is sufficient evidence of its execution. Sookram Soolul v Ramtal 9 W R 248. The non production of an original document from a record must be satisfactorily accounted for before a copy can be looked at, and such copy should be shown to be accurate before it can be used. Robeet v Dindyal 21 W R 257. see also Rampibantal v Nandatal 2 W R Act X Rul 43. Prosanno v Chunder 23 W R 241. Iman v Doorga, 21 W R 262.

A copy of a disputed document can not be taken as evidence without proof that the original is out of the power of the person producing the copy. A lotbunde can not be admitted as secondary evidence in substitution of the certificate of sale except where the absence of the certificate is well accounted for and no better evidence could be had. Lstoorun v Mohunlal 21 W R 333. Oral evidence to prove the contents of a letter (not that produced nor called for) is inadmissible on the ground that it involves the giving of secondary evidence of the contents of a document without satisfying the conditions required to be fulfilled by this section. Kameshwar Pershad v Manutulla 26 C 53=2 C W N 649. When certain collections of rents were sought to be proved by entries made by Paluani in his list as the result of his enquiry and inspection of receipts. not being registered or not being properly stamped, secondary evidence cannot be given of its existence. Whitley Stokes, Vol II p 892

Time for objecting to the admission of the secondary evidence. A Court copy of a title-deed was filed without objection on behalf of the plaintiff, but objection was taken during the argument that the plaintiff had not shown any of the statutory grounds for the admission of such secondary evidence. It was held that the defendant's allowing the copy to be marked without objection would not stop him from afterwards objecting to it. The copy should not have been marked until evidence had been given which made it receivable. Kistna Dass v Multamali 3 M L T 297. Objection to evidence must be made before its reception but not afterwards. Anderson v Taylor 70 P R 1866. Uppa v Puddapalle 31 Ind Cas 188. The rule is firmly established that no objection should be allowed to be taken in an appellate Court as to the admissibility of a copy of a document which was admitted in evidence in the Court below without any objection. Iwan v Iwan, 85 Ind Cas 541=29 P L R 155=A I R 192 5 Lah 347, Ma The Ah v Ma Ai Pa 3 Bur L J 193=192, Rang 113. Vingara v Ramappa, 5 B I R 708=28 B 94, Ho al v Van U B R (1897 1901) Vol 11 382. Ubar th v Bhynatal 6 C 666. Ramtochan v Harinath 1 P L T 397=67 Ind Cas 628, Su at v Lann 59 Ind Cas 461. Zandhin Latima, 11 Ind Cas 539=216 P W R 912. Madhavi v Gaganendra 9 C W N 11. Chinnaji v Dular 11 B 320. Kishori v Rahal 31 C 155. Rhody v Prasanna, 28 C 142. Shahali v Secy of State, 34 C 108 (P C)=6 C L J 678. Hasmattuli v Harimohan 31 Ind Cas 942, Mahabur v Tilla Rai 1 W R 12, Gour v Kanhya 2 W R 237. Legrado v Mahomed, 10 W R 267. Koshinath v Mahesh 25 W R 166.

Section 65 and Registration Act, s 49. The admitted existence of an unregistered written deed of relinquishment of one's interest requiring registration precludes the proof of the fact of the relinquishment by any secondary evidence as the primary evidence is itself inadmissible under s 49. Janardhan v Janardhan 101 Ind Cas 839=A I R 1927 Nag 214. Section 19, Limitation Act—Whether excludes secondary evidence of acknowledgments lost or destroyed. Section 19 of Act IX of 1908 corresponds to section 20 of the Limitation Act of 1871 which runs as follows: "When the writing containing the promise or acknowledgment is undated evidence may be given of the time when it was signed. But, when it is allowed to have been destroyed or lost, oral evidence of its contents shall not be received." So in earlier cases the question arose whether that section modified section 61 of the Evidence Act. In Shambunath v. Ramchandra, 19 C 57, where such a question arose the Court observed: "When that Act (IX of 1871) was passed the present Evidence Act was not in existence, and there was no section in any Act relating to evidence defining clearly the case in which secondary evidence of a document could be given, but it was known law that amongst the ground which authorized the admission of secondary evidence was the loss or destruction of the original. In the sentence just read, the only case referred to is the destruction or loss of document. The effect clearly was to exclude oral evidence of an acknowledgment if tendered on either of the grounds, but nothing was said about the case where the document is the possession of the opposite party, or is a public document, or beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, or the other cases in which secondary evidence of the contents of a document may ordinarily be given. Then came the Evidence Act. That Act has defined the cases in which secondary evidence is admissible. Then came the Limitation Act of 1877 with which we are now dealing. The language of s 19 is altogether different from the language of the prior Act of 1871. The language of the prior Act of 1871, so far as oral evidence is concerned was necessarily in direct conflict with s 65 of the Evidence Act. According to the Evidence Act secondary evidence is admissible of the contents of a document generally if the original is lost or destroyed, but according to the Act of 1871 oral evidence of the contents of an acknowledged document would not be admissible in such a case. The words now used are different. In Act XV of 1877 the words used are: 'When the writing containing the acknowledgment is undated oral evidence may be given of the time when it was signed but oral evidence of its contents shall not be received.' One branch of the law of Evidence is that already referred to. It is contained in s 61 and the following sections of the Evidence Act and it determines the cases in which secondary evidence may be given of the contents of a document not produced. Another branch of that law is contained in s 91, and the following sections. It deals with the question how far oral evidence, or evidence of oral communications may be given to vary, control, or add to the effect of a document. The first part of the paragraph before us clearly belongs to the latter branch of the law. And, it would seem the object was to remove any question which might otherwise have arisen whether the rules generally excluding oral evidence to alter the effect of documents might not exclude oral evidence of the date of an undated document, where the date is an essential matter. Accordingly it is said that oral evidence of the date of the document may be given. The paragraph then proceeds: 'but oral evidence of its contents shall not be received.' These words were introduced with a 'but' and it speaks not of secondary evidence but of oral evidence. We do not think it ought to be understood as dealing with an entirely different branch of the law of evidence from the earlier part of the sentence, and as repealing s 61 of the Evidence Act so far as it relates to acknowledgments. We think the words in question are of the nature of a saving clause guarding against the possibility that the prior words interfere with the general rules as to oral evidence further than the express words require.' So where an original acknowledgment is proved to be lost secondary evidence of its contents may be given. Ray v. Ray, 11 C 112; 1902 see also Chellu v. Narayan, 15 M 191 but see Shambunath v. Ramchandra, 12 B 268. This controversy has been set at rest by Act IX of 1908 (section 19(2)) which runs as follows: 'Where the writing containing the acknowledgment is undated oral evidence may be given of the time when it was signed but subject to the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 oral evidence of its contents shall not be received.' A statement by Lord Macmillan in the McLoughlin v. Loughlin case is to the effect that it mortgage is still redeemable would if signed or marked by the mortgagee, clearly be an acknowledgment under s 19 of the Limitation Act. When the detailed record of such statement has been destroyed in the course of weeding of records, an entry in the index to the must i tangih i hingu i mirarian made by a certain party taking together with the summary of that statement to be found in the settlement superintendent's order, is good and sufficient secondary evidence of the contents of such statement. Mohayuddin v Nonio 5 P W R 1911=16 P L R 1915

CLAUSE (A)

Original in the possession or power of the Adversary When a document is in the possession of the adverse party or of some one bound to give up possession thereof to him (e.g. his solicitor (Irum v Leier 2 F & I 269 R v Hunter 4 C & P 125) banker (Patridge v Coote Ry and M 156), deputy (Laphin v Ill 3 Bing 164), agent or servant (Dalbney v Ritchie 1 Stark 338 Simclair v Stevenson 1 C & P 582 585)), but not a strike-holder (Perry v May 1 W & R 279), as in Keight v Martin Gow R 103) nor person under whom the adversary justifies in an action of trespass (Evans v Sweet, Ry & M 53) and such party refuses to produce it either after notice or when notice is extended the other party may, in civil and criminal cases, provided that it had satisfied Stamp and Registrar on law give secondary evidence of its contents. Phip v Ford 1 d 436. The words used in this section are 'possession or power'. So it is enough for this purpose if the opponent has the control, whether technically named possession or not. Wignore § 1200. It seems that the wording of this section is taken from Perry v May 1 Moo & Rob 280, where Littledale J said "The instrument need not be in the actual possession of the party, it is enough if it is in his power, which it would be if in the hands of a party in whom it would be wrongful not to give up possession to him. So it is clear that the document need not be actually in the personal custody of the opponent himself, it is enough if it be held by a third person on the opponent's behalf and subject to the opponent's demand. Wignore § 1200. So wherever it is in the possession or power of the opposite party and he refuses to produce it after notice secondary evidence is receivable. R v Watson 2 T R 201. Malbul Ali v Masnah Bibi, 3 B L R C A 54. Greesh Chunder v Ramlal 1 W R C R 45. The rule applies to criminal cases equally with civil. R v Flintho 10 Cox Cr 579 382. The reason why secondary evidence is admissible in such a case is thus given by Bullock J in Ill Gen v Le Merchant 2 F R 201 note "It was likewise said in support of the motion that the reason why copies are permitted to be evidence in common cases is because the party who has them is his custody and does not produce them is in some fault for not producing them it is considered as a misbehaviour in him in not producing them and therefore in criminal cases a man who does not produce them is in no fault at all and for that reason a copy is not admitted. But I do not take that to be the rule, it is not produced upon any misbehaviour of the party, or considering him in fault but the rule is this the copies are admitted when the originals are in the adversary's hands, for the same reason as when the originals are lost by accident the reason is because the party has not the originals to produce. It is clear says Prof Wignore that this notion of detention by the opponent is no excuse for non production, involves three essential elements (a) possession, or more broadly, control by the opponent, (b) demand or notice, made to him by the proponent, signifying that the document will be needed and (c) failure, or refusal, by the opponent to produce them in Court. Only when these three circumstances co exist can it be said that the document is unavailable because the opponent detains it. Wignore § 1199.

It has already been stated that the documents need not be in actual possession of the opponent. It is enough if it is in his power to produce it. Perry v May, 1 Moo & Rob 280. So "the possession of the plaintiff's attorney is the possession of the plaintiff, though they might perhaps be subpoenaed it is not necessary to subpoena them when the principal is a party to the suit it is sufficient to give the party notice. Per Pollock C J in Irum v Leier 2 F & F 296. It is immaterial that the document is out of the jurisdiction of the Court, if it is held there on behalf of the opponent. Cutter Town v

Clements v. G. App 291, Hignore § 1200 In such a case the only question which comes for the decision of the Court is whether sufficient time has been allowed to the opposite party to produce the said original. When a document is proved to have been in the possession of the opponent, very recently, the presumption is that it is still in his possession. R v. Hunter, 4 C & P 17. Nor, in fairness, should a transfer shortly before notice served be an excuse if the opponent did not duly advise the proponent, at the time of notice that he had transferred it. Hignore § 1200, contra, Wright v. Bunyard, 2 F & F 194, 191. Before a secondary evidence is admissible under this section the opponent's possession of the document in question must be shown somehow. Knight v. Martin Gow 103 Huthford v. Putn, 10 Bing 395, Shape v. Lord 11 A & F 805. Of this fact very slight evidence will raise a sufficient presumption when the documents exclusively belong to him, or regularly ought to be in his custody according to the course of business. Taylor § 440, contra Ajoodha v. P. Sharce Dyal, 10 W R 219, Blubaneswar v. Hari arau, 6 C 720 = 5 C L R 337 P C. So where a bankruptcy certificate was proved to have been obtained for the defendant the Court presumed that it had come into his possession. Henry v. Leigh, 3 Camp 502 Robb v. Starkey, 9 C 141 Kn 143. If papers were last seen in the hands of the defendant, it lies upon him to trace them out of his possession. R v. Thistlewood, 33 How St Tr 757. The rule is the same in criminal cases. Perry v. May, 1 M & R 94 Langton v. Reynolds 18 Jur 963. A party served with notice cannot evade its effect by subsequently putting with the document. Knight v. Martin, Gow R 101 Ault 246. It would seem that when a party has notice to produce a particular instrument traced to his possession he can not object to prove evidence of its contents on the ground that previous to the notice, he had ceased to have any control over it unless he has stated this fact to the opposite party, and has pointed out to him the person to whom he delivered it. Snarlan v. Stevens 1 C & P 585 586 per Best J Taylor § 440. The presumption of receipt that it follows from the mailing of a letter duly addressed and stamped should suffice to show possession and the sufficiency of the evidence is a question of law for the Judge. Henry v. Mitchell, 2 Moo & Rob 366.

The production of a certified copy of the registered deed is sufficient proof when the original of that deed is in the possession of the opposite party. Mt. Salomon v. Halim Muddam, A 1 R 1928 All 394. This section lays down that secondary evidence may be given of the contents of a document when the original is shown or appears to be in the possession or power of the person against whom the document is sought to be proved. This section does not require that in all cases it must be definitely proved that the document is in possession of the other side against whom it is sought to be proved it is sufficient if it is proved that the document appears to be in his possession. Zubunnas v. Ishad 2 O W N 405 = 12 O I J 351 = 89 Ind Cas 281 = 1 L R 192, Oudh 591. Where a letter deed is in the possession of the defendant and the plaintiff failed to produce it though summoned twice to do so secondary evidence of the contents is admissible. Judha v. Talu Ram 67 Ind Cas 81 = 1 L R 1922 I Ch 417, Mal Behary v. Tal Mohan 19 Ind Cas 707. When the original is presumed to be in the possession of the opposite party and when the opposite party knows that he is required to produce it secondary evidence of its contents may be given. Duarta Singh v. Ramchand 41 A 592 = 17 A L J 711 = 74 Ind Cas 275 see also Masammot Saleha Bibi v. Oudh Commercial Bank 1 Ind Cas 673. In a suit for redemption when the mortgagee is in possession of the mortgaged land and to produce it oral evidence is admissible under s. 6 (a) read with proviso (2) of s. 66 of the Evidence Act. M. Linn v. M. Gura 9 Bar 1 L R 72 = 31 Ind Cas 892. Sections 65 and 66 must be read together and the rule is that a party must not be presumed to have knowledge that he could be required to produce an original document or to dispense with the necessity of a deed to produce and the original is shown or appears to be in the possession of the person against whom the presumption is drawn. Per M. L. J. in Munnay v. Dadi Ram 31 Ind Cas 328.

Of any person out of the reach of or not subject to etc. This phrase includes cases where the document is in possession of any person who is out of the reach of, or not subject to the process of the Court. In such case secondary evidence of the contents of such a document can be given without giving notice to that person to produce the document [Vide s 66 (b)]

According to English law the mere fact of the non amenability of the person to legal process should not of itself excuse non production. Legal process cannot avail to obtain a document held out of the jurisdiction but four possible forms of effort exist, any one or more of which may be deemed proper by a Court before excusing for non production. If the precise whereabouts of the document is unknown, search may be made. If the possessor be ascertained he may be requested to appear with the document, or he may be requested to deliver the document for the use at the trial or his deposition may be taken with a copy furnished by him annexed to it. No one or more of these efforts could be required as a fixed rule nor do the Courts seem to make any such fixed requirement. The rulings fall in three general groups. In the first group the Courts require that in effort of some sort be made its nature depending more or less on the circumstances of the case. Boyle v Wiseman 10 Exch 647 Ward v Murray 1900 Times, Mar 5 cited Plup p 48. In the second group, the Courts either by express decision or by failing to mention any requirement, excuse the non production although no such effort has been made the mere fact sufficing that the document is out of the jurisdiction. Bruce v Atcotopolo, 11 Exch 129 131. Punnaby v Baillie L R 42 Ch D 287, 291. In the third group the effort actually made is declared to be sufficient without laying down any rule as to its necessity. Wignore § 1213, see also Crispin v Dighioni, 32 L J P & M 109. Ordinarily, being filed in another Court is not sufficient reason for non production. Gow Monee v Hulse Ashore 10 W R 339. But according to ss 65 and 66 no proof of notice to produce it is necessary for the admission of secondary evidence of its contents before commissioners in a place beyond the jurisdiction of the Court is using the Commission. Rali v Gan Kim 9 C 939. So also secondary evidence of a document can be admitted without notice to the adverse party, when the person in possession of the document is out of the reach of or not subject to the process of the Court. Hananand v Ramgopal 27 C 639 (P C) = 27 I A 1 = 4 C W N 429. Section 86 of the Evidence Act lays down that if a copy of a foreign judicial record purports to be certified in a given way, the Court may presume it to be genuine and accurate. The section 86 however does not exclude other proof, for under ss 65 and 86 of the Evidence Act secondary evidence may be given of public documents without notice to the adverse party when the person is out of reach of or not subject to the process of the Court. Hananand v Ram Gopal, 2 Bom L R 362.

As regards the meaning of the expression 'of any person not subject to the process of the Court' there is some conflict of opinion. According to Mr Stoles these words are intended to include the case of a person not legally bound to produce the document on account of privilege and who refuse to produce it. Stoles Anglo Indian Code, Vol II p 892 citing Miles v Oddy 6 C & P 737, Morston v Duweney 1 H & T 31. In order to understand whether this clause includes that rule of English law it is worth our while to know the English law on the subject. The English law on this subject is thus briefly stated by William Wills in his Law of Evidence. Secondary evidence is admissible whenever the original is in the possession of a stranger to the proceedings who attends in Court with the document and there lawfully refuses to produce it on some ground of privilege claimed by him either in his own right or as agent acting on the instructions of other. The usual and proper course of the party who seeks to give evidence of the document is to compel the attendance in Court of the person who has possession of the document by means of subpoena duces tecum but if he should voluntarily attend with the document and should lawfully refuse to produce it secondary evidence will be equally admissible. Doe v Clifford, 2 C & K 149, Dwyer v Collins (1852) 7 Fx 632. If on the other hand he attends but without the document and subpoena duces tecum has not been served on him or not been duly served this is a fatal objection to the admission of secondary evidence is the party not doing all that lay in his power to procure the production of the original (Hibberd v Knight 2 L J 11) If the person so refusing to produce is not an agent for another by whose instruction the production is withheld the fact that the principal does so refuse may be proved in several ways. He may himself attend the Court upon a subpoena and then and there refuse (Newton v Chapman 10 C B 366) or may attend voluntarily and do the same (Doe v Clifford, 2 C & K 41, but it will be sufficient for the admission of secondary evidence if the agent himself can prove that he has had express instructions from his principal not to allow the production of the document. Phelps v Price 31 B B 379. 1172 1st 2d Ed pp 399, 400. In such a case according to the English law the contents of a document can be proved by secondary evidence. But for the purpose of identification of the secondary evidence with the original, the person withholding production of it may be compelled to produce it, provided no part of the contents is disclosed. In the case of deeds and wills identification is generally effected by an inspection of the endorsement containing particulars of the instrument. Phelps v Price 31 B B 130. Doe v Clifford, 2 C & K 41. 118. Hills v 2nd 1st 1st 101. Mills v Gidley 6 C & P 725, 737, Calver v Guest (1895) 1 Q B 79. But according to a change of provision of section 66 no notice is required when person in possession of the document is out of reach of or not subject to the process of the Court. So it cannot be said that this clause includes the English rule just mentioned.

Lawful non production by third person—English law. Historically, the excuse for non production was one of the earliest to be established. Under the doctrine of proferit it was well settled that proferit was not necessary of an instrument belonging to a third person for the reason that the proponent had not any means to obtain the deed. from Dyer 277 (h) Exlosley v Langham. Dyer 277a. Stodman v Hampton (10 Car 111. Gray v Fother Cro Car 209. Huntingdon v Muddman Cro lack 217, Wignmore § 1211. So "where a person is an utter stranger to a deed there in pleading he is not compelled to shew it" Bull v Pius 252. So if the person possessing the document is by reason of privilege not compellable to produce then is the same reason for admitting other evidence of its content as if its production were physically impossible because the party who stands in need of the evidence which that document affords is not to suffer from its absence at the trial. Per Pollock C B in Sayer v Glover 2 Exch 409 110. Merely disobedience to a notice to produce the document will not however let in secondary evidence thereof (Jessup v College v Gibbs, 1 L J C Ex R 156), the witness must be justified in his refusal, for otherwise the party has no remedy except as against him (R v Transvaeltely, 2 E & B 940), and even a justified refusal will not let in secondary evidence of certain documents protected by public policy. Phip Es 3d Ed 489. When the documents are in the possession of a third party, he should be served with what is called a subpoena duces tecum i.e., a summons to attend the trial as a witness and bring the documents with him (Vide Order 16, rule 1 of Act V of 1908—a 159 of the Old Code). The person on whom such a subpoena duces tecum has been served is bound to obey it so far as attending the trial and bringing the documents with him are concerned (Vide s 162 infra) but he will not be compelled to produce them if the disclosure might subject him to examination penalty or forfeiture. (Vide s 130 infra). So a party will not be required to produce the muniments of title to his estates Taylor § 458 1464 section 130 infra) nor will his solicitor to whom they have been entrusted (Hibberd v Knight 2 Exch 11. Doe de Gilbert v Ross, 7 M & W 102. Volant v Sayer, 13 C B 231) and in either case independent secondary evidence of their contents may be given. Per Hill J in R v Leatham 3 F & E 658 663. Best Es § 216. So it is a well established rule of law that the productions of a privileged document is excused. Per Hill J in R v Leatham 3 E & E 653 668. The principal may of course waive his privilege. (Wile v More Ry & M 390) after which the agent's refusal to produce would no longer be lawful unless based on some independent and just claim of privilege in himself (Doe v Ro s 7 M & W 102). Neither principal nor agent thus claiming privilege is compellible to give oral or secondary evidence of the contents of the privileged document but if such evidence is voluntarily given it is admissible even though it is given by an agent without the authority of his principal. Warston v Dawnes 6 C & P 381. Hibberd v Knight, 2 Ex

11, Wills Et 2nd Ed 400 As section 65 contrains the exceptional cases in which secondary evidence is admissible, it is apprehended that no secondary evidence is admissible under the Indian Evidence Act, if the party in possession of the document withholds it under §§ 130 and 131 of the Act

Of any person legally bound to produce it As regards this clause Justice Malby says 'If, however, we are to take the words of any person legally bound to produce it in § 3 of s 65 (1) as they stand, there is no necessity to take any steps to procure the production of the document, as secondary evidence of it at once becomes admissible I can hardly believe that this is what was intended I think it probable that the word 'not' has been here omitted by mistake, and that the case intended to be dealt with here is the case of a person who though within the reach of the Court, is not legally bound to produce the document Several such cases are mentioned in s 121 131 This could be quite intelligible and in accordance with the English Law' Malby Et 28 But Justice Field thinks it otherwise This clearly covers a document which is unjustifiably withheld by any person, thus differing from English law on the point But if a person summoned to produce a document objects to do so and his objection is upheld by the Court it seems equally clear that such a document does not fall within the words of this section It may be, however, that the Courts will admit secondary evidence in such a case upon the general principles of the English law and the decisions of the English Courts upon this subject Field Et 7th Ed 215 It is but a corollary to the general rule in question that nothing is to be added to or to be taken from a Statute, unless there are similar adequate grounds to justify the inference that the Legislature intended something which it omitted to express Per Tindal C J in Essex v Wells 2 M & G 277 Per Lord Eldon in Davis v Marlborough 53 R R 29, Per Lord Westbury Exp St Sepulchre 33 L J Ch 375 Re Cherry's Estate, 31 I J Ch 351 Marvell 25 It is strong thing said Lord Mowbray, 'to read into an Act of Parliament words which are not there and in the absence of clear necessity it is a wrong thing to do' Thompson v Gould 79 L J K B 911 We are not entitled said Lord Loreburn 'to read words into an Act of Parliament unless clear reason for it is to be found within the four corners of the Act itself' Tickers v Evans 79 L J K B 955 So it is clear that this clause should not be interpreted by introducing the word 'not' before the words 'legally bound to produce'

Under rules of strict interpretation it appears that this clause intends to make a departure from the English rule which does not allow secondary evidence of any document improperly withheld It may be that the party calling for the document which has been improperly withheld, has its remedy against the party so withholding the document in separate suit for damage or he may be punished for contempt of Court but such remedy may give very inadequate relief where the party withholding is a pauper and the loss to be suffered for the non production of the document is considerable Moreover that will give rise to multiplicity of suits It is also not desirable to deprive a party to produce secondary evidence of a document, simply because a third person refuses to produce the original of the document wilfully or perhaps fraudulently There may be in addition the danger of the collusion between the opposite party and the party withholding such document In England where a third person has some legal right to the document, which renders his refusal proper or where he refuses to produce the document on the ground that it might tend to incriminate him it is held that secondary evidence is allowable, since the party has done all in his power to have the original produced (Doc v Ross 7 M & W 102 P v Lisle 6 at page 121 Hills v Odby, 6 Mees & W 664) and there seems to be no good reason why the doctrine should be different when the third person continually refuses to produce the document Wickley's Et § 271

It is also often said says Prof Wyomore 'that where the third person is hostile and frankly denies the document this fact itself suffices to excuse non production, though such an instance is perhaps often equally well disposed of by the doctrine of loss, or of the opponent's possession by the hands of an agent Where neither of the above situations exist and the case is an ordinary one of possession by a third person, it is clear that a demand at least must have been

the compulsory process of law should also have been invoked by subpoena times term. A number of Courts seem to lay down the fixed rule that a subpoena need not try (H v. Estlin 61 R 236, Huford v. Lulin 10 B give no definite solution and seem to have been based on the circumstanc case in hand. The truth is that while for the purpose of the general rule better to require the process of subpoena yet in the discretion of the Court th failure to use a subpoena provided a demand has been made may not be treated as fatal if in view of the nature of the document, the relevance of the possession and his relations to the case the risk of collusion, and other circum stances the issue of a subpoena would have been unnecessary effort. If a service of subpoena the possessor is reluctant and refuses to obey the process should be excused from production. Ignore § 1212 So according to Pr
Ignore the rules of law laid down by Alderson B in Jesus College v. Gibbs, 11 & (11) 176 where he said: "You could not have proved it by secondary evidence unless the document had been in the possession of a party not bound to produce it." (The third person referred to) it is true, at his own peril but that the best evidence the nature of the case permits of shall be produced, refusal to a party permission to give secondary evidence of a written document on the ground of its being in possession of his adversary, until he has shown that by giving notice to that adversary to produce it, he has used every exertion in his power that the best evidence might be given. Ignore § 1202, see also Maungsan v Subramaniam, 12 Ind Crs 861. But no notice to the opposite party to produce the original is necessary to render secondary evidence admissible where the opposite party from the nature of the case must have known that he would be required to produce the original. Syed Mahammad v Nam Varan 7 C L J 90. When it is found that the defendant in whose favour an instrument of mortgage ought to be, denies that he has it, secondary evidence is admissible. Teju Mal v Lalphalar Sha 49 P R 1992.

CLAUSE B

Written admission as to the contents of an original document. Section 22 lays down that oral admissions as to the contents of a document are not relevant unless and until the party proposing to prove them shows that he is entitled to give secondary evidence of the contents of such document under this section. The present clause provides that a written admission is admissible as proof of a document even though the original is in existence and might be but is not produced. Cum Ex 221. The result seems to be this—The written admission may always be proved. The oral admission can only be proved in cases stated in s 65 (a) (c) and (d). Malby Ex 59. Admissions as to the contents of written documents are often made by the parties in their pleadings or their pleadings at the hearing and the section under consideration do not seem to have any application to such admissions which are governed by s 78. Ibid. So a party's admission as to the contents of a document, not made in the pleadings but in a deposition is a secondary evidence and cannot supply the place of document itself. Sheil Ibrahim v Parbati Hari, 8 B H C R A C J 163 (164). This section deals with evidentiary admissions which must be in writing. Secondary evidence in the nature of admission by vendors as to sale of immovable property in favour of the vendee cannot, in the absence of condition mentioned in cl (b) of section 65 be admitted. Safar Ali v Mohesh 23 C L J 122=34 Ind Crs 956. In a suit for redemption of mortgage the mortgage deed was not produced. Secondary evidence consisted of a document addressed to the mortgagors by the alleged agent of the mortgagee which mentioned something about the mortgage in suit. The writer was not proved to be an agent of the mortgagee authorized to make an acknowledgment of liability on his behalf. The document did not describe him as an agent of the mortgagee nor did it bear his signature but merely a seal purporting to be his. It was previously attested in the settlement Court as a forgery. It was produced for the double purpose first, as secondary evidence of the mortgaged deed under s 65(b) secondly to give limitation under section 19 of the Limitation Act. Held that the document was no secondary evidence of the existence of the mortgage as it did not fall within the category of writings described in clause (b) of section 65 of the Evidence Act. Gajraj v Balaji 11, 20 Ind Cas 62. This clause has no application where the original document is inadmissible for not being registered or properly stamped. Dueth v Krishnasami, 6 M 117. Sambayya v Gangayya 3 M 308, Damodar v Attamaram Babai 12 B 443 (446). Where the record of the statement of the accused is not admissible, secondary evidence thereof could not be given. Queen Empress v Iram, 9 M 221. In rejecting such evidence Parlei I at p 240 observed 'Reference is made by the Sessions Judge to s 65 of the Evidence Act, the words appearing in cl (b) in that section being quoted, but for the reasons above stated I am of opinion that it was not open to the Magistrate to procure an admission in writing—if the affixing of his mark to the whole statement by each accused can be held to constitute an admission in writing for this purpose—in respect of the contents of the previous statements.

CLAUSE (C)

When the original has been lost or destroyed. The loss or destruction of a writing, if satisfactorily shown opens the door for the admission of secondary

Where after search an original labuliyat can not be found, a copy of such labuliyat is admissible in evidence Jiban Kati v Manimala 49 Ind Cas 1006. The Court should be very strict before admitting secondary evidence in insisting on strict proof of the loss of a document like a mortgage or a special power of attorney authorising the creation of a mortgage Jaspal Rai v Devi Dayal, 32 Ind Cas 399. But the question whether or not sufficient proof of search for or loss of, an original document to lay a ground for admission of secondary evidence, has been given, is a point proper to be decided by the Judge of first instance and is treated as depending very much on his discretion and his conclusion should not be overruled except in a clear case of miscarriage Ma Park v Ma Anai, 34 Ind Cas 153=9 Bur L T 174. The plaintiff filed a suit on the basis of a hypothecation bond alleging the original to have been lost and produced only a copy. The defendant alleged that the original was not lost but suppressed as there was an endorsement on the bond showing payment of Rs 200 by him to the plaintiff. Held, that, although the execution of the bond was not expressly admitted in written statement yet the plea of payment and its endorsement on the bond amounted to an admission of the execution of the bond and the plaintiff could maintain the suit on a copy of the bond without proving the alleged loss Mulla v Deo Kanan, 11 A L J 731=20 Ind Cas 955. In a suit for rent the plaintiff produced a copy of the rent deed on the allegation that the original had been lost. In the written statement the defendant admitted the execution of the deed but later on in his statement before the Court, denied it. Held, that the subsequent denial must be taken to have altered the proceedings contained in the written statement, and the claim on the copy could not be maintained without proving the loss of the original Muhammad v Hamududdin 11 A L J 731=21 Ind Cas 81. A registered copy of a mortgage deed is a secondary evidence of the mortgage deed and is admissible in evidence when a case is made out for the admission of the secondary evidence Sri Ram v Ram Lal, 11 A L J 253=18 Ind Cas 878.

Loss and destruction of original—sufficiency of search. The word "destruction" signifies that the thing no longer exists, while the word "loss" merely that it can not be discovered. Nevertheless, for practical purposes, the two come together for consideration in this rule. In the first place the moment that the destruction becomes questionable at all (i.e. when not proved by eye witnesses of burning or tearing the inquiry is raised whether the search for it has been sufficient, and in the next place, the proof of a loss usually carries the implication that the thing not found has ceased to exist and thus assimilates the case to one of destruction. Thus, the great question to which so many Judges have devoted so much pains—the establishment of a test for the sufficiency of proof of loss—includes practically not only the cases of loss in the narrower sense but also the cases in which destruction is more or less expressly put forward as the reason for non production Wigmore § 1191. The question thus resolves itself into an inquiry as regards the sufficiency of the search. But in this connection it should be borne in mind that all evidence is to be considered with regard to the matter with respect to which it is produced. Now it appears to be a very different thing whether the subject of the enquiry be a useless paper which may reasonably be supposed to be lost or whether it is an important document which the party might have an interest in keeping, and for the non production of which no satisfactory reason is assigned. Where the loss or destruction of the paper may almost be presumed, very slight evidence of its loss or destruction is sufficient. Per Abbott C J in Breuster v Seuell 3 B & Ald 296 Freeman v Arkell 2 B & C 191 Wigmore § 1191. So in this respect there is great difference between valuable and valueless documents. It is a fair presumption that a man will keep all documents which may with any degree of probability be of present or future value to him, and that he will on the other hand throw away or destroy those which have served their end and are never likely to be required for any purpose whatever. In the former case it is reasonable to exact proof of a very careful search whereas in the latter very slight evidence tending to show loss or destruction will suffice Hill F. 2nd Ed p 398. What is proper search or enquiry must depend on the particular circumstances of the case Ibid So "the evidence of a document being lost, upon which secondary evidence may be given of its content, may vary much, according to the nature of the paper itself, the custody it is in, and indeed all the surrounding circumstances of the particular matter before the Court and the jury. A paper of considerable importance, which is not likely to be permitted to perish may call for a much more minute and accurate search than that which may be considered as waste paper which no body would be likely to take care of. What inquiry will do? I think, in cases of this sort [there the loss of a newspaper, known as 'the Non conformist' from a club] if somewhere after its publication, it is not found in the place where it ought to be, if it be anywhere, no search is necessary among the members of the club, or persons who frequent the club room it may be taken to be lost, if it cannot be produced from the place where it ought to be found." Per Pollock C B in Garthe Cole v Mah, 15 M & W 319, 329. In the same case Alderson B said, 'The question whether there has been a loss, and whether there has been sufficient search must depend very much on the nature of the instrument searched for. If we were speaking of an envelope, in which a letter has been received and a person said, 'I have so and so in it among my papers I cannot find it,' surely that would be sufficient for the purpose with respect to an old newspaper which has been at a public coffee room if the party who kept the public coffee room had searched for it there, where it ought to be if in existence, and where naturally he would find it, and says he supposes it has been taken away by some one that seems to me to be amply sufficient. If he had said, 'I know it was taken away by A B', then I should have said he ought to go to A B and see if A B has not got that which it is proved he took away. As it seems to me the proper limit is, where a reasonable person would be satisfied that they had bona fide endeavoured to produce the document itself, and therefore I think it was reasonable to receive parol evidence of the contents of this newspaper.' All that is required is that the party producing the document by secondary evidence must have used all reasonable means to obtain the original. R v Morton 4 M & S 48, Gully v Ezeter 1 Bing 290, Dee v Clifford 2 C & K 448, 451, Quater v Jorss, 14 C B N S 747, 750, R v Arnold 7 Q B 612, 649, Pardoe v Price, 13 M & W 269, R v Gordon 1 L J M C 19. So proof of loss or destruction so fully as to exclude every hypothesis of the existence of the original is not required. The question is always one of due diligence in the effort to procure the original before evidence of its contents is resorted to. As a general rule the party is expected to know that he has in good faith exhausted in a reasonable degree all the sources of information and means of discovery which the nature of the case naturally suggests and which were accessible to him. Johnson v Arnume, 42 N J L 461, 44 (Am) Wignore § 1191 Kingstone v Inglis, 8 East 278 R v East 4 Furlly 6 D & R 153 Maung Pan v Ma Burn U B R (1892—1896) Vol II, 31. In any suspicion hangs over the instrument or there are circumstances tending to excite a suspicion that it is designedly withheld the most rigid enquiry should be made into the reasons for its non production. Johnson v Arnume supra. It follows properly, that the determination of the sufficiency of the search and in general of the proof of the fact of loss should be left entirely to the trial Court's discretion. Wignore § 1191 Paylor loc § 23 (a). There must be evidence of the search of the originals before copies and other secondary evidence are admitted. Whether or not sufficient proof of search for or loss of, an original document to lay a ground for the admission of secondary evidence, has been given is a point proper to be decided by the Judge of the first instance, and is treated as depending very much on his discretion. His conclusions should not be overruled except in a clear case of miscarriage. Hampira Devi v Jukun 19 C 133=19 I A 79 P C, Chothram v Khem Chand, A I R 1927 Sind 7. In R v Kentworth, 7 Q B 612 649 Denman L C J said "I think that we collect from R v Morton the only rule namely that no general rule exists. The question in every case is whether there has been evidence enough to satisfy the Court before which the trial is had that to use the words of Reg v J in l v D mo 'a thorough and diligent search was made for the instrument when it was likely to be found. But this is a question much fitter for the Court which tries than for us. They have to determine whether evidence is sufficient

CLAUSE (E)

When the original is a public document. When the original is a public record under section 74, secondary evidence of its contents is admissible under this clause. In this case the secondary evidence is admissible even where the original is in existence. Krishna Kishori v Kishori Lal, 14 C 491. The exception is based upon considerations of convenience. Mark L 51 L Henneff v Lyon 1 B & Ail 182, 184. Lord Ellenborough said "The production of copies in evidence is founded upon a principle of great public convenience in order that documents of great moments should not be unduly and subject to the loss that would be incurred if they were removable. The same has been laid down in respect of proceedings in Courts not of record copies of which are admitted, though not strictly of a public nature." In the same case Abbott, J said "It is a general principle that copies are receivable in such case, without the originals from the great inconvenience which would result if the documents were taken to different places. There would have been a danger of loss from such a practice, and besides, the documents would be wanted at different places at the same time." Similarly in Jones v Bow 17 Comp 17. Lord Mansfield allowed the Journals of the House of Lords to be proved by secondary evidence "for the inconvenience would be ended if the Journals of the House of Lords were to be carried all over the Kingdom." In every case, the reason for accepting secondary evidence of public documents is the "great inconvenience of removing them." Per Pollock C B in De Robertis 13 M & W 520 530. see also Coons v Reuel 11 Tex 131. Therefore "when the law is laid down that you cannot remove the document in which the writing is made, you are entitled to the next best evidence." Abinger L C B in Mortimer v McCallan, 6 M & W 58 69, Wigmore § 1715.

Under this clause a certified copy of the document, but no other secondary evidence is admissible. But this rule applies to cases in which the public document is still in existence on the public record and not where it has been proved to be lost and it is also proved that no certified copy of the original is available. Secondary evidence other than a certified copy is admissible as long as the original is in existence. Syed Pashah v Gulab Shah, 63 P R 1878, Krishna Rao v Muthangi 28 Ind C 808. A certificate of sale granted under the Civil Procedure Code is a document of title but is not a public document under the Evidence Act so as to allow secondary evidence of it to be given under clause (e). Lasany v Haribhai 2 Bom L R 533. Probate of a Will is not proved by the production of the original Will. A copy of the probate granted in Australia is admissible in evidence in India such a copy is the copy of the Will and of the endorsement made thereon by the Registrar of probate. The Will that the Will has been filed and proved in Court granting the probate. The Will when so recorded and endorsed is a public document under section 74 of the Evidence Act which may be proved by secondary evidence under section 6 (e). In the matter of Adhya 11 Ind C 261.

An entry in a public document such as a settlement record can be proved only by the original or by a certified copy. Ram v Mahi, 71 Ind C 50, 1 R 1923 L 150. Canal purchases sued to tenants giving the name of the tenant in connection with his holding come under the definition of public documents and can be proved by production in original. Chatterpol v Jackson 1 R 14 152 (Ind). A certified copy of a Robokari is admissible in evidence. In the matter of the Emperor 22 C W N 712=16 Ind C 689=19 Cr 1 719.

CLAUSE F

Certified copy permitted by the Act. Secondary evidence of the contents of a document is admissible when the original is a document of which a cert

copy is permitted by this Act, or by any other law in force in British India. The words "to be given in evidence" mean to be given in evidence in the first instance without having been introduced by any other evidence. Hurish v Prosunno 22 W R 303. A registered deed of sale is not a document of which a certified copy is permitted by this Act or by any other law in force in British India to be given in evidence. Ibid, Munnam v Najnum, 11 Ind Cts 50, Harari Lal v Manno, 10 C P L R 59, Bhadua v Akbar, 103 Ind Cts 752. Section 57 of the Registration Act provides that all copies given under that section shall be admissible for the purpose of proving the contents of the originals, but that clause was not intended to override the provisions of the Evidence Act. Raj Gobordhan v Nasiban 7 Oudh Cts 365. So a basis must be laid for the introduction of secondary evidence by proving the loss or destruction etc of the original under this section before the original of a registered document can be proved by a certified copy under s 57 of the Registration Act. Hurish v Prosunno 22 W R 303, Ma Yin v Ma Bok, A I R 1929 Rang 277. In Harari Lal v Manno supra it is held that the copies referred to in section 57 of the Registration Act are not copies of the original documents but copies of the entries made in the registers. See also Radha Kisan v Manuari 17 C P L R 161. So under this clause certified copy of a registered document is not admissible in evidence. Sansa Rao v Ghar 13 C P L R 94. The issue of a certified copy of income tax returns to a person not entitled to inspect is forbidden by s 54 of the Income Tax Act and consequently such a copy is admissible in evidence of a public document. Anwar Ali v Fa al Almad 3 Bur L J 194=2 Rang 391=1925 Rang 84. Certified copies of the original can be given in evidence by the Bankers Books Evidence Act (XVIII of 1891) vide s 4 of that Act. So also where a power of attorney has been properly deposited in the High Court, under section 4 of the Powers of Attorneys Act (VII of 1882), a certified copy of that instrument so deposited shall, without further proof be sufficient evidence of the contents of the instrument and of the deposit thereof in the High Court. vide s 4 (d) of the Powers of Attorneys Act, (VII of 1882). This clause only allows certified copies as secondary evidence. But when the original is lost or destroyed any secondary evidence is admissible. Kunmath v Tayoth 6 M 80, In re Ala and the Brenhildu, 5 C 588. Chandreswar v Bisheswar A I R 1927 P 61=101 Ind Cts 289=5 P 777. Harinand v Ram Gopal L R 27 I A 1=27 C 639 P C. Ananda v Secretary of State 43 C 973=20 C W N 373. Other secondary evidence is also admissible where the document satisfies the condition of the next clause. Ram Sundar v Chandreswar, 34 C 293.

When the original consists of numerous documents. This provision is for the saving of public time. If the point to be a certified were, for instance the balance in a long series of accounts in a merchant's books, evidently great inconvenience would arise and much public time will be wasted if a witness were compellable to go through the whole of the books and to make his examination and calculation before the Court. Sponsor v Berlin 3 Camp 310. He is allowed therefore to do this before he comes to be sworn, and then to give the general result of his scrutiny. Nort Es 248. 1 Phil Ec 433. Taylor § 462; Greenl Tr 563 (h). Wignore § 1230. In Boston v Danna 1 Gray 83, 89 104. Brydon I said: "It appears to us that questions of this sort must necessarily be left very much to the discretion of the Judge who presides at the trial. It would doubtless be inexpedient in most cases to permit ex parte statements of facts or figures to be prepared and submitted to the jury. It should only be done where the books and documents are multifarious and voluminous and of a character to render it difficult for the jury to comprehend material facts without the aid of such statements."

In a trial embracing so many details and occupying so great a length of time as the case at bar, during which a great mass of books and documents were put in evidence it was the only mode of obtaining to an intelligible view of the case before the jury. Wignore § 1230. The most commonly recognized application of this principle is that by which the state of pecuniary accounts or other business transaction is allowed to be shown by a witness's schedule or summary. Veley v Sefton, 2 Stark 274, 276. Gardner Peckage Case, Le Merchant's P.

Dost Mohammad, A I R 1925 Lah 231=78 Ind Cas 451 Evidence may be given as to the general results of arguments when they consist of numerous documents and accounts. Though their use is tantamount to assisting the Court of law in the examination of the Revenue Records yet it is an abuse of their functions to require them to give oral evidence of the contents of a document such as record of a Muafi enquiry which ought to be examined in original by the Court itself. Gulam v Mussamat Hussan 2 Lah L J 714

66 Secondary evidence of the contents of the documents

Rules as to notice referred to in section 65, clause (a), shall not to produce be given unless the party proposing to give such secondary evidence has previously given to the party in whose possession or power the document is [or to his attorney or pleader,] such notice to produce it as is prescribed by law, and if no notice is prescribed by law, then such notice as the Court considers reasonable under the circumstances of the case

Provided that such notice shall not be required in order to render secondary evidence admissible in any of the following cases, or in any other case in which the Court thinks fit to dispense with it —

- (1) when the document to be proved is itself a notice,
- (2) when, from the nature of the case, the adverse party must know that he will be required to produce it,
- (3) when it appears or is proved that the adverse party has obtained possession of the original by fraud or force,
- (4) when the adverse party or his agent has the original in Court,
- (5) when the adverse party or his agent has admitted the loss of the document,
- (6) when the person in possession of the document is out of reach of, or not subject to, the process of the Court

Principle The production of the original document is not required if production is under the circumstances not possible. Notice must be served on the party in possession of the document or his attorney to produce it because otherwise it cannot appear that the prosecutor might not have had the original if he had chosen to call for it. Per Tithman C J in Com v Messenger 1 Bing. 273 274. The party who is producing secondary evidence must show by giving notice to the party in possession of the original that he has used every exertion in his power that the best evidence might be had. Per Porter J in Abot v Rion, 9 Mart La 465 467. But where the rule of notice is satisfied, no notice is necessary. Wigmore §§ 1203 1204

Scope of the section This section embodies the law of notice, which must be given before secondary evidence can be received under section 65 clause (a). This section corresponds to section 34 of Act II of 1855 which applied only to one of the cases contained in section 65 (a) namely, that where

*These words in section 66 were inserted by the Indian Evidence Act Amendment Act (18 of 1872) s 6

S 66 the document was out of the reach of the process of the Court. Taking the section with clause (a) of section 65 notice must be given where the document is in (a) the possession or (b) the power of the person against whom it is to be proved or (c) where it is in the possession of a person legally bound to produce it. No notice is necessary when a person is out of the jurisdiction of the Court or subject to the process of the Court. North v. P. 201. The cases arising under the requirement involve two sets of questions: the necessity of the notice and the procedure of giving notice. Under the first head may be considered the order cases in which the rule of notice is not applicable, cases in which the rule is satisfied, cases in which, by exception, notice is dispensed with. Wayne v. § 1202. Where it is in the hands of the adverse party, all that is required in order to lay the foundation for secondary evidence is a reasonable demand on him to produce it. Bradford v. Case, Case 21 in Clayton & Rep. v. Thayer (1) P. p. 780. In Satterly v. Melnesh Ambler 247, Lord Hurdwicke in all cases proof by a copy and there are several rules by which evidence, even given, may be given of the contents of a deed. 1st it is ground sufficient, 1st that the deed is in the hands of the opposite party and that he had notice to produce it and does not. The rule of law is that the best evidence must be produced which the nature of the case will admit, and in no case is that rule construed with greater latitude than in cases of this sort. If the writing is in the hands of a party and the party refuses to produce it, the writing itself may be regarded as unavailable and other evidence of its contents may be received. The refusal of the party in whose possession the document is to produce it is treated as making the document unavailable for the party who wants to use it, and the party is allowed to prove its contents otherwise, and this is so even though he may have obtained a statutory order compelling production. McLain v. Hancock 17 Mo. 49 (Am.) Greenl. Ev. 563 (c). In order to put the party in default for having refused production it is usually necessary that he should have been notified that the document in question will be needed at the trial. But notice is not necessary in the following cases namely, (1) where the instrument to be proved is itself a notice to quit or notice of dishonour of a bill of exchange (2) where from the nature of the action the defendant has notice that the plaintiff intends to charge him with possession of the instrument as for example in trover of a bill of exchange. Jolley v. Taylor 1 Cramp 143, Scott v. Jones 1 Crant 865, Bucher v. Jarret 3 B. & P. 143. (3) Where the adverse party has obtained possession of the document fraudulently, as where, after service of a subpoena duces tecum, the adverse party had received paper from the witness in fraud of the subpoena. Leeds v. Cool 1 Esp. 256, Neally v. Greenough 1 N. H. 325. (4) Proof that the adverse party or his attorney, has the instrument in Court renders notice to produce it unnecessary. Dwyer v. Collins 1 Exch. 639. (5) Similarly no notice is necessary where the adverse party will be his agent admits the loss of the original. In such a case the party will be admitted to give secondary evidence of its contents. (6) Similarly if the writing is in the control of a third person without the jurisdiction of the Court no resort to legal force is of service. Greenl. Ev. § 563 (e). The above rules are applicable both in civil and criminal cases. It will comparatively seldom happen that documents are required to be produced at a criminal trial and notice will consequently have but seldom to be issued. North v. P. 201. Where oral evidence was given to prove the contents of a letter, which was neither produced nor called for, but no objection was raised to the giving of the evidence. Held that this was secondary evidence of the contents of a document and could not be given without satisfying the conditions of section 65 of the Evidence Act. Section 66 renders it legally inadmissible, although no objection was raised to the giving of it. Kameshwar v. Anantulla 26 C. 53 = 2 C. W. D. 649. Each partner should be served with the notice contemplated by s. 66 of the Evidence Act to produce such accounts and papers as may be in his custody. If he omits to produce the books and the books that are proved to be at the time in his custody or under his control, the presumption recognized in illustration (8) to s. 114 of the Evidence Act may be applied. Padm. Lohia v. Mohendra 34 C. L. J. 405. Before secondary evidence of any document can be given a notice to produce the original must be given, Maung P. v. M.

Shue 2 Rang 307=A I R 1925 Rang 7 Oral evidence of the contents of a letter neither called for nor produced is inadmissible under this section though no objection may be taken to the giving of that evidence and no subsequent dispensing with the notice can operate to make it admissible. Prasulla v Emperor A I R 1930 Cal 209=50 C L J 598

Secondary evidence of the Contents "Secondary evidence of the contents means apparently not of the existence or condition of the documents" W lutley Stokes, Vol II p 893

Party—Meaning of The word 'party' means not only adversary in the cause, but also a stranger legally bound to produce the document W lutley Stokes, Vol II p 893

Such notice to produce as is prescribed by Law According to English practice an adversary in the cause is given a notice to produce the document in question while a stranger in possession of the document be served with a subpoena duces tecum to produce it Bull v Loveland, 10 Pick 14 The notice may be directed to the party or his attorney and may be served on either All Gen v Le Merchant 2 F R 201 note, Houseman v Roberts 5 C & P 391 But on the facts it may not be sufficient to serve it upon the attorney Alfalo v Fowdriner M & M 334, Byrne v Harvey 2 Mo & Rob 89 But as to the time and place of the service no precise rule can be laid down except that it must be such as to enable the party under the known circumstances of the case, to comply with the call Rogers v Currence, 2 Mo & Rob 179, Steele v Buchanan, 10 A & L 598, Lloyd v Mostyn 2 Dowl Pr N S 476 Generally if the party dwells in another town than that in which the trial is had a service on him at the place where the trial is had or after he has left home to attend the Court, is not sufficient George v Thompson 4 Dowl 636, Postle v Pointer 9 C & P 718 As regards the time of service Vide Holt v Miers 9 C & P 191, R v Hutson 20 Fng L & Eq 790 But if a party has gone abroad leaving the cause in the hands of his attorney it will be presumed that he left with the attorney all the papers material to the cause and the notice should therefore be served on the latter Bryan v Wagstaff, 2 C & P 125 The notice also, should generally be served previous to the commencement of the trial Hughes v Budd, 8 Dowl 315, Firkin v Richards, 9 C & P 478 Gibbons v Powell 9 C & P 631, Bate v Kinsey 1 C M & R 38 If the writing is in a third person's control, and the person is within the jurisdiction, it cannot be said to be unavailable for the party desiring to use it, until he has by subpoena duces tecum resorted to the power of the law to obtain it, so that the mere fact of the third person's possession or of notice to him, or demand upon him, is insufficient to excuse non production. R v Castleton 1 T R 236, Whitford v Triton, 10 Bing 395, Green P § § 563 (d) 563 (e) But it is clear from clause (a) of section 65 as well as section 66 that a notice prescribed by law is only required to be served both on the adversary or on a third person. In India the procedure for giving such notice is laid down in Civil and Criminal Procedure Codes (Vide Civil Pro Code Order XI rules 15 16 17, 18, Order XVI, rules 5 6 7 8 9, 10 18 Criminal Procedure Code ss 91 to 98 48.) In the original side of the High Court where the English practice is followed a subpoena duces tecum will have to be issued in case of strangers Vide Woodroffe P 8th Ed 523 Where no notice is prescribed by law, such notice will be served as the Court considers reasonable under the circumstances of the case

*It may be difficult to lay down any general rules as to what the notice ought to contain says Mr Taylor 'since much depends on the particular circumstances of each case but that this much is clear first that no misstatement or inaccuracy in the notice will be deemed material if it be not really calculated to mislead the opponent (Juice v Flisoth 1 F & Lm 258 Graham v Otley, 11 B2) and next that it is not necessary by condescending minutely to dates contents parties, etc., to specify the precise document intended. Indeed it may be dangerous to do so since if any material errors were to creep into the particulars, the party sought to be affected by the notice might urge, with possible success that it had been misled thereby. If enough is stated on the notice induce the party to believe that a particular instrument will be called for then a be sufficient Rogers v Custance 2 M & Rob 181. Taylor § 443. The notice to produce need not be minutely descriptive and the Courts will not entertain frivolous or technical objections to its validity, if it points out, with sufficient distinctness, to the adverse party the documents which he is required to produce. Litton v (Inf) 11 M & W 240. Notice to produce "all letters written to and received by the plaintiff between the years 1837 and 1841, both inclusive" also all book papers etc relating to the subject matter of this cause. (Morris v Hurst 2 M & Rob 492) and letters written by the plaintiff to the defendant relating to the matters in dispute in the action. (Jacob v Lee 2 M & Rob 337) and also all accounts relating to the matters in question in this cause. (Payson v Custance 2 M & Rob 179) have been held sufficient notice to produce any documents probably included in the description. Pouell F, pp 679 680, contra Finney v Lucy Ry & M 311 per Best C J. The decision of Best C J in Finney v Lucy Ry & M 311 has been considerably shaken if not entirely overruled by the later case of the Queen's Bench in Rogers v Custance supra. But the case of Jones v Edwards W L & J 139 is not affected by this decision. Taylor § 440. But in the subpoena duces tecum the party is bound to specify the particular documents of which he requires the production at the hearing, he is not entitled to frame it in general terms as if it were a bill of discovery or even notice to produce as he is not entitled to exist on a witness who is no party to the proceedings the burden which this would involve. Lee v Angus, L R 1 Eq 59. Burchard v de Turlane (1891) 2 Q B 241, 247, 251. Where a party on the woman herself would constitute service of summons on him instead of Durgawati v Jagannath A I R 1929 All 680.

Effect of production or non production after service of notice. If a party refuses to produce the papers required such a circumstance is not of itself evidence against him it merely entitles the other party to give secondary evidence. Cooper v Gibson 3 Camp 363, Lawson v Sherwood 1 Stark 315. The refusal to produce them is however matter for observation to the jury. Semb Ld 1. Lyndhurst v C B in Bate v Kinsey 1 C M & R 41. But see Doe v Bauder 11 Hutch 81 & E 571. If the party giving the notice declines to use the papers when produced thus though a matter of observation will not make it wise if the papers are used or inspected by the party calling them. Wilson v Bourne 1 C & P 10. Phorane v Haultledge 5 Lsp 275. Notice to produce papers will not entitle the party who gives it to cross-examine a witness, as afterwards use the original either to contradict the secondary proof. (Doe v Thompson v Hodgson 12 A & E 135) or to show that there are attesting witnesses who ought to be called. (Ja / son v Allen 3 Stark 71, Edmond v Challias 7 C B 413) or to refresh the memory of a witness. (Till v Ainsworth 1847) or it seems for any purpose. (Collins v Garbon 2 F & F 1). Doe v Hodgson 12 A & E 135. He is in effect bound by any legal and satisfactory evidence produced on the other side. Shoolram v Ramlal, 9 W L 218. Voit Et 222.

Proviso para (1).—When the document to be proved is itself a notice. A notice to produce a notice is not necessary before using a copy. The reason of the exception is thus stated by Gibson J in Eisenhart v Staymal 14 S & A 153 156 (Am). "Every written notice is for the best of all reasons to be provided by a duplicate original for if it were otherwise the notice to produce the original could be proved only in the same way as the original itself and it a fresh notice it would be constantly arising ad infinitum to prove notice of the preceding notice so the party would at every step be receding in lead of a further notice can well be made in the case of one kind of notice only namely the notice to produce. In England the rulings have been in great conflict though the exceptions seem also to have included the cases of a notice of a notice of dishonour and a Lindell's notice to quit. Had There also this except r
